TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.*

MONDAY, December 7, 1835.

At twelve o'clock, M., the House was called to order by Mr. FRANKLIN, the Clerk of the last Congress.

Election of Speaker.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY, the House proceeded to ballot for a Speaker.

MESSRS. JOHNSON of Tennessee, EVERETT of Vermont, and ANTHONY of Pennsylvania, were appointed tellers; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that 225 had been given, as follows:

For JAMES K. POLK, -	132
Scattering and blanks,	9

The honorable JAMES K. POLK, of Tennessee, having received a majority of all the votes given, was declared duly elected Speaker of the 24th Congress; and returned his thanks for the honor conferred, in the following address:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In accepting the high station to which I am called by the voice of the assembled representatives of the people, I am deeply impressed with the high distinction which is always conferred upon the presiding officer of this House, and with the weight of the responsibility which devolves upon him. Without experience in this place, called to preside over the deliberations of this House, I feel that I ought to invoke, in advance, the indulgent forbearance of its members, for any errors of judgment which may occur in the discharge of the severe duties which will devolve upon me. It shall be my pleasure to endeavor to administer the laws which may be adopted for the government of the House justly and impartially towards its members, and with a view to the preservation of that order which is indispensable to our character as a body, and to the promotion of the public interests. To preserve the dignity of this body, and its high character before the country, so far as shall depend upon its presiding officer, will be objects of my deepest solicitude; and I am sure I shall have the co-operation and support of all its members, in the discharge of my duty, with a view to these objects.

I return to you, gentlemen, my sincere acknowledgments for this manifestation of your confidence, in electing me to this high station; and my ardent hope is, that our labors here may merit and receive the approbation of our constituents, and result in the advancement of the public good.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, (the oldest member in the House,) administered the usual oath to the Speaker, when the latter qualified the members by States, as also the territorial delegates from Arkansas, Florida, and Michigan.

Mr. BEARDSLEY submitted a resolution appointing Mr. WALTER S. FRANKLIN Clerk of the House; which was agreed to.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing that that body, having assembled and formed a quorum, were ready to proceed with legislative business; and that a committee had been appointed on the part of the Senate, to meet such committee as might be appointed on the part of the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress, having assembled, are ready to receive any communication which he may choose to make.

Glasecock, Seaton Grantland, Charles E. Haynes, Hopkins Holsey, Jabez Jackson, George W. Owens, George W. B. Towns.

Alabama.—Reuben Chapman, Joab Lawler, Dixon H. Lewis, Francis S. Lyon, Joshua L. Martin.

Mississippi.—David Dickson, J. F. H. Claiborne.

Louisiana.—Rice Garland, Henry Johnson, Eleazer W. Ripley.

Tennessee.—John Bell, Samuel Bunch, William B. Carter, William C. Dunlap, John B. Forester, Adam Huntsman, Cave Johnson, Luke Lea, Abram P. Maury, Balie Peyton, James K. Polk, E. J. Shields, James Standefer.

Kentucky.—Chilton Allan, Lynn Boyd, John Calhoon, John Chambers, Richard French, William J. Graves, Benjamin Hardin, James Harlan, Albert G. Hawes, Richard M. Johnson, Joseph R. Underwood, John White, Sherrod Williams.

Election of Printer.

Mr. COFFEE, submitted a resolution, in substance, that the House proceed to the election of a printer for the 24th Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, nominated Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES;

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, nominated MESSRS. GALES & SEATON; and

Mr. PEYTON, of Tennessee, nominated Messrs. BRADFORD & LEARNED.

Whole number of votes 223; necessary to a choice 112.

For Messrs. Blair & Rives, -	-	133
“ Gales & Seaton, -	-	59
“ Bradford & Learned, -	-	26
Scattering, -	-	7

Whereupon Messrs. Blair & Rives were declared duly elected printers to the twenty-fourth Congress.

TUESDAY, December 8.

MESSRS. JACKSON of Massachusetts, GALBRAITH of Pennsylvania, and TURNER of Maryland, appeared, and were qualified.

President's Message.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his private secretary; which was read. (See Senate proceedings of this date.)

Mr. BEARDSLEY submitted a resolution, committing the Message to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that 10,000 copies, together with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the House; which was agreed to.

Death of Mr. Smith.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the death of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, a member of that body, from the State of Connecticut, and that his funeral would take place at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TOUCHEY, of Connecticut, submitted a resolution that the members of the House would attend the funeral of Mr. SMITH, and would wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days; which was agreed to.

MONDAY, December 14.

MESSRS. GRAVES of Kentucky, and GARLAND of Louisiana, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

Death of Mr. Wildman.

Mr. HALEY, of Connecticut, announced the death of his colleague, the Hon. ZALMON WILDMAN, a Representative in Congress from the State of Connecticut; and, after a few remarks in eulogy of the deceased, submitted a motion for the usual demonstrations of respect for his memory; which was unanimously adopted.

Death of Mr. Kane.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the death of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, Senator from the State of Illinois, and informing the House that the funeral will take place in the Senate chamber at half-past 12 o'clock. Whereupon,

Mr. CASEY, of Illinois, moved the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That, in testimony of respect for the memory of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, late a Senator in Congress from the state of Illinois, the members of this House wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, and Mr. RIPLEY of Louisiana, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, understanding, he said, that by a presentation of a petition, a member was not made responsible for its propositions, presented a petition signed by 172 females, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAMER moved that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then presented a similar petition, which he moved to lay on the table.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said, as it was extremely desirable to have an expression of sentiment on this subject, by the House, he would ask for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. BOON called for the reading of the memorial. After it was read,

Mr. EVERETT rose to ask whether the motion to lay on the table was made by the member who presented the petition.

Mr. FAIRFIELD replied in the affirmative.

Mr. SLADE moved that the memorial be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked the division of the question.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to print, and they were ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

FRIDAY, December 18.

Mr. McKENNAN appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JACKSON, of Massachusetts, presented a petition from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying Congress to provide for the immediate abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia; which he moved to refer to a select committee.

Mr. HAMMOND moved that the petition be not received. The large majority by which the House had rejected a similar petition a few days ago, had been very gratifying to him, and no doubt would be very gratifying to the whole South. He had hoped it would satisfy gentlemen charged with such petitions, of the impropriety of introducing them here. Since, however, it had not had that effect, and they persisted still in urging them upon the House and upon the country, he thought it was not requiring too much of the House, to ask it to put a more decided seal of reprobation on them, by peremptorily rejecting this.

Mr. THOMAS said he was surprised to discover that there are gentlemen who are not content with the evidence which has already been given that a very large majority of this House are opposed to any interference whatever, not only with the rights of slaveholders in the Southern States, but with the existence of slavery within the District of Columbia. We have already laid on the table, by a vote of nearly three to one, two memorials similar to the one now under consideration. But gentlemen say those votes are equivocal; they wish to have direct proof that the rights of slaveholders are not in danger from any interference on the part of Congress. Mr. T. said that he did not concur in this opinion. The vote to lay on the table had been given to signify a decided opposition to the prayer of the petitioners; nevertheless, he would make a motion which would, he thought, place this subject before the House in a position to afford an opportunity to remove all misapprehension which really existed, and deprive every man everywhere of all pretext for maintaining that southern property and southern rights are in danger.

Mr. T. then moved to reconsider the vote just given by the House in favor of considering this petition, and said, if this motion is adopted, we shall then have this petition before us in the position in which it was placed when first presented to the House. In the vote given in favor of considering this memorial, many members had been undoubtedly taken by surprise. Some members who are in favor of rejecting this, and other similar memorials, and others who are in favor of receiving and then laying on the table this and all petitions of like import, united in the vote which he had moved to reconsider. This strange combination could not have been created without a mistake somewhere. Gentlemen must have supposed that by the adoption of the motion to consider this memorial, the difficulty which has arisen by reason of the decision of the Chair would alone be removed; and that, instead of postponing until to-morrow all action on this subject, we would now proceed to dispose of it, either by a vote to reject or to lay it on the table.

Mr. PERRON was in favor of the motion to reconsider. He would not have troubled the House with any remarks again, but for the position assumed by the gentleman from New York. That gentleman contended that the right of petition was a sacred right, guaranteed to every American citizen under the constitution; and that the House had no right to deprive them of the exercise of that right. Mr. P. said they had the right to petition, and to think and to say what they pleased; and, further, they had the right to send any matter they choose throughout all the country, without regard to consequences, and that House had no power to resist it. But, then, he claimed that, when it came to that House, the representatives had the right to treat it and dispose of it in such manner as they thought best. Was the sacred right of petition any dearer than many other sacred rights—the right to property, to liberty, and to life?

Mr. RIPLEY said that in disposing of the question before the House, care should be taken rather to allay the public feeling than to add to the existing excitement. The right of petition was a solemn one, and had been guaranteed from the time of magna charta to the present moment. Our citizens have a right to petition for a change of their constitution, and, indeed, for a change in the form of government. Every decorous memorial should be received; but, when received, it is in the power of the House to dispose of it as it may deem proper. The motion to reject this petition was an incipient question, and, in his opinion, should take precedence.

Mr. WISE was for sustaining the motion to reconsider; and, for one, could testify that he had voted under a misapprehension. In voting for the motion to consider the petition, he thought he was voting to have a direct decision of the House on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina. He was intending to bring the House also to a direct decision of the question, and had no idea after the House had decided it would consider the petition, that the consideration itself would be evaded.

Mr. W. had misapprehended in another particular. He had not understood the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to be to consider the petition to-day, but to consider his motion to reject the petition, which was what Mr. W. wished to consider. So help him God, he never wished to consider the petition of an incendiary, but he would consider the motion to reject the petition, and he warned the gentleman from South Carolina that these were the means of evading his motion.

Mr. HAMMOND said it had been far from his intention, when he made the motion he did, to throw a firebrand into that House. On the contrary, he had hoped by it to exclude one from the House. He thought the motion a very simple and direct one; and, ignorant as he was of the rules of the House, he had no idea that the House had it not in its power to protect its own dignity, and the feelings of its members, by rejecting instantly any thing calculated to affect either the one or the other. If the House had no such rule, the rule of common sense ought to govern it.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, said he had no disposition to discuss the merits of this Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

deeply exciting question at any time, and his respect for the rules of the House would prevent his attempting to do so, under the motion of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. THOMAS) to reconsider; which motion he hoped would be withdrawn, and then the motion of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BEARDSLEY,) so far modified as to meet the approbation of all who are most sensitive upon this agitating question; and he rose to add his request to the suggestion made by his friend (he hoped he might so call him) from Virginia. This was not the last memorial of the same character which would be sent here. It was perfectly apparent that the question must be met now, or at some future time, fully and explicitly, and such an expression of this House given as could leave no possible room to doubt as to the opinions and sentiments entertained by its members. He, (Mr. P.,) indeed, considered the overwhelming vote of the House the other day, laying a memorial of similar tenor, and, he believed, the same in terms, upon the table, as fixing upon it the stamp of reprobation. He supposed that all sections of the country would be satisfied with that expression; but gentlemen seemed now to consider the vote as equivocal and evasive. He was unwilling that any imputation should rest upon the North, in consequence of the misguided and fanatical zeal of a few—comparatively very few—who, however honest might have been their purposes, he believed had done incalculable mischief, and whose movements he knew received no more sanction among the great mass of the people of the North, than they did at the South. For one, he, (Mr. P.,) while he would be the last to infringe upon any of the sacred reserved rights of the people, was prepared to stamp with disapprobation, in the most express and unequivocal terms, the whole movement upon this subject.

Mr. PICKENS said he would confine himself to what had been thrown out by the gentleman from New York. That gentleman had asked, why was it that discussion was desired upon that floor? and intimated that certain fanatics, as well in the South as in the North, desired to agitate this question. Mr. P. desired to take that opportunity to throw back the insinuation with scorn and contempt. Sir, said Mr. P., we do desire to agitate this question. We desire it, because we believe we have been foully slandered before the world; and I stand here prepared, at any time when the question shall come up, to vindicate the institutions of the people I have the honor in part to represent, from the foul aspersion and calumny thrown upon them. These are the motives which prompt us to desire discussion. He had heard some insinuations thrown out from higher quarters than the gentleman from New York, that certain gentlemen of the South, belonging to a certain party, desired the discussion of this question to advance the interests of a particular individual; and he would again repeat that it was a foul and infamous calumny, and those who uttered it knew it to be such when they uttered it.

Mr. HOWARD said, in order to check even himself in debate, and with a view, if he could, to obtain the opinion of the House, whether in the outset he was right or not, he would move to lay the motion of his honorable colleague, (Mr. THOMAS,) from whom it gave him great pain to differ, on the table.

The question to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 119, noes 72.

MONDAY, December 21.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The House resumed the consideration of the petition from sundry inhabitants of the town of Wrentham, in Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The motion to reject the petition still pending,

Mr. OWENS rose to address the House; but,

Mr. PINCKNEY expressed a hope that the subject would be suspended, in order to present petitions and memorials.

Mr. OWENS said he rose for the purpose of endeavoring to reconcile the conflicting opinions of gentlemen on all sides, and to submit certain propositions, which, he trusted, if the House would accept, would put to rest this agitating, delicate, and dangerous question. It was useless for him to regret that this question had been brought before the House. It was useless to regret that this question had been the subject of discussion. The apple of discord had been thrown into the House.

Mr. O. then sent the following resolutions to the Chair, which were read:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the question of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress.

And be it further resolved, That in case any petitions, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of this House that the same ought to be laid on the table without reading.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the petition, and all the motions relating to it, on the table, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, nays 76.

So the petition, and all the motions depending thereon, were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. PATTON called up the motion made by him on Friday last, to reconsider the vote of the House, by which a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District, presented by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BRIGES,) was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion having been taken up,

Mr. PATTON said that the vote which had been just taken against suspending the rules for the purpose of taking up the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. OWENS,) must have convinced the House, and especially those gentlemen from the South who had voted for laying the former petition on the table, inconsistently with their vote on Friday last upon the same proposition, of the futility of any such scheme as had been proposed for procuring a direct vote of the House upon the principles involved in the petitions that had been offered, and would continue to be offered, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Those with whom he felt and acted on this question gave this apparently inconsistent vote under the belief that there would be no difficulty in suspending the rules to take up the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia. They so calculated, and were deceived or mistaken. I, said Mr. P., had no confidence in such calculation, and was not mistaken. That vote, said Mr. P., I think, has further demonstrated that it is idle to attempt to avoid this subject by any parliamentary manoeuvre, and that the only way of obtaining a direct vote upon the great and interesting questions embraced by them, is by making a proposition presenting the question growing out of the petitions in connection with the petitions themselves.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that this House should be apprised and fully impressed with the necessity of quieting the anxiety, the agitation, and the alarm for the institutions of the country, which are abroad in the land; and that as the means, perhaps the only means, of doing so, it should meet those questions directly, and dispose of them decisively and permanently. I am ready to meet these questions; and I believe I express the universal sentiment of the representation from the South, in saying they are ready to meet it; and while we do not desire discussion, and for one I will do nothing to provoke it, at the same time we will not, we cannot, we dare not, shrink from it, if it be forced upon us from other quarters. I prefer voting upon the questions at once, and without discussion, if possible. If this subject must be discussed, it ought to be discussed, and it is hoped will be discussed, in the spirit which ought to characterize members of the same political family, and alike imbued with the patriotic purpose of rendering permanent this great and glorious Union.

Let the vote referring this petition be reconsidered, a reference made by inadvertence, and then the petition will be open again for consideration; and, in connection with it, let the principles involved in the petition be presented for the consideration and decision of the House in some form, which will show distinctly and unequivocally that a majority of the representatives of the people of the North, as well as of the South, are opposed to the schemes of the abolitionists, and also to the efforts which are making to interfere with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. Let it be shown, if it be so, that there is such a majority opposed to an interference with slavery in this District, not upon considerations merely temporary, and influenced by existing political circumstances, but upon those high and paramount considerations which belong to the great rights of property, as well as individual and political safety, which are connected with it.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the motion to reconsider this vote would not prevail; and he expressed this hope for the very reason which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PATTON) had assigned for voting in favor of the motion. It appears to me (said Mr. A.) that the only way of getting this question from the view of the House and of the nation, is to dispose of all petitions on the subject in the same way. This is not a new opinion; I assumed this position in my very first act as a member of this House, from the very time when I first took my seat as a member of the 22d Congress. At that time fifteen petitions were transmitted to me, not from my own constituents, but from citizens of the Society of Friends in the State of Pennsylvania, with a request that I would present them to the House. Sir, I did so in homage to the sacred right of petition—a right which, in whatever manner it may be treated by other members of this House, shall never be treated by me other than with respect.

But, not being in favor of the object of the petitions, I then gave notice to the House and to the country, that upon the supposition that these petitions had been transmitted to me under the expectation that I should present them, I felt it my duty to say, I should not support them. And, sir, the reason which I gave at that time for declining to support them was precisely the same reason which the gentleman from Virginia now gives for reconsidering this motion—namely, to keep the discussion of the subject out of the House. I said, sir, that I believed this discussion would be altogether unprofitable to the House and to the country; but, in deference to the sacred right of petition, I moved that these fifteen petitions, all of which were numerous signed, should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, at the head of which was, at that time, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, now, I regret to say—and the whole country has occasion to regret—no more. These petitions were thus referred, and, after a short period of time, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia made a report to this House, which report was read, and unanimously accepted; and nothing more has been heard of these petitions from that day to this. In taking the course I then took, I was not sustained by the unanimous voice of my own constituents; there were many among them, persons as respectable, and as entitled to consideration as any others, who disapproved of the course I pursued on that occasion.

DECEMBER, 1835.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Attempts were made within the district I then represented, to get up meetings of the people to instruct me to pursue a different course, or to multiply petitions of the same character. These efforts were continued during the whole of that long session of Congress; but, I am gratified to add, without any other result than that, from one single town of the district which I had the honor to represent, a solitary petition was forwarded before the close of the session, with a request that I would present it to the House. Sir, I did present it, and it was referred to the same Committee on the District of Columbia, and I believe nothing more has been heard of it since. From the experience of this session, I was perfectly satisfied that the true and only method of keeping this subject out of discussion was, to take that course; to refer all petitions of this kind to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some other Committee of the House, to receive their report, and to accept it unanimously. This does equal justice to all parties in the country; it avoids the discussion of this agitating question on the one hand, and, on the other, it pays a due respect to the right of the constituent to petition.

Two years afterwards, similar petitions were presented, and at that time, an effort made, without success, to do that which has now been done successfully in one instance. An effort was made to lay these petitions on the table; the House did not accede to the proposition: they referred the petitions as they had been before referred, and with the same result. For, from the moment that these petitions are referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, they go to the family vault "of all the Capulets," and you will never hear of them afterwards.

At the first session of the last Congress, a gentleman from the State of New York, a distinguished member of this House, now no longer here, which I regret to say, although I do not doubt that his place is well supplied, presented one or more petitions to this effect, and delivered a long and eloquent speech of two hours in support of them. And what was the result? He was not answered: not a word was said, but the vote of the House was taken; the petitions were referred to the Committee on the District, and we have heard nothing more of them since. At the same session, or probably at the very last session, a distinguished member of this House, from the State of Connecticut, presented one or more petitions to the same effect, and declared in his place that he himself concurred in all the opinions expressed. Did this declaration light up the flame of discord in this House? Sir, he was heard with patience and complacency. He moved the reference of the petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and there they went to sleep the sleep of death. Mr. ADAMS speaking from recollection, was [the Reporter is requested by him to state] mistaken with respect to the reference of the petitions presented at the last session of Congress to the committee. They were then for the first time laid on the table, as was the motion to print one of them. At the preceding session of the last Congress, as at all former times, all such petitions had been referred to committees and printed when so desired. Why not adopt the same course now? Here is a petition which has been already referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Leave it there, and my word for it, sir, you will have just such a result as has taken place time after time before. Your Committee on the District certainly is not an abolition committee. You will have a fit, proper, and able report from them; the House, sub silentio, will adopt it, and you will hear no more about it. But if you are to reconsider the vote, and to lay these petitions on the table; if you come to the resolution that this House will not receive any more petitions, what will be the consequence? In a large portion of this country every individual member who votes with you will be left at home at the next election, and some one will be sent who is not prepared to lay these petitions on the table.

What will be the next consequence? Sir, you will have discussion; and, to my regret I say it, discussion has been called for and challenged upon this floor. It has been challenged. And what will the discussion amount to? A discussion upon the merits of slavery. Sir, on such a discussion every speech made by a Representative from the north of Mason and Dixon's line, in this House, will be an incendiary pamphlet, and what will you do with them? The speeches of my colleagues, probably of myself, will be incendiary; because, if discussion is thrust upon us, I doubt not I might make a speech as incendiary as any pamphlet upon which such torrents of denunciation have been poured upon us. If I were capable of the craven and recreant spirit of shrinking from expressing, not probably so much my own sentiments as those of my constituents, I should go home to their scorn, and they would send here a man who would represent them more faithfully.

Well, sir, what becomes of these incendiary pamphlets, the speeches in this House, if they go to the public? What will be done with them by the public press? The newspapers report these speeches; every speech is circulated through your whole country; and how can you arrest it? Will you introduce a resolution that members of this House shall not speak a word in derogation of the sublime merits of slavery? You must have a resolution of this kind, to follow the one laid upon your table this morning—a resolution that no member of this House shall dare to utter an incendiary sentiment? And what is that incendiary sentiment? Why, it is, in substance, the contents of these pamphlets. Well, sir, you begin with suppressing the right of petition; you must next suppress the right of speech in this House; for you must offer a resolution that every member who dares to express a sentiment of this kind shall be expelled, or that the speeches shall not go forth to the public—shall not be circulated. What will be the consequence then? You suppress the right of petition; you suppress the freedom of speech; the freedom of the press, and the freedom of religion; for, in the minds of many worthy, honest, and honorable men, fanatics, if you please so to call them, this is a religious question, in which they act under what they believe to be a sense of duty to their God; and, however erroneous may be their conclusions, it is not for me, nor for this House, to judge them. Therefore, sir, in deference to what has been heretofore the usage of this House, in deference to the respect which is due to the right of petition, and the respect which is due to the right of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion, I hope that this petition will be left where it has been placed by the House, in the possession of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that we shall hear no more about it.

Mr. THOMPSON said: As to discussing this subject before any human tribunal, I will not. I will not condescend to vindicate to this House or elsewhere, this or any other of our domestic institutions. It is no affair of yours; you have no right to touch it, still less to demand a reason of us for its continuance. The gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. PIERCE, and I must say that his voice-sounded in my ear as the voice of a friend, said that we of the South, could not know the state of things at the North; that in his district there was not one abolitionist in five hundred. If I did not know it before, I do now, sir, because he has said so. Let me say, in my turn, that he does not know the state of feeling at the South, and I do, with a full knowledge of all my responsibilities, declare that, in my opinion, nothing will satisfy the excited, the almost frenzied South, but an indignant rejection of these petitions; such a rejection as will, at the same time that it respects the right of petitioning, express the pre-determination, the foregone conclusion, of the House on the subject—a rejection, sir, that will satisfy the South, and serve as an indignant rebuke to the fanatics of the North. But we are told that such a course, whilst it would satisfy the South, would offend the people of the North. How so, sir? I had thought that it was the South, that was interfered with, the South that was injured, that it was the South that was to be satisfied. Who is it at the North that we are to conciliate? The fanatics? Fanatics, did I say, sir? Never before was so vile a band dignified with that name. They are murderers, foul murderers, accessories before the fact, and they know it, of murder, robbery, rape, infanticide. Sir, this question must be settled; if I may so speak, it must be killed; a just regard to the rights and feelings of the South, to the peace and harmony of this great republic, the permanency of our institutions, demand it; in short, sir, every consideration which can address itself to a patriot demands it. Yes, sir, in the presence of the armed monarchies of Europe, with all the powerful elements both on this and the other side of the Atlantic, already in incipient commotion, already rumbling in their deep crater, he is wilfully blind who does not see that the time is not distant when union, concert, all the patriotism, all the virtue, all the wisdom of our whole country, will be demanded. Shall we, sir, continue to stir this most prolific source of discord, aye, of hatred, or shall we settle it, and forever?

TUESDAY, December 22.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The question being that depending from yesterday, on the motion of Mr. PATTON, for a reconsideration of the vote by which a memorial praying Congress to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, was referred to the Committee on the District—

Mr. GRANGER, of New York, said:

Sir, who are these petitioners? They are persons who, looking to the letter of the constitution of their country, and finding there that Congress has the right of exclusive legislation for this District, and not looking beyond that, to the grants of session by the States of Virginia and Maryland, to see under what reservations those grants were made and accepted; and without stopping to ask the still more important question, whether the residents of the District of Columbia require any interference, suppose that Congress have the right to legislate upon this subject. Starting upon this abstract proposition, they have supposed they had a right to appear at the bar of this House, and to ask that the seat of Government of a free nation should be inhabited by those only who are free.

Such, sir, is the condition of these petitioners; and I can never consent that they should be designated as murderers, or that their names should be mingled with those of the abolitionists.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the House, by a vote of 104 to 79, and the question of reconsideration being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. OWENS said, in consequence of the wide range which the debate had taken, he had determined to move to lay the petition on the table, with a view to prevent the continuance of the discussion upon the motion to commit. The same course he should pursue in regard to every similar petition which might be presented. His resolutions on the subject, which he had indicated to the House, he would offer when the States were called for resolutions. He moved to lay the petition and the motion to commit on the table.

Mr. WISE made a point of order. Had not the motion to reject precedence of the motion to lay on the table?

The CHAIR said no motion to reject was before the House, and the motion to lay on the table was not debatable.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ashley, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Double-day, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Philo C. So the petition and the motion to commit were ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

Representative from Michigan.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said it was within the recollection of the House that, a few days since, he had moved that the gentleman who had presented himself there as a representative from what is called the State of Michigan, be permitted to occupy a seat on the floor during the sittings of the House. It seemed due from himself that he should ask the House to consider that motion; but, before doing so, he wished to suggest that he designed to modify his proposition, by merely asking the House to permit that gentleman to come within the hall during the sittings of the House in the character of a spectator; that, he trusted, would be acceptable to the whole House; and he had done it with reference to former precedents, particularly that of the State of Tennessee. Mr. B. then sent his modified proposition to the Chair, to be read from the Clerk's table, for the information of the House, and was as follows:

Resolved, That Isaac E. Cray, who claims to have been duly elected a member of this House, be admitted as a spectator within the hall during the sittings of this House.

Objection being made,

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to suspend the rules of the House to enable him to make the motion, which was agreed to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY then moved the foregoing resolution; which was agreed to.

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 31.

MESSRS. CLAIBORNE and DICKSON, Representatives from the State of Mississippi, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1836.

Seminole Hostilities.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee proceeded to consider the following bill:

A bill making an appropriation for repressing hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $80,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses attending the repression of hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians in Florida.

A communication from the Secretary of War on the subject was read; when

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly adverted to the depredations committed by the Seminoles, their having laid waste and desolated the country for eighty miles, &c.

Mr. VINTON inquired whether the gentleman from New York was in possession of any information as to the cause of this war, or who commenced it?

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had in his possession a package of documents containing the desired information. The disturbance had grown out of a treaty with the Seminoles, the execution of which had been postponed from time to time by them; and when a portion of these Indians had determined to remove, two of their own chiefs had been murdered by themselves, &c. The gentleman from Ohio could examine the correspondence in his possession, and he would be able to satisfy himself on the subject.

Mr. VINTON inquired when the treaty alluded to was made? He did not wish to delay the passage of the bill; but if it was the treaty of 1823, or 1824, it was his intention to move to amend it by making it obligatory on the United States to carry that treaty into effect.

Mr. CAMBRELENG adverted to the necessity of speedy action upon this subject. The war was progressing. Fifteen hundred Indians were in the field, and they were opposed by only about two hundred troops. Unless speedily repressed, they would probably make inroads upon the State of Georgia. If the gentleman from Ohio desired to raise a question or a debate upon the treaty, he could select another opportunity, without embarrassing the present measure.

Mr. ADAMS said: Mr. Speaker, I propose to amend this bill, by introducing, after the word "to be expended," the words "under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to law." My objection to the bill as it now stands is, that it is an appropriation rather too indefinite; and I make this motion now, more with a view to anticipate what I presume will be an amendment proposed in another place, than for any other consideration. And I make it now the more readily, because at the close of the last session of Congress, in the case of a similar appropriation, not only the appropriation itself failed, but the whole bill to which it was annexed (and an extremely important one it was) failed entirely, as I understood, in consequence of the indefinite nature of the appropriation.

I ask the gentleman, therefore, to assent to the introduction of something like these terms: "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to law."

Mr. CAMBRELENG had no objection to the amendment which had been proposed.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill laid aside.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. JARVIS, came up in order:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And be it further resolved, that in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table without being referred or printed.

The question pending was the following amendment, offered by Mr. WISE:

Resolved, That there is no power of legislation granted by the constitution to the Congress of the United States to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and that any attempt by Congress to legislate upon the subject of slavery, will be not only unauthorized but dangerous to the union of the States.

Mr. JARVIS modified his resolution as follows:

Whereas any attempt in this House to agitate the question of slavery is calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy the peace and prosperity of the country. Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And it is further resolved, that in case any petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, moved to lay the resolution as modified, and the amendment, on the table.

The question on the motion to lay the subject on the table was decided—yeas 58, nays 156.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

MONDAY, February 8.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked the consent of the House to offer the resolution, heretofore indicated by him on the subject of the abolition of slavery, and objections being made, he moved the suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolution. Decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 65.

Mr. PINCKNEY then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, (Mr. JARVIS,) with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union; assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to re-establish harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of the Union.

Mr. BOYD moved the previous question, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 47. So the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. VINTON called for the division of the resolution into three several parts; so that the question should be taken on the following clauses separately:

1. "Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, (Mr. JARVIS), with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. WISE), and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject, be referred to a select committee."

2. "With instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy."

3. "And that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union."

The CHAIR stated the division indicated was in order, and the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question being taken on the first member of the proposition, as above divided, it was determined in the affirmative.

So the first clause was agreed to.

The second member of the proposition was determined by—yeas 201, nays 7.

So the second clause was agreed to.

Mr. WISE, when his name was called, rose and said: I refuse to vote at all upon such a proposition; because to affirm any proposition by declaratory resolution is to admit it needs affirmation; and because Congress has no constitutional power either to affirm or deny any proposition whatever, in relation to slavery in the States.

Mr. PICKNEY moved that the gentleman be excused from voting; which was agreed to.

The question being about to be taken on the third branch of the proposition—

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a division of the question on this branch, so as to take the question on the clause declaring that Congress "ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia," and omitting the reasons therefor.

The CHAIR decided that the division was in order, and the question being taken on the first clause of the third branch indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD), it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, French, Fry, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillet, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Luke Lea, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Manning, Martin, John Y. Mason, William Mason, Moses Mason, Maury, May, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Phelps, Pinckney, Rencher, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, John Thompson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Wardwell, Washington, Weeks, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams—163.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Banks, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, George Chambers, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Philo C. Fuller, Granger, Hard, Hazeltine, Heister, Hoar, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, Janes, Lawrence, Lay, Lincoln, Love, Samson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Morris, Parker, Dutee J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Sloane, Sprague, Vinton, Webster, Whittlesey—47.

So the first member of the third clause, as above stated, was agreed to.

The question on the remaining part of the third clause, was decided by—yeas 127, nays 75.

So the remainder of the third clause was agreed to.

The question being on the remaining portion of the resolution, it was read as follows:

"Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this district, and to re-establish harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of the Union."

The question was then taken on agreeing to this residue of the resolution, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 167, nays 6.

So the whole resolution was carried, and the committee ordered to consist of nine.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked the consent of the House to permit him, and also the gentlemen from Georgia and Virginia, (Messrs. GLASCOCK and ROBERTSON,) to enter their reasons on the journal for the vote given by them on the resolution just adopted.

Objections being made, Mr. GLASCOCK moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which was disagreed to.

United States and France.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Government of Great Britain has offered its mediation for the adjustment of the dispute between the United States and France. Carefully guarding that point in the controversy, which, as it involves our honor and independence, admits of no compromise, I have cheerfully accepted the offer. It will be obviously improper to resort even to the mildest measure of a compulsory character, until it is ascertained whether France has declined or accepted the mediation. I therefore recommend a suspension of all proceedings on that part of my special Message of the 15th of January last, which proposes a partial non-intercourse with France. While we cannot too highly appreciate the elevated and disinterested motives of the offer of Great Britain, and have a just reliance upon the great influence of that power to restore the relations of ancient friendship between the United States and France, and know, too, that our own pacific policy will be strictly adhered to, until the national honor compels us to depart from it, we should be insensible to the exposed condition of our country, and forget the lessons of experience, if we did not efficiently and sedulously prepare for an adverse result. The peace of a nation does not depend exclusively upon its own will, nor upon the beneficent policy of neighboring powers; and that nation which is found totally unprepared for the exigencies and dangers of war, although it come without having given warning of its approach, is criminally negligent of its honor and its duty. I cannot too strongly repeat the recommendation already made to place the seaboard in a proper state of defence, and promptly to provide the means for amply protecting our commerce.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1836.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the Message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FRIDAY, February 12.

The Late Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. INGERSOLL, with the unanimous consent of the House, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to cause a marble bust of the late Chief Justice Marshall to be prepared by an artist of merit and reputation, and to be placed in the chamber of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a position corresponding with that of the bust of the late Chief Justice Jay.

Mr. INGERSOLL said: I am not about to pronounce an eulogium on the character of John Marshall. His merits are already recorded in the hearts and judgments of his countrymen. A recollection of them will be cherished as long as a just estimate can be formed of brilliant talents and unspotted integrity, as long as gratitude shall continue to be a virtue. Few men since the formation of the Government have served it so well, and none more faithfully. In the administration of the laws, under a Government of laws, he was for nearly five-and-thirty years supreme in station, in abilities, and in usefulness. It has been the peculiar fortune of this republic that it has found on different occasions, when it has called its eminent citizens to posts of public duty, a happy fitness in the individual to his station, a devotion of purpose in the man, and a confidence in his designs on the part of the people; a union and an aptitude from which nothing but lasting benefits can arise. Many shining properties were centered in the eminent person to whom it is the object of this resolution to offer a feeble tribute of respect and gratitude—properties which justify the feeling universally entertained for him as the pride and the boast of his countrymen. When this and much more shall be done by them, the nation and posterity will continue to be immeasurably his debtors. I submit the resolution as a cheerful acknowledgment of the debt we owe, and as the pledge of an effort to repay it in the emulation of his virtues.

Mr. STORER remarked that some weeks ago he had presented a memorial from Hiram Powers, requesting Congress to employ him for the purpose of executing the work proposed in this resolution. The memorial was before the Committee on the Library, who would report upon it in a few days.

Mr. McKEON suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the expediency of modifying the resolution so as to refer the subject to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. INGERSOLL so modified the resolution, and it was agreed to, nem. dis.

TUESDAY, March 8.

Mr. DIXON H. LEWIS, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Alabama, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

MONDAY, March 14.

Suppression of Indian Hostilities.

The bill making a further appropriation for suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, was read the third time.

Mr. STORER did not rise to oppose the bill, but merely to ask for some light on the subject. If it were necessary, he would vote for ten times the amount asked for, but he could not do so unless it was actually necessary. He said they had already voted half a million of dollars for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, and to feed all the suffering inhabitants thereof; and he asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he could show any reasons why they should vote more money. He said it was the practice with the committee of which Mr. S. was a member to give the reasons, when they reported a bill, for so doing; but there the committee which had the whole management of the appropriations of the House introduced bills without a solitary reason to sustain them. He wished to know what were the grounds for the appropriation at present asked for.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the reading of a letter from the Secretary of War, which, he remarked, would probably be satisfactory to the gentleman from Ohio.

The letter was read, and the bill passed.

WEDNESDAY, April 6.

Purchase of Books.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and required to furnish the new members of the twenty-fourth Congress with the same books furnished to the members of the twenty-third Congress.

It being suggested that a similar resolution was on the Speaker's table, Mr. BRIGGS varied his motion so as to take up that resolution; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, objected to the passage of the resolution, and felt it his duty to make a statement to the House of the expenditures which would arise upon the adoption of the resolution. He had examined into the subject, and caused a statement to be made, showing the books that would be printed and purchased under the resolution, and he found it would cause a reprint of eighty-four volumes, which would cost the sum of $35,041 16; and under it the Clerk of the House would purchase fifty-four volumes, now in print, or preparing for the press, costing the sum of $63,938; making an aggregate expenditure of near one hundred thousand dollars; making over one thousand dollars in books to each of the new members of the present Congress.

Mr. J. read a catalogue of the books, and the cost, as estimated by one of the Clerks of the House, as follows:

Mr. J. said many of the books which would necessarily be reprinted, if the resolution was adopted, were wholly useless, and would never be read. He referred to the volumes of the documents of the first session of the last Congress, containing the panic memorials and the names of the memorialists, and also those containing the names of the pensioners. He thought the thousand dollars could be as well, much better expended, for the benefit of new members in purchasing other books of a different character. Mr. J. regretted placing himself in a position in which he might have the appearance of acting unkindly to the new members of the present Congress. He felt it his duty to resist such an application of the publication heretofore as well as now; he had uniformly opposed all such propositions, from the time he had the honor of a seat upon this floor, and he expected to do so. If Congress should purchase and present books to the members of Congress, they should be returned to the public library upon the expiration of their respective terms, for the use of their successors. The resolution seemed plausible, in placing the new members upon the same footing with the members of the last Congress; it was apparent, however, that they could, with the same propriety, claim as many books as the members of the present Congress who had served fifteen or twenty years; and all our successors upon this floor might, with the same propriety, make the same claim. He felt it his duty to make these statements to the House, and he should ask the privilege of recording his vote in opposition.

Mr. INGERSOLL (who originally offered the resolution) said: I introduced this resolution, not so much from any impulses of my own, as in compliance with the wishes of others, who, like myself, are without the advantage of personal experience here. I do not desire to urge it beyond a point which may be considered perfectly reasonable and just. The resolution, it will be perceived, merely adopts the precedent which has been set by those members of the present Congress who were also members of the last. All of them, I presume, have either supported the measure by their votes, or availed themselves of its fruits. The gentleman from Tennessee has, as he says, received the books, and he manifests the utility of them in the information which he habitually communicates to the House. Those who are entirely without the benefit derived from a participation in the past proceedings of Congress, are obliged to recur to the volumes in question, in order that they may reach the information necessary to enable them to give a conscientious vote upon almost any subject that occurs. For myself, I acknowledge my obligations to an honorable friend for the use of the books which have been furnished to him under former resolutions of a similar character. The State Papers, which are especially objected to, are of peculiar value, and of constant use as a work of reference.

This resolution, however, is more important in a public than a private sense. Besides the immediate communication of intelligence to members of Congress, it contemplates a broader diffusion of interesting knowledge throughout the nation, and throughout the world. Every element of the present elevation of the country in power and in happiness is to be found in the works which it is proposed to distribute.

You cannot better serve the cause of universal freedom and sound political wisdom, than by exhibiting, everywhere, the measures which this nation has resorted to and adopted in the course of its brief but comprehensive history. After the books have been used by the immediate representatives of the people, they will become the property of the people themselves. They will be cherished as the true, and, before long, the only evidence accessible to every citizen of the wisdom and the errors of those who have gone before us. They will teach lessons of equal practical utility, whether they reflect a record of proceedings which are wise enough to be imitated, or erroneous enough to be avoided.

The example of another Government is worthy of recollection. Your library has recently been enriched by a gift of the valuable and extensive publication of the almost by-gone monuments of British history and British law. That politic and liberal nation has endeavored to spread as widely as the empire of civilized man extends, the information contained in those costly volumes. Not only are the especial libraries of sister Governments in possession of them, but the existence of them is perpetuated by finding them a place in the halls of all the celebrated seminaries of learning throughout Christendom. It appears to me that we owe at least as much to our fathers and to ourselves.

At a moment when the national Treasury is filled to repletion, what better use can be made of a comparative modicum of its surplus wealth than that which the resolution contemplates? Not an interest can suffer. Every one may be benefited. The expense which is complained of is insignificant, whether it be compared with the good effects that are likely to be the consequence, or with the ordinary profusion which is manifested in the printing of public documents by the House.

With respect to one of the works called for, it is not easy to understand upon what principle a preference is to be given to our more experienced brethren over ourselves. Where publications have been made heretofore, and are now exhausted by distribution, there may be plausibility in the argument which objects to a renewed expense. But the "Documentary History of the United States" is yet in embryo. Not a member has been furnished with it. When it shall have issued from the press, and comes fresh and new for the information of the people, with the whole expense which it calls for yet to be incurred, I claim for all the representatives an equal right to partake of the benefits which it confers.

After some remarks from Messrs. REED, JUDSON, and SPEIGHT,

Mr. SPEIGHT called for the orders of the day.

On motion of Mr. MAY, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill to establish the Territorial Government of Wisconsin. After a debate upon details, and various amendments adopted,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

Deposit Banks.

Mr. WISE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire into the agency or mode of selecting the banks of deposit for the public money, and into the contracts with the Treasury Department, by which they are regulated, and into the manner in which, and the persons by whom, such contracts are made; and to inquire whether any, and if any, what connection or relation, official or unofficial, exists, or has existed, between a certain Reuben M. Whitney and the Treasury Department of the United States, or between him and the banks of deposit of the public money, and into the extent of his agency generally, in keeping and controlling the public money, and into the amount of his compensation, whether the same be paid out of the public Treasury or by the deposit banks; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Objections having been made,

Mr. WISE moved to suspend the rules; and,

The question being taken, the motion was rejected—yeas 85, nays 82—two-thirds.

General Appropriation Bill—Documentary History.

[H. OF R.]

SATURDAY, April 16.

General Appropriation Bill—Documentary History.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1836.

The bill was reported at a late hour last night, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring with the committee in their report.

The committee proposed to strike out the following clause:

"For the Documentary History of the American Revolution, per act of 2d March, 1833, $20,000."

Mr. EVERETT excepted to the amendment, on the ground of its rejecting a provision to carry into effect a valid and binding contract.

Mr. PHILLIPS produced the contract made by Mr. Secretary Livingston with Clarke and Force, and a letter addressed by them to Mr. Secretary Forsyth; which were read by the Clerk.

The debate was continued by Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, and Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, in favor of the clause, and by Mr. CAYE JOHNSON against it.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment to the clause directing the Secretary of State to notify Clarke and Force to discontinue the said work, and to ascertain the probable amount of damages that would be incurred by rescinding the contract, and to report the same to Congress at the next session.

Mr. SREIGHT suggested to the gentleman to withdraw his amendment, and to permit the question to be taken on the amendment of the committee to strike out.

Mr. ADAMS spoke in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said all the gentlemen opposed to the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee appear extremely desirous of holding the House to the strict letter of the contract alleged to have been made by the late Secretary of State, (Mr. Livingston,) with Messrs. Clarke and Force. They maintain that the honor of the nation is involved in the fulfilment of the construction now put upon that contract. I am in favor, said Mr. S., of looking into the letter of it, but desire that the spirit also of the instrument, by which the honor of the nation is said to be thus deeply pledged, may also be examined. I think, sir, that it will be found, upon critical examination, that there is evidence enough in the documents connected with this contract, that no injustice will be done to Messrs. Clarke and Force by striking out the appropriation of $20,000 now under consideration, and that the honor of the nation will be in no degree violated by following out hereafter the course indicated by the resolution of the House adopted this morning, referring the whole subject of these books to the Committee of Ways and Means for final investigation.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee has remarked that this contract, if not a fraud in its inception upon the Congress of 1833, is, in the shape which it is now made to assume, a great imposition upon this House, and that the House is not bound to sustain it. I am, sir, also of this opinion, and I think there is evidence to substantiate this opinion to the satisfaction of any impartial jury of twelve men that might be empannelled in any part of the country. Let me invite the attention of the House to some features of the contract, to show that it was not contemplated either by Clarke and Force, or by the Congress of 1833, to be of the character and magnitude now represented by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) and by other gentlemen who preceded him on the same side.

By turning to the contract of Clarke and Force with Mr. Livingston, then Secretary of State, I find the following language made use of, descriptive of the work then contemplated:

"The said Edward Livingston, &c., doth hereby authorize and direct the said Clarke and Force, jointly and severally, to prepare and publish fifteen hundred copies of said 'Documentary History of the American Revolution,' according to the plan laid down in their memorial and accompanying documents presented to Congress, and upon which said act has been passed."

Now, turn to the memorial here alluded to, for "the plan" of the work. That memorial, the original proposition of Clarke and Force, reads thus, in part:

"The memorial of the subscribers respectfully represents, that as early as the 11th day of July, 1778, the memorial of Ebenezer Hazard was presented to Congress, calling their attention to the importance of 'a Collection of American State Papers.' On the 20th of the same month, certain resolutions were passed, approving of the object, and granting such patronage and facilities as he desired. (See copies herewith, A.)"

"Shortly after Mr. Hazard was appointed Postmaster General, two volumes were published by him; but the object of Congress was not attained, inasmuch as not a single document relating 'to the rise and progress of the present war with Great Britain,' referred to by the committee, was published by him. He gave up the work in consequence of his other engagements; and no one has since ventured to complete it.

"Your memorialists present themselves to Congress, willing and partially prepared to undertake this interesting and laborious collection," &c.

Such is the language that is descriptive of the work to which the Congress of 1833 was induced to extend its patronage, by the act of March 3d, of that year. And such is the plan of the work to which that act has reference, and upon which it was based. It was, substantially, to aid in the particular work which Hazard had projected and commenced, and in none other. What evidence have we further, of the character of Hazard's plan, and of the magnitude of it? Why, sir, we have evidence on this point, which cannot but be of the most satisfactory character; evidence by which we can accurately judge of the view entertained by the Congress of 1833 upon this subject. We have the resolutions of the Congress of 1778, respecting Hazard's proposed work; and these resolutions are referred to by Clarke and Force in their contract with Mr. Livingston, and constitute a part of their memorial to the Congress of 1833, for the purpose of describing "the plan" of their work. One of these resolutions of 1778 reads thus, after setting forth "that Mr. Hazard must necessarily be put to expense of various kinds in procuring the extensive collection of materials he proposes to make:"

"Resolved, That to enable Mr. Hazard to sustain such expense, one thousand dollars be advanced to him upon account, returns being made to Congress of his expenses in this business."

Such, sir, is the indication furnished in the papers of Messrs. Clarke and Force, the memorialists, of the views entertained by the Congress of 1778 relative to Mr. Hazard's work, which these memorialists described to the Congress of 1833 as the plan of their work; they having transferred the title of Hazard's work, "A Collection of American State Papers," into the title of "A Documentary History of the American Revolution." Will it be pretended, sir, hereafter, upon this floor, that the Congress of 1778 contemplated, in Mr. Hazard's work, an enterprise to be compared in any thing with the work now attempted to be imposed upon Congress under Clarke and Force's contract? It has been demonstrated that this latter work is to cost from four hundred and eight thousand to half a million of dollars, as the least estimate. And will the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) or any other gentleman, reflect so severely upon the Congress of 1778 as to charge them with having in view a work of this magnitude, or any thing like it, when they contributed the trifling, pitiful sum, in comparison, of one thousand dollars, to aid Hazard in his work? Sir, we are told by these memorialists themselves, Messrs. Clarke and Force, that to Hazard's work, whatever it was—and it is alluded to by them as giving the outline of their own plan—that the Congress of 1778 granted to Hazard "such patronage and facilities as he desired." This is their own language, and their own showing; for I do not go out of the case they have given in their original documents, presented to the Congress of 1833, for my proofs that the contract which they now claim to have made is not the contract, and their present work is not the work, had in view either by themselves or the Congress of 1833. Let me ask gentlemen if they believe that Hazard, had he in contemplation an enterprise involving an expense of nearly half a million of dollars, at the lowest estimate, would have desired, "patronage and facilities" of Congress to the amount of only one thousand dollars, inasmuch as they were willing to grant all that he desired? Sir, I maintain that here is proof enough to insure the verdict of any jury in the country, that neither Hazard, nor the Congress of 1778, nor the Congress of 1833, for an instant conceived of such a stupendous enterprise as is now set up under the contract of Mr. Livingston, which has been read, nor do I believe that the memorialists themselves contemplated one of such magnitude at that time. I believe, sir, that here is evidence in abundance, in their reference to Hazard's plan, as a description substantially of their own plan, and in the character of the resolution of 1778 respecting Hazard's plan, to sustain the positions taken by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that Congress has been outrageously imposed upon under this Clarke and Force contract, and that Congress is not bound now, in neither honor nor equity, to fulfil the construction now attempted to be put upon it. Sir, we ought to stop, before contributing an additional sum of $20,000 to the sum of $20,000 already appropriated, until a thorough investigation of the subject has been made by the Committee of Ways and Means, under the resolution of the same honorable gentleman, adopted on this morning by the House.

We are told, further, by these memorialists, that Mr. Hazard pursued his plan through two volumes, and then abandoned it. Why did he abandon it? Because the magnitude of the enterprise was too great for his means, and because Congress refused to aid him sufficiently in comparison to his enterprise? No such thing. Congress contributed one thousand dollars towards it. It does not appear that more was needed. But he abandoned it; we are told "he gave up the work in consequence of his other engagements, and no one has since ventured to complete it." Such is the history of the work he planned, and such is the plan of the work presented to the Congress of 1833, to induce them to pass the act under which the present enormous claim of Clarke and Force is set up.

General Appropriation Bill—Documentary History.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1836.

The bill had been considered in Committee of the Whole, and the question immediately pending was on concurring with the amendment of the committee to strike out the following clause: "For the Documentary History of the American Revolution, per act of 2d of March, 1833, $20,000;" and

Mr. CARTER moved to amend the clause by directing the Secretary of State to notify Clarke and Force to discontinue the said work, and to ascertain the probable amount of damages that would be incurred by rescinding the contract, and to report the same to Congress at the next session.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, addressed the House in opposition to the amendment of the committee, and in favor of retaining the clause. MESSRS. VANDERPOEL, GLASCOCK, THOMPSON of South Carolina, TOUCEY, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, EVERETT and ADAMS, followed on the same side.

Mr. HARDIN and Mr. RENCHER spoke in opposition.

The question recurred on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their report, being to strike out the clause; and it was further debated by Mr. PATTON of South Carolina, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, and Mr. TOUCEY.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 93.

TUESDAY, April 19.

Deposit Banks.

By general consent, the House proceeded to consider the following resolution, heretofore submitted by Mr. DROMGOOLE.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House full information of the mode and manner of selecting banks in the several States or Territories for the deposit of the public money of the United States; of all contracts, agreements, or stipulations, entered into with said banks for the safe keeping of said moneys; that the Secretary of the Treasury also state what agents have been employed, the nature and extent of their agency, and the compensation which such agents have received in any way from the Government of the United States; and that he also state what officers or agents on the part of said banks have in any way participated or been instrumental in the formation of any such contracts, agreements, or stipulations, concerning the deposit and safe keeping of said moneys in said banks.

The question being on the motion of Mr. WISE to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

That a select committee be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire into the mode or agency of selecting the banks of deposit for the public money; the contracts with the Treasury Department, by which they are regulated; the manner in which, and the persons by whom, such contracts are or have been made; into all correspondence whatsoever touching contracts for the deposit of the public money; and into all connection or relation, official or unofficial, which exists, or has existed, between any person or persons and the Treasury Department, or between them and the deposit banks, or any individuals or banks, touching the custody and the control and deposit of the public money; or between any department of the Executive, and any individual or individuals or banks, touching the disbursements of the public money, appropriated or unappropriated by law; and into the amount of compensation of any or all agents whatsoever, official or unofficial, connected with the said Department or said banks, touching the disbursement, safe keeping, or deposit, of the public money; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WISE resumed and concluded his remarks in support of his motion.

When Mr. WISE had concluded, Mr. PEYTON and Mr. DROMGOOLE both rising nearly at the same time, the SPEAKER gave the floor to Mr. PEYTON, who addressed the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE replied at length to the gentlemen from Virginia and Tennessee, (Messrs. WISE and PEYTON.) He expressed his surprise at the opposition this resolution had met with, as it was a mere ordinary resolution of inquiry, such as were almost daily presented, and agreed to without a question. The question was this: was the information called for in it desirable to be placed in the possession of the House? He maintained that it was absolutely essential for the action of the House upon the bill regulating the public deposits. Mr. D. then contended that the information called for was full and ample; but that, if the response turned out to be unsatisfactory, his colleague might then extend the inquiry. He denied most unequivocally, in reply to his colleague, that the effect of this resolution would be to smother inquiry or to suppress the truth; and he repelled the idea that he had consulted the Secretary of the Treasury in draughting the resolution; but he was unwilling to condemn him, or any other officer, unheard, or without investigation. Again: he was not disposed to go into the private inquiry embraced in the amendment of his colleague. He could not consent that a resolution asking for information from the head of a Department should be supplanted by the appointment of an inquisitorial committee; founded, too, upon the assumption of guilt on the part of that officer. It would be prejudging the case, and no good could result from it. But Mr. D.'s resolution in no way embarrassed the proposition of his colleague, and the gentleman might continue to urge it as a distinct proposition, either before or after obtaining the required information. Mr. D. dwelt at length on the subject, and concluded by hoping the resolution he had submitted would be adopted; and that, as soon as practicable, they would act on the bill regulating the deposits of the public money in certain local banks; to do which the information called for by this resolution was essentially necessary.

Mr. PEYTON, rose merely to add a few words, by way of making himself perfectly understood by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. DROMGOOLE.) He would regret that the honorable gentleman should leave his seat under the impression that he had cast the slightest shade of imputation on his motives. Far, very far, from it, Mr. Speaker. Nothing could be more conclusive as to the confiding innocence with which the honorable gentleman has acted than the resolution which he has submitted on this subject, by which he, in effect, says to the Secretary of the Treasury, "If you have recorded your crimes, if you have enrolled your infamy, in the Departments, do send it to us, if you please." This is the extent of his inquiry; no more. Why, sir, the gentleman is not only honest himself, but thinks all other men equally honest; and I must think the gentleman considers them a little silly into the bargain, to expect confidently, as he surely does, that they would record any thing leading to their own crimination, or communicate it, from honor, if they had done so. To the same cause—the same unsuspecting simplicity of mind—must be attributed the fatal motions which he made with regard to the executive patronage bill, and that for the amendment of the constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President. Mr. Speaker, I am grieved thus to see an honest, credulous, confiding man, unversed in the ways of this wicked world, thrown into this House and this party, to be used, innocently and ignorantly used, for such purposes. But, sir, if any thing is wanting to establish the gentleman's claim to full and complete innocence in this whole transaction, it may be found in the fact that he attributed to me a disposition to throw obstacles in the way to the consideration of the bill regulating the deposits, when it is notorious that I offered a resolution fixing a day certain for the consideration of that bill. I have moved it—made a breakfast spell of it—every morning for six weeks! No, not every morning; about, upon an average, every other morning; as often as my modesty (for I have a great regard for modesty) would allow. Whereas the gentleman and his friends, "the party," have voted every morning against fixing any day; for, sir, I was willing that they should name the day for the consideration of the bill regulating the deposits. Yes, sir, these are the facts; and yet that gentleman honestly and innocently believes that I, and not he and his friends, have been endeavoring to thwart that measure. This is a case, a plain case, as much so as that of the Indian. His companion had been shot, climbing a tree, by a white man. They had an investigation of the matter, and the Indian asked the white man "why he shot his friend." "I took him for a bear," was the reply. Says the Indian, with a stern, inquiring look, "White man shoot an Indian up a tree, with red leggins on, for a bear?" "Yes." "Well, I'm done." I am done, sir.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day.

THURSDAY, April 21.

General Appropriation Bill.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Governments for the year 1836.

The question being on the final passage of the bill,

Mr. MERCER moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to reduce the appropriations for the custom-house at New York from $300,000 to $100,000, and providing that the total cost should not exceed $500,000; and, also, to add another section to the bill, enacting that, out of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands received in the years 1832, 1833, 1834, and 1835, there be appropriated the sum of $23,861,972, for the common use and benefit of the several States of the Union, to be apportioned among them according to their respective federal or representative numbers, and to be paid, in four equal quarterly instalments, to the treasurer or other proper officer of each State, respectively; the first instalment to be paid on the 1st of July next, and the others on the 1st of October, January, and April, following; with a provision that each of the seven new States should receive 10 per cent. in addition to their allotment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that he was as anxious as any gentleman to discuss this whole subject; but he hoped the appropriation bill would not be delayed by a debate on the subject which would occupy weeks, or perhaps months. He would suggest, however, that when the army bill came up, it would present an opportunity to bring up the whole subject.

Mr. MERCER inquired what possible connection had his proposition with appropriations for the army?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied by referring to the proposed appropriations for the public defences of the country, which would open the whole discussion on the surplus revenue. He would merely remark that there was every probability that in 1838, '39, and '40, the public revenue would not exceed two-thirds of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. FRENCH said that he was in favor of distributing among the States the nett proceeds of surplus money arising from the sales of the public lands. His constituents were intelligent and patriotic, and knew as well as he did that the Congress was under paramount obligations, first to apply to all national objects as much of the public money as the public interest and service required. That being done, the balance of the nett proceeds of the public lands remained to be disposed of by Congress. He held himself incapable of deceiving his constituents; and every pledge made should be, on his part, honestly redeemed. They would not expect, however, much less require of him, in the discharge of his duties here, to depart from the established usages of legislation, and jeopard the passage of the bill under consideration, by an amendment which, if added to the bill, might and probably would defeat it.

He could not concur with the honorable gentleman in incorporating in this bill the amendment proposed.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he could not say, as his friend from Kentucky (Mr. FRENCH) had said, that if this proposition were to come forward in a proper manner he would vote for it; for Mr. S. could not vote for it in any form, much less could he do so when it was attached to the civil list bill, which, if passed with such an amendment, as every gentleman knew, would jeopard its passage. Mr. S. said he looked upon the principle contained in the proposition as one of the most obnoxious ever presented to the American Congress; and, as it was a subject which had somewhat agitated the public mind in his State, he should, when it came up in due form, ask permission of the House to give his views on it. For the present he forbore, because he deemed it improper; and he therefore demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 88, noes 64.

The CHAIR remarked, that if the House ordered the main question to be put, it would be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MERCER. If the Chair so decide, I appeal from the decision. I contend that the main question will be on the commitment of the bill.

The CHAIR stated the question. The bill had been read the third time, and the question was on its passage. The gentleman from Virginia moved to recommit the bill with certain instructions. The previous question was moved and seconded; and there could be but one main question, and that would be on the passage of the bill. The previous question cut off all amendment, all debate. The only motions which could be entertained after the previous question was ordered, was to adjourn, or to lay on the table. The rule and the practice of the House were plain and explicit on this point.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays on the previous question; which were ordered, and were:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Bovey, Boyd, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Storer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams—76.

So the House determined that the main question be now put, which the CHAIR stated would be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MERCER then appealed from the decision of the Chair, and contended that the main question was on the commitment of the bill.

Mr. SPEIGHT made a few remarks in reply to Mr. MERCER, and in favor of the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MERCER then withdrew his appeal, stating that he was satisfied he was correct in his views on this subject.

The bill was then passed.

MONDAY, April 25.

Proceeds of the Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution of the Kentucky Legislature, in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, to refer the resolutions to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds aforesaid among the several States, for purposes of internal improvements and education.

Mr. HAWES addressed the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have departed from the subject of the resolutions, in order to answer other gentlemen; and I shall now say a few words in relation to them. The one proposition is to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States, for the purpose of education and internal improvement; and the other, which stands in opposition, is the project of the able and indefatigable representative from Illinois, (Mr. CASEY,) who is ever attentive to the trust reposed in him by his constituents, to graduate the price of the lands, and thus open a door to their actual settlement by the hardy yeomanry of the land. Believing, as I do, that the first proposition will prostrate the interests of the West, make that portion of the Union tributary and subservient to the Eastern and Southern States, and paralyze the arm of exertion and industry, without corresponding benefits, I am forced to vote against it. I am a Western man. I represent a portion of the people of that country, and (though there are no public lands in Kentucky) I cannot be instrumental in prostrating the interests of our sister States; to bind, manacle, sell, and deliver them over to the balance of the Union. Let the other States but once revel in the spoils wrested from the West, and where is the remedy in case we should wish to reduce the price of the public lands? Shall we act on the principles of the monarchies of Europe, keep large forests and hunting-grounds, to be the abode of beasts of prey? or shall we, for a small consideration, open them to the actual occupation of the honest farmer and his family?

This is the true question to be decided; and, for myself, I would prefer to see the land occupied by a prosperous and industrious population, surrounded by peace, plenty, and happiness, with the glorious privilege to say this is my own, and no one can wrest it from me, than draw from them and their little ones their hard-earned dollars, to be lavished in wild and reckless profusion among the States of this confederacy. The people should never be taxed to a greater amount than is actually necessary for an economical Government; and whenever the receipts exceed the expenditures, the burdens ought to be removed to that extent. I will not, by any vote of mine, ask the people to look up to the General Government as superior to themselves; or, in other words, I will not recognize the claim of the Government to collect more from the people than is actually necessary for authorized and constitutional purposes. I cannot recognize the right of Congress to say to the States what they shall and what they shall not do with the dividends. They shall not say to us—do this, and do that; spend this amount in internal improvement, and that in education. Sir, this education is another scheme of the aristocracy to appropriate the whole to their own benefit. The schools will be established in the towns alone, and no provision made for the country; and hence the great body of the people will receive no benefit, while the wealthiest portion of the community reap the whole. I need dwell no longer on this subject, for the weakest mind can discover its operation at the first glance, and that operation will be to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer; to throw abundance into the lap of wealth, and take away the hard-earned and scanty subsistence of poverty; the amount of all which is, that the many become dependent on the few, and thus destroys equality of rights and privileges, and drives liberty from our happy and prosperous land. Mr. Speaker, here is the last foothold and resting-place of liberty in this world; it is the only land where men enjoy rights and privileges on equality; it is the home of the oppressed of all nations, climes, and countries; and, for myself, I will not aid in the subversion of this glorious fabric, so nobly sustained by our ancestors, and so generously handed down to us for preservation.

FRIDAY, April 29.

The HON. THOMAS T. WHITTLESEY, of Connecticut, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. ZALMON WILDMAN, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, May 3.

Death of Mr. Richard J. Manning.

MR. PINCKNEY rose and addressed the House to the following effect:

Mr. Speaker: Often as Death has already been amongst us this session, he has again entered within these walls, and taken another, and one of the most excellent members of this honorable body. Yes, sir, Death has again been amongst us; and it is in consequence of one of those sudden and awful dispensations of Divine Providence, to which, however painfully we may feel them, it is our duty to submit, that I now rise to announce to this House the decease of my late honored and lamented colleague, RICHARD J. MANNING. He left this city on Friday last, on a visit to Philadelphia, and died, as I am informed, at that place, on Sunday evening, of a hemorrhage, produced by the rupture of a blood vessel in his lungs. Surely, if ever there was an event which could teach us "what poor shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue," this is one which should impress that lesson deeply on our minds. But a few days ago he was here, in his place upon this floor, in the pride of intellect and vigor of manhood, mingling freely with his fellow-members, partaking the cares and honors of legislation, and discharging the high duties of a representative of the people in the councils of the nation. Now he is numbered with the silent dead. I know that it is customary, upon occasions of this kind, to deliver eulogies upon the characters of departed members. But I shall make no such attempt upon the present occasion. I could not do justice to such a character as his. To say that he was a man of sound judgment and extensive information—a gentleman, in the strictest signification of the term—a man of sterling honor and integrity—a devoted husband and most tender parent—pure and irreproachable in all the relations of life—all this is true, perfectly true, and yet it conveys but a poor idea of the beautiful cluster of noble and estimable qualities that were concentrated in him. He was more than all this. He was, emphatically, a patriot, who discharged all his duties to his country with ardor and fidelity; and he was a sincere and consistent Christian, who adorned the doctrine of his Lord and Saviour. He died, like a patriot, in the service of his country; and his life as a Christian assures me that he is now reposing in the bosom of his God.

As an evidence of the high estimation in which he was held by the people of his native State, it will suffice to observe that he was repeatedly elected to the Legislature of South Carolina, once unanimously chosen Governor of that State, and twice elevated to a seat in Congress. In times of the bitterest party contention in South Carolina, he retained the unqualified respect of his political opponents, nor do I believe he had a personal enemy. But all his talents, all his virtues, all his noble qualities of head and heart, could not save him from the grasp of the destroyer. He is gone—gone from me, whom he honored with his friendship—gone from this House, which he adorned by his virtues. His place here will know him no more. He cannot listen to the poor tribute I throw upon his tomb. He cannot witness the deep and respectful sympathy manifested by this honorable body. No, sir, he is gone; and all that we can do is, to lament his loss, and imitate his virtues, and pay to his memory the unavailable honors of the dead.

I now beg leave to offer the following resolutions for adoption by the House:

1. Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with deep regret the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. RICHARD J. MANNING, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

2. Resolved, unanimously, That this House tender the expression of their sympathy to the relatives of the deceased, upon this mournful event; and, in testimony of regret for his loss and respect for his memory, the members will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted,

Mr. PINCKNEY moved that a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body of the death of the Hon. RICHARD J. MANNING.

The SPEAKER said that such a message would be sent to the Senate as a matter of course.

On motion of Mr. PINCKNEY,
The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 6.

Relief of the District of Columbia.

The House proceeded, in further execution of the special order of the 1st of April, to the consideration of the "bill for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia."

The amendments agreed to in the Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The question was taken on ordering the amendments of the House to the Senate's bill to be engrossed, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 71.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

TUESDAY, May 10.

Message from the President—United States and France—Payment of the delayed Instalments.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Information has been received at the Treasury Department, that the four instalments under our treaty with France have been paid to the agent of the United States. In communicating this satisfactory termination of our controversy with France, I feel assured that both Houses of Congress will unite with me in desiring and believing that the anticipations of a restoration of the ancient cordial relations between the two countries, expressed in my former messages on this subject, will be speedily realized. No proper exertion of mine shall be wanting to efface the remembrance of those misconceptions that have temporarily interrupted the accustomed intercourse between them.

ANDREW JACKSON.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, May 16.

Relief of the District of Columbia.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD hoped the House would take up and consider the amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of the several corporate cities of the District of Columbia.

Objection being made, Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of taking up said bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD moved that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

[The Senate's amendment provided that the stock of the corporations should be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, as a pledge of the assumption by the Government of the Holland loan; and that officer is authorized, at any time deemed most favorable within ten years, to sell the same, and reimburse the United States for the amount advanced; and if the stock thus sold should yield more than sufficient to pay the debt to the Government, that the excess shall be paid over to the several corporations of the District.]

Mr. WISE said: In order to test the sense of the House, he moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered and were—yeas 75, nays 106.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table, and the amendment was subsequently concurred in.

TUESDAY, May 17.

Mexican Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any overture made since the 3d of March, 1829, by his authority, to the Government of the United Mexican States, for the acquisition by the United States of any portion of the territories of Mexico; and copies of all correspondence between the two Governments relating thereto, and upon any question of boundary existing between the United States and Mexico.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy and translations of any law, decree, or ordinance of the Mexican republic, abolishing slavery within the territories thereof, which may be in the possession of the executive department of the United States.

WEDNESDAY, May 18.

Abolition Petitions—Report of the Select Committee, Mr. Pinckney the Chairman.

Mr. PINCKNEY, on leave, presented a report from the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery. Upon making this report, Mr. P. remarked that it had received the unanimous assent of the committee, and he trusted it would meet the unanimous approbation of the House. By their instruction of the committee, he moved that it be read and printed.

Mr. MERCER moved that the report be laid on the table, without reading, and printed.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, asked for the reading of the report; which was accordingly done.

The reading occupied about an hour and a half. The report concluded with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy.

Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia.

And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatsoever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. PINCKNEY was instructed to move that 5,000 extra copies of the report be printed.

*Mr. WISE said that this report had at length come; he never expected it would have come; and it was precisely such a document as he anticipated; and his protest, for one, went much further than that of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN.) He saw every thing in it to arouse the feelings against it even more than against the abolition memorials themselves. If Southern men adopted this report to sustain their principles, they would be much mistaken. There was not one ground in the whole report, long as it was, for Southern men to rest a foot upon. But he had been most disappointed in this report, because its author had not kept his faith with Mr. W. There had been an express pledge given to him, that the ground would be taken in the report, that Congress had not the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He repeated that this pledge had been distinctly made to him, that no report should be made, unless that ground should be taken; and he saw no such ground taken in the report. The whole amount of what was contained in the report was, that it was not expedient now to abolish slavery in the District. Mr. W. said there were petitions and resolutions laid before the committee, of which no notice had been taken; and the committee had only announced, in relation to the States, what every one knew, that these States had declared that Congress had no power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He did not consider the report as a defence of Southern interest, nor as an expression of Southern feeling.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, would not allow one moment to pass without his unmeasured denunciation of the report just read. He felt called upon to do so, that it should not go to the world with the authority of the name (not of the individual who had presented it, but) of the State from which he came. He had listened in vain for one South Carolina argument, or one honest bursting out of the feelings of a South Carolinian; not of a South Carolinian from geography only, but one who has a head to see the dangers that await us, and a heart that does not shrink from meeting them. Instead of a cool, firm, and fixed purpose to stand upon the rights, the chartered rights, of the South, what have we? An abandonment of those rights; stale homilies about union and fanaticism; puerile rhetoric, and jesuitical sophistry. When the report squints even at the constitutional argument, it shrinks back from declaring it unconstitutional, and mollifies with the phrase "violation of the public faith." Why not speak out? The chairman of that committee assured me and my friend from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) and others who were known to stand on the third parallel on this question, that he would not report at all unless with the distinct assertion of the principle that Congress had no constitutional power to legislate upon slavery in this District. And how has this pledge been redeemed? Puling declaration of "violation of public faith." Mr. T. desired to hear less of the public faith from one so regardless of private faith. Mr. T. would not, if he could fairly avoid it, send the report to the printer; he would rather commit it to the flames or to the hangman.

Mr. OWENS said the document must speak for itself. It was the intention of the committee to have the document printed, so that it might be fairly understood, and might be a subject of deliberation hereafter; but no one had anticipated a debate on it at this stage. Mr. O. concluded by moving to print thirty thousand extra copies of the report.

Mr. HAWES was convinced, from the arguments of gentlemen, that this report ought to be printed. No sooner was this very long report read, in the preparation of which the committee had been engaged weeks upon weeks, than one gentleman from the South rose in his place and said he could not vote for it, because it contained such and such matters. Another from the South rose and said that he would go for printing the document, because he considered it as going to allay the excitement at the South; and this difference of opinion he considered as the strongest reason why the document should be printed. His constituents would not permit him to form an opinion for them in this matter; they would require the report itself to be submitted to them; and he thought the gentleman from Virginia had gone rather far in speaking for his constituents.

Mr. PATTON wished to state his reasons for voting to print this document. He should not only vote to print the usual number, but he would vote to print any reasonable extra number. The report was presented to him as the result of the labors of a committee which had been raised to take into consideration a most interesting and exciting subject. He had not concurred with the House in the course it thought proper to pursue on this subject, because he was not of opinion that it was the most prudent and judicious course, and he had not changed in opinion. He was perfectly satisfied that the expectations of gentlemen would be frustrated and disappointed. Notwithstanding this, he would be in favor of having the report take the usual course.

Mr. ROBERTSON contended that the report yielded to Congress the right to abolish slavery in this District, and yielded every thing which the abolitionists could have expected when they sent their petitions there. He had heard the report read, he would not say with surprise, but with deep mortification and regret; because it was not calculated to put the South upon the ground which she ought to occupy; and the resolutions did not go to the extent absolutely necessary to the peace and safety of the country. Mr. R. contended that the printing of a document was left to the discretion of the House, and he thought in the present instance they should not print. Mr. R. concluded by moving to recommit the report to the select committee, with instructions to report a resolution that Congress does not possess the constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, did not rise to discuss the question. It had already been too much discussed. He moved the previous question.

Mr. PINCKNEY hoped the gentleman would withdraw the motion for a moment. He desired merely to say that the report did not, as had been stated, yield the constitutional power to Congress of abolishing slavery in the District. All assertions of the kind were grossly incorrect. The debate was here arrested by the expiration of the time for which the rule had been suspended.

THURSDAY, May 19.

Mr. Pinckney's Report on Abolition Petitions.

The House resumed, as the unfinished business of yesterday, the consideration of the report and resolutions from the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

The question being on the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to recommit the report, with instructions to report a resolution declaring that Congress has no constitutional power to interfere with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia—

Mr. BYNUM, who was entitled to the floor, spoke at considerable length. He observed that it had been said by certain gentlemen that they were disappointed in the report; that it was just such a report as had been anticipated by them. In reply to that, Mr. B. said that the opposition to this report was just such identical opposition as he had anticipated. He was prepared to expect that the report would not meet the approbation of certain gentlemen in that House, and he was not at all surprised at this opposition. It was surprising that gentlemen were prepared, as by intuition, to condemn a report of immense length; and that these gentlemen perfectly understood the report without having it printed for examination. If, however, the statements of gentlemen who had opposed the printing of the report were to be taken as good for any thing, it was the strongest evidence that the report should be printed for the consideration of that body and of the nation. It was due to the honorable chairman of the committee who had made that report, that it should be printed, because his motives and his reasons had been denounced on that floor, and this document should be printed as his defence. He ought to have it laid before the people, who were to judge him. It would be an act of injustice of the most crying kind to refuse to print this document; that gentleman had a right to be heard before that House and before the country.

Mr. B. was not prepared to say that he would sanction every sentiment and every principle laid down in this report; but he was prepared to say that he would look into it, and give it his impartial consideration, and he felt himself free to act after reading it. But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ROBERTSON) had stated that the report surrendered every thing to the abolitionists. It was a mistake. Neither the House nor the report, so far as met his observation, surrendered every thing to the abolitionists. The very object which the abolitionists contended for had been met by the House, and refused them. Attempts had been made to cast imputations on the party with whom he acted in relation to this subject; and, if it was not out of order, he would call upon the chairman of the committee who had made this report, to say what party had generally introduced these abolition memorials, and what number of those that belonged to the party with which he acted had signed them.

Mr. PINCKNEY, in reply to this call upon him, declined giving an explanation. He could not do so, consistently with a sense of propriety, upon the call of an individual member. If the House required it, he would state all that he knew respecting the memorials, but not otherwise. He had examined them very carefully, and had made a schedule of the places and States they came from, and of the aggregate number of memorials and signatures. He had nothing to do with party, in reference to slavery, and therefore would not say any thing that might have the remotest tendency to excite any party feeling on the subject. It was not amiss, however, he thought, to state that the whole number of memorials presented to Congress this session amounted to one hundred and seventy-six; that they came from ten States, embracing an aggregate population of nearly eight millions; that the whole number of signatures was about thirty-four thousand; and that, of those, more than two-fifths were females. He thought these facts ought to be known. The people of the South ought to know every thing respecting these memorials. They could see the immense disproportion between the millions of freemen who are determined to maintain their constitutional obligations to their Southern brethren, and the band of incendiary agitators who would trample on all laws, human and divine, in the relentless prosecution of their diabolical designs. He believed that there never was a healthier tone of sentiment in the non-slaveholding States, in reference to the domestic institutions of the South, than at this moment. There was, unquestionably, abundant reason for vigilance and caution in relation to the fanatics; but there was also abundant reason to rely on the enlightened patriotism of the non-slaveholding States. There are great moral causes at work in favor of the South. We should trust their efficacy, and watch their progress. The people of the non-slaveholding States are alive to the dangers connected with this question, and they are generously fighting the battle of the South. They should be encouraged by confidence and gratitude; not repelled by vituperation and suspicion. Mr. P. said he deeply regretted that inflammatory discussion had again arisen upon this matter. He should do nothing to continue it. He had always deprecated the agitation of slavery in the halls of Congress. He hoped the subject would soon be disposed of, and that peace might be restored to the South and to the country. While he was up, however, with the permission of the House, he would inquire of the honorable member from Virginia whether it was his desire to press his amendment to a vote.

[Mr. ROBERTSON replied, unquestionably it was.]

Mr. PINCKNEY then said, if that was his object, and a vote should be taken, he should certainly vote for the amendment. Mr. P. held, and always had held, that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He thought it susceptible of demonstration. It had been his opinion, long before it was ever talked of by many who now ride upon it as a hobby. The gentleman had said that the report gave up the constitutional question. It does no such thing. It asserts distinctly the contrary, considering Congress as the National Legislature of the Union. As regards its power as a local Legislature, no opinion is expressed. Congress remains uncommitted upon that point. No decision has ever been made upon it by either House; and why should a decision be called for now? What would be thought of any Southern man who should move the resolution declaring that Congress does not possess power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Now, he had no doubt, that if the House were pressed to vote upon a resolution denying such power, it would be rejected, and most probably by a large majority. He did not know the fact, of course, as no man can know any thing that has not actually taken place. But it was his decided conviction that such would be the result. The South would be beaten, as it had been in the Senate on the question of reception. One defeat was enough. He did not desire another. That was the reason he had avoided pressing the House upon the abstract questions of the right of petition, and the actual authority of Congress over slavery in the District.

As matters now stand, every thing is operating favorably to the South. The Senate, by a large majority, has rejected the prayer of the abolition memorials. This House has adopted resolutions pledging the national faith not to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia. The tone of public sentiment is sound and patriotic in all the non-slaveholding States. The South, so far, is victorious, and every thing goes well for her advantage and security! Why, then, press this abstract question now? Why force a battle upon a ground no way necessary to the safety of the South, and with a moral certainty of being driven from it? Is it for the purpose of party agitation? Is it for the purpose of exciting the South, with no shadow of necessity for such excitement? He could not believe it. What then? The gentleman says a pledge of the public faith signifies nothing. Indeed! What, then, would a resolution of disclaimer signify? If the House can rescind the one, so it can rescind the other. But the House would be much more likely to rescind a mere disclaimer of authority, which is nothing more than an expression of opinion upon an abstract point, than it would be to violate a solemn pledge of the national faith, which it could not do without shocking the moral sense of every well-regulated mind, and degrading itself in the estimation of the whole civilized world by the palpable commission of an act of perfidy. Mr. P. said he had no fear of any such atrocity. He considered the question settled. The Government had made a solemn covenant upon this subject with the slaveholding States; Congress might violate the constitution; it could not, would not, violate the public faith. It was bound hand and foot. The South had nothing now to fear, except from those who are determined to continue the agitation of slavery for the purpose of excitement. Abolitionism has attained its height. It has begun to go down, and will soon disappear entirely, if we do not fan the flame ourselves, and will only allow our friends in the non-slaveholding States to fight the fanatics in their own way, and not trammel them in their operations by mixing up extraneous and unnecessary questions with the subject of abolition.

Mr. ROBERTSON rose in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, and in support of his motion.

The morning hour having expired, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, and by general consent, the usual number of the report made by Mr. PINCKNEY, on the subject of abolition, was ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, May 25.

Mr. Pinckney's Report on Abolition Petitions.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of Mr. PINCKNEY, from the committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery.

The question was the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to report a resolution declaring that Congress has not the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBERTSON continued his argument at great length in support of his motion and the propositions he had laid down, and when he concluded,

Mr. OWENS expressed an opinion that the discussion ought not to be continued, and moved the previous question.

Mr. PATTON rose to appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his motion.

Mr. OWENS repeated that he would not withdraw it.

Mr. PATTON hoped he would not denounce every man who should not vote for his motion.

The question was then taken, and the motion for the previous question was seconded by the House—yeas 95, nays 82.

Mr. WISE then demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question, and they were ordered.

MESSRS. WISE and EVERETT simultaneously moved a call of the House.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on the call; which were ordered, and, being taken, stood—yeas 97, nays 108.

Mr. STORER moved to lay the subject on the table; and that motion was negatived without a division.

The question "Shall the main question be now put?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 89.

So it was determined that the main question be now put; and the Speaker decided that the main question was upon agreeing to the above resolutions.

Mr. HEISTER called for a division of the question, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The first resolution was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy."

Mr. ADAMS said, if the House would allow him five minutes' time, he pledged himself to prove that resolution false and utterly untrue.

He was here called to order in different parts of the House, and resumed his seat.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the first resolution, as follows:

THURSDAY, May 26.

Mr. Pinckney's Report on Abolition Petitions.

In answer to inquiries, as to what would become of the votes of those gentlemen who had asked to be excused, if they should hereafter be required to vote, the CHAIR said that the failure of gentlemen to vote could not arrest the decision of the House.

The first resolution was then declared to have been adopted—yeas 182, nays 9.

The second resolution was read, as follows :

"Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia."

The House proceeded to vote by yeas and nays upon the adoption of this resolution.

When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, he asked to be excused from voting.

The CHAIR said the gentleman's name would be passed for the present.

Mr. GRANGER, also, when his name was called, rose, and commenced reading from a manuscript to this effect :

"I decline voting on the second resolution reported by Mr. PINCKNEY, from the select committee"—Mr. G. was here called to order.

Mr. G. continued. "I do not ask to be excused, because"—Mr. G. was again loudly called to order in every part of the House.

The CHAIR said it was not in order for the gentleman to make an argument pending the vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. GRANGER then yielded the floor.

Mr. WISE declined voting, for reasons which he sent to the Chair, but which were not read.

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. COFFER asked the permission of the House to record his vote. He had risen from a sick bed, contrary to the advice of his friends and physician, for the purpose of voting on these resolutions. He had been in an adjoining room, and the officers of the House had neglected to comply with his request to be notified when the vote was taken. It was under these peculiar circumstances that he had made the request.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, objected.

The second resolution was then declared to be adopted—yeas 182, nays 45 ; as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. C. Allan, Anthony, Ash, Barton Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Booke, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Jones, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Joshua Lee, Lincoln, Samson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Morris, Parker, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Sprague, Vinton, Whittlesey—45.

The preamble and third resolution were then read, as follows :

"And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz :

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to lay the preamble and third resolution on the table. Negative—yeas 69, nays 118.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the preamble and third resolution.

When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, that gentleman rose and said : I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, the rules of this House, and the rights of my constituents. Mr. A. resumed his seat amid loud cries of "order," from all parts of the hall.

The third resolution was then agreed to—yeas 117, nays 68, as follows :

WEDNESDAY, June 8.

Michigan and Arkansas—Admission into the Union.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following bills:

“An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed.”

“An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes.”

The first bill having been read,

Mr. WISE moved to postpone its further consideration till Monday, in order to proceed with the Arkansas bill.

Mr. THOMAS would call the attention of the House to the position of the two bills on the Speaker's table, and endeavor to show that this postponement is entirely unnecessary. These bills are from the Senate. By the rules of this House, two, I may say three, questions will arise, to be decided before they can become a law, so far as this House is concerned. We must first order each of these bills to be read a third time; the next question then will be,

When shall the bill be read a third time? and the last question to be decided will be, Shall the bill pass? Why, then, should Southern men now make an effort to give precedence to the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union? If they manifest distrust, must we not expect that fears will be entertained by Northern members, that unreasonable opposition will be made to the admission of Michigan? Let us proceed harmoniously, until we find that our harmony must be interrupted. We shall lose nothing by so doing. If a majority of the House be in favor of reading a third time the Michigan bill, they will order it to be done. After that vote has been taken, we can refuse to read the bill a third time, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then consider the Arkansas bill, report it to the House, order it to be read a third time; and in this order proceed to read them each a third time, if a majority of the House be in favor of that proceeding.

Let it not be said that Southern men may be taken by surprise, if the proceeding here respectfully recommended be adopted. If the friends of Arkansas are sufficiently numerous to carry now the motion to postpone, they can arrest at any time the action of the House on the Michigan bill, until clear indubitable indications have been given that the Missouri compromise is not to be disregarded.

Mr. WISE advocated the motion to postpone the Michigan bill, and the debate was continued by MESSRS. CUSHING, PATTON, SUTHERLAND, BOULDIN, LEWIS, SPEIGHT, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, SEVIER, MANN of New York, HARDIN, and VANDERPOEL.

Mr. ADAMS stated that when the Arkansas bill came into the House, if no one else moved the subject of the restriction of slavery, he should.

Mr. WISE modified his motion by moving to refer both bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to that committee to incorporate the two bills into one bill.

The debate was continued by Messrs. VINTON, MERCEER, THOMAS, and BRIGGS.

Mr. PATTON inquired the opinion of the Chair as to the necessity of committing these bills.

The CHAIR replied that the bill for the admission of Arkansas, as it contained an appropriation for the judges, would, under the rules, require being committed; and that the bill for the admission of Michigan, although it contained no express appropriation, created a charge upon the Treasury, and came, though not clearly, within the spirit of the rule. The Chair read a former decision on the point, made in 1832.

After remarks from Messrs. SPEIGHT, VANDERPOEL, REED, MANN of New York, BRIGGS, and BOON,

The CHAIR decided that the Arkansas bill required to be committed; and, if that bill required to be committed, so did the other.

Mr. THOMAS said a few words in explanation, and renewed the motion (as requested) that the committee rise; which prevailed—yeas 74, nays 54.

The committee accordingly rose and reported.

THURSDAY, June 9.

Michigan and Arkansas—Admission into the Union.

The House, in further execution of the special order, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPEIGHT in the Chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the Union.

Mr. ADAMS said that he wanted to offer an amendment, which he had not had time to prepare, and he wished a further opportunity. His desire was to admit the State of Michigan by a bill for that purpose alone, separated from all questions of boundary. He believed the people of Michigan had a right to admission, but he wanted the question of disputed boundary to be left for future adjustment.

Mr. THOMAS suggested that it would be better to let the bill be reported, and offer it in the House.

Mr. ADAMS said he would if the screws would not be applied.

Mr. THOMAS said he could make no pledges for the House; but it could make no difference to the question.

Mr. ADAMS said it would make a difference; for in committee he could argue the propriety of the amendment, without being cut off by the previous question. He moved that the committee rise.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to amend the bill, so as to provide that none but free white male citizens should be voters.

The question being taken on Mr. RUSSELL's proposed amendment; it was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside, and the bill for the admission of Arkansas was taken up.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the bill by introducing a clause "that nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to the article in the constitution of the said State in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves."

This motion was debated by Messrs. ADAMS, CUSHING, HARD, BRIGGS, and WISE.

The question was taken at about 4 o'clock in the morning, and the amendment negatived by a vote of 98 to 32.

The Arkansas bill was laid aside, and the committee took up the "supplementary bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union, and for other purposes."

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, renewed the motion that the committee rise, and report the bills to the House. [This was about 7 o'clock.]

Mr. WISE then rose and addressed the House at length in opposition to the course of the majority, in pressing this question upon a House, sleepy, tired, and drunk. He was opposed to the motion that the committee report the bills, and said he would speak till ten o'clock, when the House would be under the necessity of dropping the subject, as it was not a special order for Friday.

Mr. WISE continued the thread of his remarks upon the bill, and having concluded,

Mr. McKENNA obtained the floor. The members of the House were, he said, evidently all worn out by this protracted sitting; many had not slept, and others had not broken their fast. All had need of repose. We have, said he, fought the bill manfully, and done our best to stave off the decision upon it. My friend from Virginia (especially) has fought it hard and long, and has, in fact, verified the old adage, "a lean dog for a long chase." I hope, sir, the committee will rise, and report the bills, and that we shall adjourn over till to-morrow.

Mr. McK. made a motion to this effect.

The motion was carried. The committee rose, and reported the two bills, and the House then adjourned over to meet on Saturday, at the usual hour, (10 o'clock.)

MONDAY, June 13.

Michigan and Arkansas—Admission into the Union.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following bills:

"An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed."

"An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

The House proceeded first to the consideration of the Michigan bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN said that, believing the previous question to be one of the most salutary rules of the House, and believing this to be a fit occasion for its application, he now moved it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was put on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 153, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. So the bill was ordered to a third reading this day.

Arkansas.

The House then took up the bill providing for the admission of Arkansas into the Union.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed the amendment submitted by him in Committee of the Whole, in relation to the restriction of slavery in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered, and were—yeas 126, nays 67.

So the House determined that the main question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, should then be put.

Mr. HEISTER asked for the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 147, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Underwood, Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams—52.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading this day.

The Michigan bill was then read a third time.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that a test vote had already been taken upon this bill, and the expression in its favor was so strong that no gentleman could doubt its passage. Under a firm belief that the further consumption of time would not change a vote, or alter the result, he moved the previous question.

So the bill was passed.

The Arkansas bill was then taken up and read a third time.

Mr. HUNTSMAN moved the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 95, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered,

Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were—yeas 143, nays 50.

Mr. CONNOR said, as the House had been delivered of twins, he thought after the operation they might adjourn; and he made that motion; and,

The House adjourned.

[The following supplementary report of the debates and proceedings on the admission of Arkansas, prepared by Mr. Adams, is here given, in order to give completeness to the history of that proceeding.]

June 13th & 14th, 1836.

Admission of Arkansas—Supplementary Report.

On Thursday, the 9th of June, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon two bills; one to fix the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and for the conditional admission of the State of Michigan into the Union and the other for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union.

The bill for fixing the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and the conditional admission of Michigan into the Union, was first taken up for consideration, and gave rise to debates which continued till near one o'clock of the morning of Friday, the 10th of June: repeated motions to adjourn had been made and rejected. The committee had twice found itself without a quorum, and had been thereby compelled to rise, and report the fact to the House. In the first instance, there had been found within private calling distance a sufficient number of members, who, though absent from their duty of attendance upon the House, were upon the alert to appear and answer to their names to make a quorum to vote against adjourning, and to retire again to their amusement or repose. Upon the first restoration of the quorum by this operation, the delegate from Arkansas said that if the committee would only take up and read the bill, he would not urge any discussion upon it then, and would consent to the committee's rising, and resuming the subject at the next sitting of the House. The bill was accordingly read; a motion was then made for the committee to rise, and rejected; an amendment to the bill was moved, on taking the question upon which there was no quorum. The usual expedient of private call to straggling members was found ineffectual. A call of the House was ordered, at one o'clock in the morning. This operation, to be carried through all its stages, must necessarily consume about three hours of time, during which the House can do no other business. Upon this call, after the names of all the members had been twice called over, and all the absentees for whom any valid or plausible excuse was offered had been excused, there remained eighty-one names of members, who, by the rules of the House, were to be taken into custody as they should appear, or were to be sent for, and taken into custody wherever they might be found, by special messengers appointed for that purpose. At this hour of the night the city of Washington was ransacked by these special messengers, and the members of the House were summoned from their beds to be brought in custody of these special messengers, before the House, to answer for their absence. After hearing the excuses of two of these members, and the acknowledged no good reason of a third, they were all excused in a mass, without payment of fees; which fees, to the amount of two or three hundred dollars, have of course become a charge upon the people, and to be paid with their money.

By this operation, between four and five o'clock of the morning, a small quorum of the House was obtained, and, without any vote of the House, the Speaker left the chair, which was resumed by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union was again taken up; the amendment moved before the call of the House was renewed, discussed, and rejected; other amendments were proposed, and shared the same fate.

About six o'clock in the morning a motion was made that the committee should rise, and report the bills, when Mr. ADAMS moved an amendment to the eighth section of the bill for the admission of Arkansas; to understand the import and bearing of which it may be necessary to quote the part of the section into which he proposed its insertion. In the following citation, the words proposed by him for insertion are those enclosed in brackets.

"SEC. 8. And it is further enacted, That the State of Arkansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of the said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within the said State, nor shall they levy a tax on any of the lands of the United States within the said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress [to the article in the constitution of the said State in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves, or] to all and any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the said convention of the people of Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of Arkansas of the same grants, subject to the same restrictions, which were made to the State of Missouri, by virtue of an act entitled an act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories, approved the 6th day of March, 1820."

When the amendment had been read by the Clerk, and the question stated, Mr. ADAMS addressed the chairman of the committee to the following effect:

Mr. Chairman: On Monday last I had the honor of presenting to this House twenty-two memorials and remonstrances, most of them numerous signed, by citizens of the States of Ohio, of Pennsylvania, and of Massachusetts. Twelve of these memorials were from the congressional district which I represent, from my own constituents, male and female; for, in New England and elsewhere, the vote of the men is the vote of the women; and I consider the wives and daughters of the men who vote at my election, whether for me or for any other person, as much my constituents, for all purposes by which I can, as their representative, serve them in this House, as if every individual had deposited in the ballot-box a vote in my favor.

I was, then, bound in duty to present these memorials and remonstrances to the House; and if that duty was of perfect and irremissible obligation, with regard to those which came from my own immediate constituents, I felt it as not less imperative with regard to those which, proceeding from remoter distances, and from persons entirely unknown to me, carried with them a manifestation of confidence reposed in me by the memorialists, which it was not less my sacred duty to justify by a grateful return.

Admission of Arkansas—Supplementary Report.

I felt it, therefore, my further duty to invite the House to listen to these memorials and remonstrances, to examine their complaints, and, so far as might be consistent with the duties of the House to their other constituents and to the nation, to relieve the complainants, and to remove the grievances against which they remonstrated.

In the memorials from my own district I recognized among the signatures the names of persons well known to me as citizens, for intelligence, integrity, and benevolence, surpassed by none others in this Union. I had made inquiries concerning the characters of others of the memorialists, not known to myself, and had received testimonials from sources entitled to unqualified credence, and from persons in no wise favoring the purposes of the memorialists; testimonials to their integrity and respectability which could leave in that respect not the shadow of a doubt upon my mind.

The memorials and remonstrances, differing somewhat from one another in their language and phraseology, all complained of one article in the newly-formed constitution of Arkansas; and all the remonstrances were against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State.

The obnoxious article of the constitution of Arkansas is the first section of the second division of the ninth article, and is in the words following:

"Emancipation of slaves.

"SEC. 1. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States. They shall have power to pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge. They shall have power to prevent slaves from being brought to this State as merchandise, and also to oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity."

Mr. Chairman, I cannot, consistently with my sense of my obligations as a citizen of the United States, and bound by oath to support their constitution, I cannot object to the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State; I cannot propose or agree to make it a condition of her admission, that a convention of her people shall expunge this article from her constitution. She is entitled to admission as a slave State, as Louisiana, and Mississippi, and Alabama, and Missouri, have been admitted, by virtue of that article in the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, which secures to the inhabitants of the ceded territories all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the original citizens of the United States, and stipulates for their admission, conformably to that principle, into the Union. Louisiana was purchased as a country wherein slavery was the established law of the land. As Congress have not power in time of peace to abolish slavery in the original States of the Union, they are equally destitute of the power in those parts of the territories ceded by France to the United States by the name of Louisiana, where slavery existed at the time of the acquisition. Slavery is in this Union the subject of internal legislation in the States, and in peace is cognizable by Congress only, as it is tacitly tolerated and protected where it exists by the Constitution of the United States, and as it mingles in their intercourse with other nations. Arkansas, therefore, comes, and has the right to come, into the Union with her slaves and her slave laws. It is written in the bond, and, however I may lament that it ever was so written, I must faithfully perform its obligations.

I could not, therefore, propose or support the specific measure desired by the memorialists, which was to impose a restriction upon the people of the State of Arkansas, by requiring of them, as a condition of their admission into the Union, that they should expunge from their constitution the article concerning slavery. I do not think it within the legitimate powers of Congress, under the present existing circumstances, to impose upon the State of Arkansas any restriction whatever, with relation to slavery, in the formation of her constitution. Upon the same principle, I had been opposed to the proposal of restriction upon the State of Missouri, at the time of the first Missouri question; for there were two Missouri questions, differing much from each other, and which were debated at two successive sessions of Congress. The second was that finally adjusted by the compromise. The first was that in which the restriction was proposed, and my opinion had at the time been freely expressed against it.

But then I disapproved, as I now disapprove, of slavery as a civil institution. As a citizen, and as a man, therefore, I disapprove of that article in the constitution of Arkansas, the object of which is to perpetuate slavery. In voting for the acceptance of that constitution, and for the admission of the State into the Union, I do not hold myself bound to approve of all its internal regulations; but doctrines have been recently broached, and are now countenanced by the transfer of the lawful possessions of Michigan to the State of Ohio, which make it, in my judgment, proper, and perhaps necessary, that Congress, the representatives of that federation, compounded partly of slaveholding and partly of entirely free States, should disclaim all approbation of, or assent to, that article in the constitution of Arkansas. I propose no restriction upon her. I am content to receive her as one of the slaveholding States of this Union; but I am unwilling that Congress, in accepting her constitution, should even lie under the imputation of assenting to an article in the constitution of a State which withholds from its Legislature the power of giving freedom to the slave.

In this very section of the bill now before the committee, Congress refuse their assent to propositions, made by the convention of the people of Arkansas which formed their constitution, and were transmitted with it. My proposed amendment, very short and simple, is in perfect accordance and keeping with the remainder of the section, as it stands in the bill now before the committee; and although I cannot flatter myself that it will be satisfactory to those of my constituents and fellow-citizens who have thought proper to commit their memorials and remonstrances to me, it will at least secure to me the consciousness of having discharged my duty to them, to my country, and to that reverence for the rights of mankind, which rejects, without reserve, the principle that, by the law of nature or of God, man can be the property of man.

Upon this topic I will not enlarge. Were I disposed so to do, twenty hours of continuous session have too much exhausted my own physical strength, and the faculties, as well as the indulgence of those who might incline to hear me, for me to trespass longer upon their patience. When the bill shall be reported to the House, I may, perhaps, again ask to be heard, upon renewing there, as I intend, the motion for this amendment.

[Mr. ADAMS resumed his seat, and Mr. WISE addressed the committee. The debate was continued by Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. CUSHING, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. HARD of New York, and by Mr. WISE, in reply, particularly, to Mr. CUSHING. There was great disorder and confusion in the hall, occasioned chiefly by calls for order and vociferations of the word "question." Personal reflections passed between some of the members, and an affair of honor afterwards followed between two Southern gentlemen, which was, however, finally adjusted without bloodshed. The chairman of the committee, with great and indefatigable exertions, succeeded so far in restoring order that Mr. HOAR was heard with respectful attention. After he took his seat, as the question was about to be put, Mr. ADAMS addressed the committee to the following import:]

Mr. Chairman: It was not my intention to have troubled the committee with another word upon the subject of my proposed amendment. But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) has been pleased to propound to me a number of direct questions, two or three of which I heard, and to them I am willing to give direct and explicit answers. For, however widely I differ in opinion from him on this and most other occasions of common deliberation in this hall, I will do him the justice which he has done me, and say that there is nothing of indirection or ambiguous giving out in him. His course is straight forward, and you may always know where to find him. And, sir, in the intercourse of public or private life, I hold in higher esteem an adversary of such a character, than the political vane upon the steeple, whose friendship and whose opinions swing round the compass with every variation of the winds, and are steadfast only to the breath of the breeze.

One of the gentleman's questions which I heard was, from whence this amendment came? I answer him directly that it came from me, and from me alone, without consultation with any other human being. There was no abolition gunpowder plot in it; but, in claiming it as all my own, I shall not record a specification of it in the Patent Office as for an ingenious invention or a profound discovery. It laid in my way and I took it up. A respectable portion of my constituents, and many others of my fellow-citizens, had charged me with the duty of presenting their memorials against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas. Multitudes of others had entrusted to me their petitions for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Great numbers of petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, of the same purport, had been presented by my colleagues, and by other members of the House. I had been earnestly solicited to support, as far as my very slender influence in this House might extend, and as far as my own convictions of truth and justice would admit, the prayer of those petitions, and the purpose of those remonstrances and memorials. I could not support the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. I could not resist the admission of Arkansas, notwithstanding the slavery article in her constitution, into the Union. But there was a point of concession to the slaveholding interests of the South, from the representatives of none but free-men in this House, where it appeared to me not only just, but indispensably necessary, to stop.

Slavery, taking advantage of political influences, operated just at this time at the North upon the prospects of the presidential election; taking advantage (I must say no very generous advantage) of that kind, friendly, and compassionate feeling of Northern freeman for their brethren and fellow-citizens, the slaveholders of the South, which, during the last twelve months, had universally pervaded the Northern region of the country, and urged our people sometimes even to riotous excess against the peaceable, warm-hearted, but honest-hearted enthusiasts of human liberty: slavery, I say, in the confidence of her temporary reinforcement from sources foreign to her own character, had changed her tone, and was aiming blows of deadly intent at the freedom of her Northern associate itself. She had struck at the right of petition and the freedom of speech in this House; she had struck at the freedom of the press, and at the freedom of the post office, both in this and the other branch of the Legislature, and by the express recommendation of the Chief Magistrate of the Union; she had struck at the liberty and the life of a free citizen of a Northern State, by demanding that he should be delivered up, innocent of all offence, as he was, against the laws of the State in which he dwelt, to the tender mercies of her felony, without benefit of clergy. I had seen the twenty-two memorials and remonstrances which I had presented, and many others of the same import, the moment they had reached the hands of the Clerk, ordered by the Speaker to be laid on the table, without reading, without knowing what they contained, without the privilege of being considered, by a general stigmatizing interdict, more insulting than would have been an absolute refusal to receive them. The article in the constitution of Arkansas, cutting off the last hope of emancipation to the end of time, by withholding from the Legislature even the power of ordaining it, I strongly disapproved. The House had treated all these memorials and remonstrances in behalf of freedom as if they were afraid to hear them read, afraid to look them in the face, afraid even to squint at them. In reading this eighth section of the bill before the committee, it appeared to me that the amendment which I offered was so congenial to its spirit, that, if inserted at the place proposed, it would appear altogether as if it had been a part of the section as originally drawn up. The amendment falls infinitely short of the Missouri restriction, and is entirely congenial to the spirit of the constitution itself. Unable as I was to propose the restriction desired by the memorialists and remonstrants, yet, believing that the occasion required of me an avowal of those opinions and principles, the only guardians of the freedom of my constituents, I was desirous of manifesting them in the form the least offensive possible to the slaveholding portion of the community. I wished to plant the standard of freedom at the very lowest point of its elevation, and, by conceding to slavery every thing required by the common compact, yet adhering to those self-evident truths proclaimed in the declaration of independence, to utter the minimum of the sentiments which I believed my constituents would never resign but with the last drop of their blood. At every former period of our history, I should have expected that the representatives of the slaveholding States in this House would readily have accepted this, as far more favorable to them than the Missouri compromise. Now, my object is to fulfil the duty devolved upon me by my constituents, and to leave the decision where it properly belongs. I am not aware of any other question of the gentleman from Virginia, which requires an answer from me, particularly after the eloquent address of my colleague behind me (Mr. CUSHING) has already answered them so much more effectually than I could have done myself.

Mr. WISE rose, and inquired whether in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts,

(Mr. ADAMS,) if his amendment should prevail, the State of Arkansas would, by this bill, be admitted in the Union.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly, sir. There is not in my amendment the shadow of a restriction upon the State. It leaves the State, like all the rest, to regulate the subject of slavery within herself to her own laws; and how far that comes short of the concessions required from the slaveholding interest by the Missouri compromise, it is easy to judge by reference to the transactions of that time; for in the act of 6th of March, 1820, to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of that State into the Union, slavery was and is forever prohibited in all the territory ceded by France to the United States under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude, not included within the limits of the State of Missouri. And this was the first Missouri compromise; not the abolition, but the prohibition by Congress forever, of slavery in that portion of the Louisiana Territory where it had not then penetrated. And, secondly, when the Constitution of the State of Missouri was formed, there was an article on the legislative power, the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of which, defining the powers and duties of the General Assembly of the State, was in these words: "It shall be their duty, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary, first, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever."

Nearly the whole of the second session of the 16th Congress was consumed in debates whether the State of Missouri should be admitted into the Union, without requiring of her that this clause should be expunged from her constitution, and the session terminated with her conditional admission, by a resolution of 2d March, 1821, in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental conditions that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of the said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental conditions, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete."

This was the second Missouri compromise; and, conformably to this resolution, the Legislature of the State of Missouri did, on the 26th of June, 1821, by a solemn public act, declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition. A copy of this solemn act was transmitted to the President of the United States, who, after consultation with all the members of his administration, and after taking from each one of them his opinion in writing, issued, on the 10th of August, 1821, his proclamation, declaring that the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was complete.

Now, sir, there is in the amendment proposed by me nothing comparable, as concession from the slaveholding to the free States, to this Missouri restriction. I propose no restriction at all. I simply ask that my constituents, as parties to this compact of admission with Arkansas, may not be constructively held to have given their assent to this perpetuation of slavery, placing it beyond the reach of the legislative authority.

And this reservation is entirely conformable to the spirit of the Constitution of the United States. That instrument, containing in four different places arrangements having reference to slavery, does not, in any one of them, recognize the existence of slavery or of slaves; neither of the words is to be found throughout the constitution. Its founders were unwilling that the frame of Government, ordained expressly by the people, to secure to themselves and to their posterity the blessings of liberty, should be polluted even by the name of slavery. Thus, when they provided that the slaveholders should enjoy that most extraordinary privilege of representation of the persons of their slaves in this hall, they adopted a circumlocution, and, after enumerating free persons, those bound to service for a term of years, and Indians not taxed, including every description of human beings, slaves alone excepted, then endowed their masters with the right of representation for three-fifths of "all other persons."

Thus, in the ninth section of the first article, which denied to Congress the power, prior to the year 1808, of prohibiting the slave trade, that detestable traffic was described, not by its proper name, but under the gentle denomination of "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit."

Again: the second section of the fourth article, which stipulates for the arrest and delivery up of fugitive slaves, does not name them as such. It says: "No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

And, in the fourth section of the fourth article, it is provided that the United States shall, on the application of the Legislature or of the Executive of any one of the States, protect the same against domestic violence; an expression, if not exclusively confined to servile insurrection, undoubtedly selected with special and emphatic reference to it.

In no one of these four passages are slaves recognized as property. In the first three, where the reference to them is direct, they are expressly designated as persons—persons to be represented in Congress, not by themselves, but by the votes of their masters; persons whom the then existing States might think proper to admit; persons held to service or labor, to be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due. Not only is there no recognition of slaves as property, not only are they constantly referred to as persons, but in every instance they are so described that the engagement contracted with relation to them might be applicable to classes of persons other than slaves; and this studious uniformity of language throughout the whole constitution could only arise from the determination to exclude from it any acknowledgment of slavery, as forming a component part of the supreme law of the land.

It was in this spirit of mutual concession and conciliation that the Constitution of the United States was formed and adopted, and it is in this spirit that I offer the amendment now before the committee. I will trespass no longer upon their indulgence, but will submit a few observations more upon the subject, when the bill shall be reported to the House.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

Death of Ex-President Madison.

On the Speaker's resuming the chair, at 4 o'clock, he announced the following Message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to you the melancholy intelligence of the death of James Madison, ex-President of the United States. He departed this life at half-past six o'clock on the morning of the 28th instant, full of years and of honor.

I hasten this communication, in order that Congress may adopt such measures as may be proper to testify their sense of the respect which is due to the memory of one whose life has contributed so essentially to the happiness and glory of his country, and to the good of mankind.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Message having been read,

Mr. PATTON, of Virginia, said that the particular relation in which he stood, as his immediate representative and personal friend, towards the great public benefactor whose decease, "full of years and full of honors," had just been announced by the Message of the Death of Ex-President Madison.

President of the United States, had induced the Virginia delegation to devolve upon him the mournful duty of proposing for the adoption of the House the resolution he was about to offer, for the purpose of determining upon the course to be pursued for giving expression to the national sensibility to the great bereavement we had suffered.

I do not, however, Mr. Speaker, feel it to be a suitable occasion in which to employ or indulge in any studied phrase of panegyric upon the public or private virtues of the venerable man whose loss we deplore.

It is true, sir, that, early imbued with the sincerest veneration for the character of Mr. Madison, with the profoundest admiration of his talents, and the warmest gratitude for his eminent and varied public services, there is no language that I could employ which would exaggerate the deep emotion with which I have been impressed by the melancholy intelligence of his death. And I am sure that it would be equally impossible for me to speak of him in any terms that would depict an individual pre-eminent in all the virtues of social and private life, or one that combined the merits of a patriot, statesman, and sage, that would not find a ready and full response in the minds and hearts of all who hear me. But it is not a feeble effort of this kind, such as I could make, nor even by the highest effort of human eloquence, the lofty inspiration of poetry, "the storied urn or animated bust," that can rear an appropriate monument to the memory of Mr. Madison, or erect a suitable monument to his fame.

His appropriate and enduring eulogium is to be found inscribed in those pages of his country's history which are identified with her honor and glory. It is engraved upon every pillar of that splendid fabric of constitutional liberty under which we live. It is identified with the existence of that glorious union of confederated States which he contributed so essentially to form, and the maintenance and preservation of which, with all its numerous blessings, were the constant objects of his care during his long, laborious, and useful public life, and of his most earnest and anxious solicitude in the shades of retirement.

And, Mr. Speaker, another and not less decisive and more affecting evidence of his merit and title to public gratitude will be found in the deep grief with which his loss will be deplored by every man in the nation as a great national calamity. I offer the resolution which I now send to the Chair:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the President of the United States to this House.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. ADAMS rose, and addressed the Speaker. By the general sense of the House, said he, it is with perfect propriety that the delegation from the Commonwealth of Virginia have taken the lead in the melancholy duty of proposing the measures suitable to be adopted as testimonials of the veneration due from the Legislature of the Union to the memory of the departed patriot and sage, the native of their soil, and the citizen of their community.

It is not without some hesitation, and some diffidence, that I have risen to offer in my own behalf, and in that of my colleagues upon this floor, and of our common constituents, to join our voice, at once of mourning and of exultation, at the event announced to both Houses of Congress by the Message from the President of the United States—of mourning at the bereavement which has befallen our common country by the decease of one of her most illustrious sons; of exultation at the spectacle afforded to the observation of the civilized world, and for the emulation of after times, by the close of a life of usefulness and of glory, after forty years of service in trusts of the highest dignity and splendor that a confiding country could bestow, succeeded by twenty years of retirement and private life, not inferior, in the estimation of the virtuous and the wise, to the honors of the highest station that ambition can ever attain.

Of the public life of James Madison what could I say that is not deeply impressed upon the memory and upon the heart of every one within the sound of my voice? Of his private life, what but must meet an echoing shout of applause from every voice within this hall? Is it not in a pre-eminent degree by emanations from his mind that we are assembled here as the Representatives of the people and States of this Union? Is it not transcendently by his exertions that we all address each other here by the endearing appellation of countrymen and fellow-citizens? Of that band of benefactors of the human race, the founders of the Constitution of the United States, James Madison is the last who is gone to his reward. Their glorious work has survived them all. They have transmitted the precious bond of union to us, now entirely a succeeding generation to them. May it never cease to be a voice of admonition to us of our duty to transmit the inheritance unimpaired to our children of the rising age.

Of the personal relations with this great man, which gave rise to the long career of public service in which twenty years of my own life have been engaged, it becomes me not to speak. The fulness of the heart must be silent, even to the suppression of the overflowings of gratitude and affection.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the adoption of the following resolution by that body:

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 30, 1836.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the President of the United States.

"Ordered, That Mr. RIVES, Mr. CLAY, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. LEIGH, and Mr. TALLMADGE, be the committee.

"Attest: WALTER LOWRIE, Sec'y."

The House concurred in the resolution, and, according to a previous order of the House, the committee was ordered to consist of one from each State in the Union; and the following gentlemen were appointed:

Mr. PATTON, of Virginia; Mr. MASON, of Maine; Mr. CUSHMAN, of New Hampshire; Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts; Mr. TOUCEY, of Connecticut; Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island; Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont; Mr. WARD, of New York; Mr. PARKER, of New Jersey; Mr. ANTHONY, of Pennsylvania; Mr. MILLIGAN, of Delaware; Mr. WASHINGTON, of Maryland; Mr. DEBERRY, of North Carolina; Mr. GRIFFIN, of South Carolina; Mr. COFFEE, of Georgia; Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky; Mr. DUNLAP, of Tennessee; Mr. McLENE, of Ohio; Mr. RIPLEY, of Louisiana; Mr. CARR, of Indiana; Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi; Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois; Mr. LYON, of Alabama; Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri.

Cherokee Treaty.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair) on the "bill making further appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, and for other purposes."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the following clause:

"For the amount stipulated to be paid for the lands ceded in the first article of the treaty with the Cherokees of the 29th of December, 1835, deducting the cost of the land to be provided for them west of the Mississippi, under the second article of the treaty, $4,600,000."

West Point Academy.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then took up the "bill making appropriations for the Military Academy of the United States, for the year 1836."

Mr. PRERCE, of New Hampshire, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: An attempt was made during the last Congress to bring the subject of the reorganization of the Military Academy before the country, through a report of a committee. The same thing has been done during the present session, again and again, but all efforts have proved alike unsuccessful! Still, you do not cease to call for appropriations; you require the people's money for the support of the institution, while you refuse them the light necessary to enable them to judge of the propriety of your annual requisitions.

Whether the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill upon your table is too great or too small, or precisely sufficient to cover the current expenses of the institution, is a matter into which I will not at present inquire; but I shall feel bound to oppose the bill in every stage of its progress. I cannot vote a single dollar until the resolution of inquiry, presented by my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. HAWES,) at an early day in the session, shall be first taken up and disposed of. I am aware, sir, that it will be said, because I have heard the same declaration on a former occasion, that this is not the proper time to discuss the merits of the institution; that the bill is to make provision for expenses already incurred in part; and whatever opinions may be entertained upon the necessity of a reorganization, the appropriation must be made. I say to gentlemen who are opposed to the principles of the institution, and to those who believe that abuses exist, which ought to be exposed and corrected, that now is their only time, and this the only opportunity during the present session, to attain their object, and I trust they will steadily resist the bill until its friends shall find it necessary to take up the resolution of inquiry and give it its proper reference.

Sir, why has this investigation been resisted? Is it not an institution which has already cost this country more than three millions of dollars, for which you propose, in this very bill, an appropriation of more than one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and which at the same time, in the estimation of a large portion of the citizens in this Union, has failed, eminently failed, to fulfil the objects for which it was established, of sufficient interest and importance to claim the consideration of a committee of this House, and of the House itself?

I should have expected the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HAWES,) merely proposing an inquiry, to pass without opposition, had I not witnessed the strong sensation, nay, excitement, that was produced here, at the last session, by the presentation of his yet unpublished report. Sir, if you would have an exhibition of highly excited feeling, it requires little observation to learn that you may produce it at any moment by attacking such laws as confer exclusive and gratuitous privileges. The adoption of the resolution of inquiry, at the last session of Congress, and the appointment of a select committee under it, were made occasion of newspaper paragraphs, which, in tone of lamentation, and direful prediction, rivalled the most highly wrought specimens of the panic era. One of those articles I preserved, and have before me. It commences thus: "The architects of ruin.—This name has been appropriately given to those who are leading on the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled, in a remorseless war upon all the guards and defences of society."

I introduce it here merely to show what are, in certain quarters, considered the guards and defences of society. After various compliments, similar to that just cited, the article proceeds: "All this is dangerous as novel, and the ultimate results cannot be contemplated without anxiety. If this spirit extends, who can check it? 'Down with the Bank;' 'down with the Military Academy;' 'down with the Judiciary;' 'down with the Senate;' will be followed by watchwords of a worse character." Here, Mr. Chairman, you have the United States Bank first, and then the Military Academy, as the guards and defences of your country. If it be so, you are indeed feebly protected. One of these guards and defences is already tottering. And who are "the architects of ruin" that have resolved its downfall? Are they the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled? No, sir. The most pure and patriotic portion of your community; the staid, industrious, intelligent farmers and mechanics, through a public servant, who has met responsibilities, and seconded their wishes, with equal intrepidity and success, in the camp and in the cabinet, have accomplished this great work. Mr. Chairman, there is no real danger to be apprehended from this much-dreaded levelling principle.

From the middling interest you have derived your most able and efficient support in the most gloomy and trying periods of your history. And what have they asked in return? Nothing but the common advantages and blessings of a free Government, administered under equal and impartial laws. They are responsible for no portion of your legislation, which, through its partial and unjust operation, has shaken this Union to its centre. That has had its origin in a different quarter, sustained by wealth, the wealth of monopolies, and the power and influence which wealth, thus accumulated and disposed, never fails to control. Indeed, sir, while far from demanding at your hands special favors for themselves, they have not, in my judgment, been sufficiently jealous of all legislation conferring exclusive and gratuitous privileges.

That the law creating the institution of which I am now speaking, and the practice under it, is strongly marked by both these characteristics, is apparent at a single glance. It is gratuitous, because those who are so fortunate as to obtain admission there receive their education without any obligation, except such as a sense of honor may impose, to return, either by service or otherwise, the slightest equivalent. It is exclusive, inasmuch as only one youth out of a population of more than 47,000 can participate in its advantages at the same time; and those who are successful are admitted at an age, when their characters cannot have become developed, and with very little knowledge of their adaptation, mental or physical, for military life. The system disregards one of those great principles which, carried into practice, contributed, perhaps, more than any other, to render the arms of Napoleon invincible for so many years. Who does not perceive that it destroys the very life and spring of military ardor and enthusiasm, by utterly foreclosing all hope of promotion to the soldier and non-commissioned officer? However meritorious may be his services, however pre-eminent may become his qualifications for command, all is unavailing. The portcullis is dropped between him and preferment; the wisdom of your laws having provided another criterion than that of admitted courage and conduct, by which to determine who are worthy of command. They have made an Academy, where a certain number of young gentlemen are educated annually at the public expense, and to which there is, of consequence, a general rush, not so much from sentiments of patriotism and a taste for military life, as from motives less worthy—the avenue, and the only avenue, to rank in your army. These are truths, Mr. Chairman, which no man will pretend to deny; and I leave it for this House and the nation to determine whether they do not exhibit a spirit of exclusiveness, alike at variance with the genius of your Government and the efficiency and chivalrous character of your military force.

Sir, no man can feel more deeply interested in the army, or entertain a higher regard for it, than myself. My earliest recollections connect themselves fondly and gratefully with the names of the brave men who, relinquishing the quiet and security of civil life, were staking their all upon the defence of their country's rights and honor. One of the most distinguished among that noble band now occupies and honors a seat upon this floor.

It is not fit that I should indulge in expressions of personal respect and admiration, which I am sure would find a hearty response in the bosom of every member of this committee. I allude to him merely to express the hope that, on some occasion, we may have, upon this subject, the benefit of his experience and observation. And if his opinions shall differ from my own, I promise carefully to review every step by which I have been led to my present conclusions. You cannot mistake me, sir; I refer to the hero of Erie. I have declared myself the friend of the army. Satisfy me, then, what measures are best calculated to render it effective, and what all desire it to be, and I go for the proposition with my whole heart.

But I cannot believe that the Military Academy, as at present organized, is calculated to accomplish this desirable end. It may, and undoubtedly does, send forth into the country much military knowledge; but the advantage which your army, or that which will constitute your army in time of need, derives from it, is by no means commensurate with the expense you incur. Here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I deny, utterly, the expediency, and the right to educate, at the public expense, any number of young men who, on the completion of their education, are not to form a portion of your military force, but to return to the walks of private life. Such was never the operation of the Military Academy until after the law of 1812; and the doctrine, so far as I have been able to ascertain, was first formally announced by a distinguished individual, at this time sufficiently jealous of the exercise of executive patronage, and greatly alarmed by what he conceives to be the tendencies of this Government to centralism and consolidation. It may be found in the report of the Secretary of War, communicated to Congress in 1819.

If it shall, upon due consideration, receive the sanction of Congress and the country, I can see no limit to the exercise of power and Government patronage. Follow out the principle, and where will it lead you? You confer upon the National Government the absolute guardianship of literature and science, military and civil; you need not stop at military science; any one, in the wide range of sciences, becomes at once a legitimate and constitutional object of your patronage; you are confined by no limit but your discretion; you have no check but your own good pleasure. If you may afford instruction, at the public expense, in the languages, in philosophy, in chemistry, and in the exact sciences, to young gentlemen who are under no obligation to enter the service of their country, but are, in fact, destined for civil life, why may you not, by parity of reasoning, provide the means of a legal, or theological, or medical education, on the ground that the recipients of your bounty will carry forth a fund of useful knowledge, that may, at some time, under some circumstances, produce a beneficial influence, and promote "the general welfare?" Sir, I fear that even some of us may live to see the day when this "general welfare" of your constitution will leave us little ground to boast of a Government of limited powers. But I did not propose at this time to discuss the abstract question of constitutional right. I will regard the expediency alone; and whether the power exist or not, its exercise, in an institution like this, is subversive of the only principle upon which a school, conducted at the public expense, can be made profitable to the public service—that of making an admission into your school, and an education there, secondary to an appointment in the army. Sir, this distinctive feature characterized all your legislation, and all executive recommendations, down to 1810.

I may as well notice here, as at any time, an answer which has always been ready when objections have been raised to this institution—an answer which, if it has not proved quite satisfactory to minds that yield their assent more readily to strong reasons than to the authority of great names, has yet, unquestionably, exercised a powerful influence upon the public mind. It has not gone forth upon the authority of an individual merely, but has been published to the world with the approbation of a committee of a former Congress. It is this: that the institution has received at different times the sanction of such names as Washington, Adams, and Jefferson; and this has been claimed with such boldness, and in a form so imposing, as almost to forbid any question of its accuracy. If this were correct, in point of fact, it would be entitled to the most profound respect and consideration, and no change should be urged against the weight of such authority, without mature deliberation, and thorough conviction of expediency. Unfortunately for the advocates of the institution, and fortunately for the interests of the country, this claim cannot be sustained by reference to executive documents, from the first report of General Knox, in 1790, to the close of Mr. Jefferson's administration.

The error has undoubtedly innocently occurred, by confounding the Military Academy at West Point as it was, with the Military Academy at West Point as it is. The report of Secretary Knox, just referred to, is characterized by this distinctive feature—that the corps proposed to be organized were "to serve as an actual defence to the community," and to constitute a part of the active military force of the country, "to serve in the field, or on the frontier, or in the fortifications of the sea-coast, as the commander-in-chief may direct." At a later period, the report of the Secretary of War, (Mr. McHenry,) communicated to Congress in 1800, although it proposed a plan for military schools, differing in many essential particulars from those which had preceded it, still retained the distinctive feature just named as characterizing the report of General Knox.

With regard to educating young men gratuitously, which, whatever may have been the design, I am prepared to show is the practical operation of the Academy, as at present organized, I cannot, perhaps, exhibit more clearly the sentiments of the Executive at that early day, urgent as was the occasion, and strong as must have been the desire, to give strength and efficiency to the military force, than by reading one or two paragraphs from a supplementary report of Secretary McHenry, addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Defence, on the 31st January, 1800.

The Secretary says:

"Agreeably to the plan of the Military Academy, the directors thereof are to be officers taken from the army; consequently, no expense will be incurred by such appointments. The plan also contemplates that officers of the army, cadets, and non-commissioned officers, shall receive instruction in the Academy. As the rations and fuel which they are entitled to in the army will suffice for them in the Academy, no additional expense will be required for objects of maintenance while there.

"The expenses of servants and certain incidental expenses relative to the police and administration, may be defrayed by those who shall be admitted, out of their pay and emoluments."

JUNE, 1836.]

West Point Academy.

[H. OF R.]

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, from the phraseology of the report, that all were to constitute a part of your actual military force; and that whatever additional charges should be incurred, were to be defrayed by those who might receive the advantages of instruction. These were provisions, just as they are important. Let me call your attention for a moment to a report of Colonel Williams, which was made the subject of a special message, communicated to Congress by Mr. Jefferson, on the 18th of March, 1808.

The extract I propose to read, as sustaining fully the views of Mr. McHenry upon this point, is in the following words:

"It might be well to make the plan upon such a scale as not only to take in the minor officers of the navy, but also any youths from any of the States who might wish for such an education, whether designed for the army or navy, or neither, and let them be assessed to the value of their education, which might form a fund for extra or contingent expenses."

Sir, these are the true doctrines upon this subject: doctrines worthy of the administration under which they were promulgated, and in accordance with the views of statesmen in the earlier and purer days of the republic.

Give to the officers of your army the highest advantages for perfection in all the branches of military science, and let those advantages be open to all, in rotation, and under such terms and regulations as shall be at once impartial toward the officers, and advantageous to the service; but let all young gentlemen who have a taste for military life, and desire to adopt arms as a profession, prepare themselves for subordinate situations at their own expense, or at the expense of their parents or guardians, in the same manner that the youth of the country are qualified for the professions of civil life. Sir, while upon this subject of gratuitous education, I will read an extract from "Dupin's Military Force of Great Britain," to show what favor it finds in another country, from the practice and experience of which we may derive some advantages, however far from approving of its institutions generally. The extract is from the 2d vol., 71st page, and relates to the terms on which young gentlemen are admitted to the junior departments of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst.

"First. The sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in pecuniary distress; this class are instructed, boarded, and habited, gratuitously by the State; being required only to provide their equipments on admission, and to maintain themselves in linen.

"Secondly. The sons of all officers of the army above the rank of subalterns actually in the service, and who pay a sum proportioned to their ranks, according to a scale per annum regulated by the supreme board. The sons of living naval officers of rank not below that of master and commander, are also admitted on payment of annual stipends, similar to those of corresponding ranks in the army. The orphan sons of officers, who have not left their families in pecuniary difficulties, are admitted into this class on paying the stipends required of officers of the rank held by their parents at the time of their decease.

"Thirdly. The sons of noblemen and private gentlemen who pay a yearly sum equivalent to the expenses of their education, board, and clothing, according to a rate regulated from time to time by the commissioners."

Sir, let it be remembered that these are the regulations of a Government which, with all its wealth and power, is, from its structure and practice, groaning under the accumulated weight of pensions, sinecures, and gratuities, and yet you observe that only one class, "the sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in pecuniary distress," are educated gratuitously.

I do not approve even of this, but I hold it up in contrast with your own principles and practice.

If the patience of the committee would warrant me, Mr. Chairman, I could show, by reference to executive communications, and the concurrent legislation of Congress in 1794, 1796, 1802, and 1808, that, prior to the last-mentioned date, such an institution as we now have was neither recommended nor contemplated. Upon this point I will not detain you longer; but when hereafter confronted by the authority of great names, I trust we shall be told where the expressions of approbation are to be found. We may then judge of their applicability to the Military Academy as at present organized.

I am far from desiring to see this country destitute of a Military Academy; but I would have it a school of practice, and instruction, for officers actually in the service of the United States: not an institution for educating, gratuitously, young gentlemen, who, on the completion of their term, or after a few months' leave of absence, resign their commissions and return to the pursuits of civil life.

If any one doubts that this is the practical operation of your present system, I refer him to the annual list of resignations, to be found in the adjutant general's office.

Firmly as I am convinced of the necessity of a reorganization, I would take no step to create an unjust prejudice against the institution. All that I ask, and, so far as I know, all that any of the opponents of the institution ask, is, that after a full and impartial investigation, it shall stand or fall upon its merits. I know there are graduates of the institution who are ornaments to the army, and an honor to their country; but they, and not the seminary, are entitled to the credit. Here I would remark, once for all, that I do not reflect upon the officers or pupils of the Academy; it is to the principles of the institution itself, as at present organized, that I object. It is often said that the graduates leave the institution with sentiments that but ill accord with the feelings and opinions of the great mass of the people of that Government from which they derive the means of education, and that many who take commissions possess few qualifications for the command of men, either in war or in peace. Most of the members of this House have had more or less intercourse with these young gentlemen, and I leave it for each individual to form his own opinion of the correctness of the charges. Thus much I will say for myself, that I believe that these and greater evils, are the natural, if not inevitable, result of the principles in which this institution is founded; and any system of education, established upon similar principles, on Government patronage alone, will produce like results, now and forever. Sir, what are some of these results? By the report of the Secretary of War, dated January, 1831, we are informed that, "by an estimate of the last five years, (preceding that date,) it appears that the supply of the army from the corps of graduated cadets has averaged about twenty-two annually, while those who graduated are about forty, making in each year an excess of eighteen. The number received annually into the Academy averages one hundred, of which only the number stated, to wit: forty, pass through the prescribed course of education at schools, and become supernumerary lieutenants in the army." By the report of the Secretary of War, December, 1830, we are informed that "the number of promotions to the army from this corps for the last five years, has averaged about twenty-two annually, while the number of graduates has been at an average of forty. This excess, which is annually increasing, has placed eighty-seven in waiting until vacancies shall take place; and shows that, in the next year, probably, and in the succeeding one, certainly, there will be an excess beyond what the existing law authorizes to be commissioned. There will then be one hundred and six supernumerary brevet second lieutenants appurtenant to the army, at an average annual expense of $80,000." Sir, that results here disclosed were not anticipated by Mr. Madison, is apparent from a recurrence to his messages of 1810 and 1811.

In passing the law of 1812, both Congress and the President acted for the occasion, and they expected those who should succeed them to act in a similar manner. Their feelings of patriotism and resentment were aroused, by beholding the privileges of freemen wantonly invaded, our glorious stars and stripes disregarded, and national and individual rights trampled in the dust. The war was pending. The necessity for increasing the military force of the country was obvious and pressing, and the urgent occasion for increased facilities for military instruction equally apparent.

Sir, it was under circumstances like these, when we had not only enemies abroad, but I blush to say, enemies at home, that the institution, as at present organized, had its origin. It will hardly be pretended that it was the original design of the law to augment the number of persons instructed beyond the wants of the public service.

Well, the report of the Secretary shows that, for five years prior to 1831, the Academy had furnished eighteen supernumeraries annually. A practical operation of this character has no sanction in the recommendation of Mr. Madison. The report demonstrates, further, the fruitfulness and utility of this institution, by showing the fact, that but two-fifths of those who enter the Academy graduate, and that but a fraction more than one-fifth enter the public service.

This is not the fault of the administration of the Academy; it is not the fault of young gentlemen who are sent there; on your present peace establishment there can be but little to stimulate them, particularly in the acquisition of military science. There can hardly be but one object in the mind of the student, and that would be to obtain an education for the purposes of civil life. The difficulty is, that the institution has outlived both the occasion that called it into existence and its original design.

I have before remarked that the Academy was manifestly enlarged to correspond with the army and militia actually to be called into service. Look, then, for a moment, at facts, and observe with how much wisdom, justice, and sound policy, you retain the provisions of the law of 1812. The total authorized force of 1813, after the declaration of war, was 58,254; and in October, 1814, the military establishment amounted to 62,428. By the act of March, 1815, the peace establishment was limited to 10,000, and now hardly exceeds that number. Thus you make a reduction of more than 50,000 in your actual military force, to accommodate the expenses of the Government to its wants. And why do you refuse to do the same with your grand system of public education? Why does that remain unchanged? Why not reduce it at once, at least to the actual wants of the service, and dispense with your corps of supernumerary lieutenants? Sir, there is, there can be, but one answer to the question, and that may be found in the war report of 1819, to which I have before had occasion to allude. The Secretary says, "the cadet who cannot be provided for in the army will return to private life; but in the event of a war their knowledge will not be lost to the country."

Indeed, sir, these young gentlemen, if they could be induced to take the field, would, after a lapse of ten or fifteen years, come up from the bar, or it may be the pulpit, fresh in military science, and admirably qualified for command in the face of an enemy!

The magazine of facts, to prove at the same glance the extravagance and unfruitfulness of this institution, is not easily exhausted; but I am admonished by the lateness of the hour to omit many considerations which I regard as both interesting and important. I will only detain the committee to make a single statement, placing side by side some aggregate results. There has already been expended upon the institution more than three millions three hundred thousand dollars. Between 1815 and 1821, thirteen hundred and eighteen students were admitted into the Academy; and of all the cadets who were ever there, only two hundred and sixty-five remained in the service at the end of 1830. Here are the expenses you have incurred, and the products you have realized.

I leave them to be balanced by the people. But, for myself, believing as I do that the Academy stands forth as an anomaly among the institutions of this country; that it is at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitution under which we live; so long as this House shall deny investigation into its principles and practical operation, I, as an individual member, will refuse to appropriate the first dollar for its support.

MR. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee rise, and report the "bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities," and lay the one under consideration aside.

MR. BRIGGS objected to the motion.

The motion was disagreed to without a division, and MR. PIERCE concluded his remarks.

The committee then rose and reported both the above bills to the House, when the amendments to both were severally concurred in, and they were ordered to a third reading, and read a third time and passed.

Death of Ex-President Madison.

MR. PATTON, from the select committee, made the following report:

"The President of the United States having communicated to the two Houses of Congress the melancholy intelligence of the death of their illustrious and beloved fellow-citizen, JAMES MADISON, of Virginia, late President of the United States, and the two Houses sharing in the general grief which this distressing event must produce:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the chairs of the President of the Senate, and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives be shrouded in black during the present session; and that the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the members and officers of both Houses, wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. Madison, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for her person and character, and of their sincere condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence."

The report and resolutions were concurred in unanimously.

On motion of MR. BRIGGS,
The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, July 4.

Texas Independence.

MR. MASON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made a report in relation to the affairs of Texas, accompanied by the following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information has been received that it has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

"2. Resolved, That the House of Representatives perceive with satisfaction that the President of the United States has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military, and civil condition of Texas."

MR. ADAMS moved to lay the report and resolutions on the table. Negatived—yeas 40, nays 108.

MR. PEXTON demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

MR. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, thought it not necessary, and he therefore begged the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw it.

MR. PEYTON refused, on the ground that there was no time to discuss the subject.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 80, noes not counted.

MR. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

MR. ADAMS called for a division of the question.

The question was taken on the first resolution, and was—yeas 128, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ash, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Bouldin, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dunlap, Forester, French, W. K. Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, R. The question was then taken on the second resolution, and was—yeas 113, nays 22.

Adjournment.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the House took up the joint resolution from the Senate proposing the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States with the usual message, and the committee on the part of the House was ordered to consist of two.

Discharge of Committees.

On motion of Mr. HARDIN, all the committees of the House were discharged from the further consideration of such subjects as had been referred to them and had not been acted on.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, from the select joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, made the usual report.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, at 2 o'clock,
The House adjourned, sine die.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 5, 1836.

The Senate assembled at 12 o'clock, M.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair, and the following Senators appeared in their seats, viz.:

Mr. RUGGLES, from Maine; Messrs. HUBBARD and PAGE, from New Hampshire; Messrs. PRENTISS and SWIFT, from Vermont; Mr. DAVIS, from Massachusetts; Messrs. KNIGHT and ROBINS, from Rhode Island; Messrs. NILES and TOMLINSON, from Connecticut; Mr. WRIGHT, from New York; Messrs. SOUTHARD and WALL, from New Jersey; Messrs. BUCHANAN and McKEAN, from Pennsylvania; Mr. BAYARD, from Delaware; Mr. KENT, from Maryland; Mr. RIVES, from Virginia; Mr. KING, from Georgia; Messrs. EWING and MORRIS, from Ohio; Messrs. CLAY and CRITTENDEN, from Kentucky; Messrs. GRUNDY and WHITE, from Tennessee; Messrs. HENDRICKS and TIPTON, from Indiana; Messrs. ROBINSON and EWING, from Illinois; Messrs. KING and MOORE, from Alabama; Mr. WALKER, from Mississippi; Messrs. BENTON and LYNN, from Missouri.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of Messrs. FULTON and SEVIER, Senators elect from the new State of Arkansas, and they were qualified and took their seats.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. BENTON, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators of the State of Arkansas shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the constitution requires.

Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box three papers, of equal size, numbered 1, 2, 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Arkansas shall draw out one paper. Number 1, if drawn, shall entitle the member to be placed in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837; number 2 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1839; and number 3 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1841.

It was accordingly so determined, by lot, that Mr. SEVIER's term should expire in 1837, and Mr. FULTON's in 1841.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a committee was ordered to be appointed on the part of the Senate, on a joint committee of both Houses, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of both Houses of Congress are assembled, and ready to receive from him such communication as he may be pleased to make.

Messrs. GRUNDY and SWIFT were appointed by the Chair members of said committee, on the part of the Senate.

The CHAIR presented the following letter of resignation from the Secretary of the Senate:

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1836.

SIR: I herewith resign the office of Secretary of the Senate of the United States.

Having so long possessed the confidence of the Senate, and enjoyed such continued and friendly intercourse with its members, it is with feelings of deep and painful sensibility I now separate from them; and these feelings are greatly increased, when I reflect on the courtesy and kindness I have received from yourself, as the presiding officer of the Senate, and on the uniform and unbroken confidence and friendship which have for so many years subsisted between us. No length of time or change of circumstances will ever efface from my mind the recollections growing out of these associations; and I shall always rejoice to hear of your prosperity and happiness, and of that of every member of the Senate.

WALTER LOWRIE.

HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the Chief Clerk of the Senate perform the duties of Secretary till a Secretary shall be appointed.

Mr. MACHEN accordingly took the usual requisite oath.

TUESDAY, December 6.

The annual Message from the President of the United States was received, and read by the acting Secretary:

*Fellow-citizens of the Senate
and House of Representatives:*

Addressing to you the last annual Message I shall ever present to the Congress of the United States, it is a source of the most heartfelt satisfaction to be able to congratulate you on the high state of prosperity which our beloved country has attained. With no causes at home or abroad to lessen the confidence with which we look to the future for continuing proofs of the capacity of our free institutions to produce all the fruits of good government, the general condition of our affairs may well excite our national pride.

I cannot avoid congratulating you, and my country particularly, on the success of the efforts made during my administration by the Executive and Legislature, in conformity with the sincere, constant, and earnest desire of the people, to maintain peace, and establish cordial relations with all foreign powers. Our gratitude is due to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and I invite you to unite with me in offering to him fervent supplication, that his providential care may ever be extended to those who follow us, enabling them to avoid the dangers and the horrors of war, consistently with a just and indispensable regard to the rights and honor of our country. But, although the present state of our foreign affairs, standing without important change as they did when you separated in July last, is flattering in the extreme, I regret to say that many questions of an interesting character, at issue with other powers, are yet unadjusted. Amongst the most prominent of these is that of our north-eastern boundary. With an undiminished confidence in the sincere desire of his Britannic Majesty's Government to adjust that question, I am not yet in possession of the precise grounds upon which it proposes a satisfactory adjustment.

With France, our diplomatic relations have been resumed, and under circumstances which attest the disposition of both Governments to preserve a mutually beneficial intercourse, and foster those amicable feelings which are so strongly required by the true interest of the two countries. With Russia, Austria, Prussia, Naples, Sweden, and Denmark, the best understanding exists, and our commercial intercourse is gradually expanding itself with them. It is encouraged in all these countries, except Naples, by their mutually advantageous and liberal treaty stipulations with us.

The claims of our citizens on Portugal are admitted to be just, but provision for the payment of them has been unfortunately delayed by frequent political changes in that kingdom.

The blessings of peace have not been secured by Spain. Our connections with that country are on the best footing, with the exception of the burdens still imposed upon our commerce with her possessions out of Europe.

The claims of American citizens for losses sustained at the bombardment of Antwerp, have been presented to the Governments of Holland and Belgium, and will be pressed, in due season, to settlement.

With Brazil, and all our neighbors of this continent, we continue to maintain relations of amity and concord, extending our commerce with them as far as the resources of the people and the policy of their Governments will permit. The just and long-standing claims of our citizens upon some of them are yet sources of dissatisfaction and complaint. No danger is apprehended, however, that they will not be peacefully, although tardily, acknowledged and paid by all, unless the irritating effect of her struggle with Texas should unfortunately make our immediate neighbor, Mexico, an exception.

It is already known to you, by the correspondence between the two Governments communicated at your last session, that our conduct in relation to that struggle is regulated by the same principles that governed us in the dispute between Spain and Mexico herself; and I trust that it will be found, on the most severe scrutiny, that our acts have strictly corresponded with our professions. That the inhabitants of the United States should feel strong prepossessions for the one party, is not surprising. But this circumstance should, of itself, teach us great caution, lest it lead us into the great error of suffering public policy to be regulated by partiality or prejudice; and there are considerations connected with the possible result of this contest between the two parties of so much delicacy and importance to the United States, that our character requires that we should neither anticipate events, nor attempt to control them. The known desire of the Texans to become a part of our system, although its gratification depends upon the reconciliation of various and conflicting interests, necessarily a work of time, and uncertain in itself, is calculated to expose our conduct to misconstruction in the eyes of the world. There are already those who, indifferent to principle themselves, and prone to suspect the want of it in others, charge us with ambitious designs and insidious policy. You will perceive by the accompanying documents, that the extraordinary mission from Mexico has been terminated, on the sole grounds that the obligations of this Government to itself and to Mexico, under treaty stipulations, have compelled me to trust a discretionary authority to a high officer of our army, to advance into territory claimed as part of Texas, if necessary, to protect our own or the neighboring frontier from Indian depredation. In the opinion of the Mexican functionary, who has just left us, the honor of his country will be wounded by American soldiers entering, with the most amicable avowed purposes, upon ground from which the followers of his Government have been expelled, and over which there is at present no certainty of a serious effort on its part being made to re-establish its dominion. The departure of this minister was the more singular, as he was apprised that the sufficiency of the causes assigned for the advance of our troops by the commanding general had been seriously doubted by me, and that there was every reason to suppose that the troops of the United States, their commander having had time to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the information upon which they had been marched to Nacogdoches, would be either there in perfect accordance with the principles admitted to be just in his conference with the Secretary of State, by the Mexican minister himself, or were already withdrawn in consequence of the impressive warnings their commanding officer had received from the Department of War. It is hoped and believed that his Government will take a more dispassionate and just view of this subject, and not be disposed to construe a measure of justifiable precaution, made necessary by its known inability in execution of the stipulations of our treaty to act upon the frontier, into an encroachment upon its rights or stain upon its honor.

In the mean time, the ancient complaints of injustice, made on behalf of our citizens, are disregarded, and new causes of dissatisfaction have arisen, some of them of a character requiring prompt remonstrance, and ample and immediate redress. I trust, however, by tempering firmness with courtesy, and acting with great forbearance upon every incident that has occurred, or that may happen, to do and to obtain justice, and thus avoid the necessity of again bringing this subject to the view of Congress.

It is my duty to remind you that no provision has been made to execute our treaty with Mexico for tracing the boundary line between the two countries. Whatever may be the prospect of Mexico's soon being able to execute the treaty on its part, it is proper that we should be, in anticipation, prepared at all times to perform our obligations, without regard to the probable condition of those with whom we have contracted them.

The result of the confidential inquiries made into the condition and prospects of the newly declared Texan Government, will be communicated to you in the course of the session.

Commercial treaties, promising great advantages to our enterprising merchants and navigators, have been formed with the distant Governments of Muscat and Siam. The ratifications have been exchanged, but have not reached the Department of State. Copies of the treaties will be transmitted to you, if received before, or published, if arriving after, the close of the present session of Congress.

Nothing has occurred to interrupt the good understanding that has long existed with the Barbary Powers, nor to check the good will which is gradually growing up in our intercourse with the dominions of the Government of the distinguished chief of the Ottoman Empire.

Information has been received at the Department of State, that a treaty with the Emperor of Morocco has just been negotiated, which, I hope, will be received in time to be laid before the Senate previous to the close of the session.

You will perceive, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the financial means of the country continue to keep pace with its improvement in all other respects. The receipts into the Treasury during the present year will amount to about $47,691,898; those from customs being estimated at $22,523,151; those from lands at about $24,000,000; and the residue from miscellaneous sources. The expenditures for all objects during the year are estimated not to exceed $32,000,000, which will leave a balance in the Treasury for public purposes, on the 1st day of January next, of about $41,723,959. This sum, with the exception of five millions, will be transferred to the several States, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating the deposits of the public money.

The unexpended balances of appropriation on the 1st day of January next, are estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062, the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, after the contemplated transfers to the several States are made. If, therefore, the future receipts should not be sufficient to meet these outstanding and future appropriations, there may be soon a necessity to use a portion of the funds deposited with the States.

The consequences apprehended when the deposit act of the last session received a reluctant approval, have been measurably realized. Though an act merely for the deposit of the surplus moneys of the United States in the State treasuries for safe-keeping, until they may be wanted for the service of the General Government, it has been extensively spoken of as an act to give the money to the several States, and they have been advised to use it as a gift, without regard to the means of refunding it when called for. Such a suggestion has doubtless been made without a due consideration of the obligation of the deposit act, and without a proper attention to the various principles and interests which are affected by it. It is manifest that the law itself cannot sanction such a suggestion, and that, as it now stands, the States have no more authority to receive and use these deposits, without intending to return them, than any deposit bank, or any individual temporarily charged with the safe-keeping or application of the public money would now have for converting the same to their private use, without the consent and against the will of the Government. But independently of the violation of public faith and moral obligation which are involved in this suggestion, when examined in reference to the terms of the present deposit act, it is believed that the considerations which should govern the future legislation of Congress on this subject will be equally conclusive against the adoption of any measure recognizing the principles on which the suggestion has been made.

Considering the intimate connection of the subject with the financial interests of the country, and its great importance in whatever aspect it can be viewed, I have bestowed upon it the most anxious reflection, and feel it to be my duty to state to Congress such thoughts as have occurred to me, to aid their deliberation in treating it in the manner best calculated to conduce to the common good.

The experience of other nations admonished us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt; but it will be in vain that we have congratulated each other upon the disappearance of this evil, if we do not guard against the equally great one of promoting the unnecessary accumulation of public revenue. No political maxim is better established than that which tells us that an improvident expenditure of money is the parent of profligacy, and that no people can hope to perpetuate their liberties, who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for objects not necessary to the legitimate and real wants of their Government. Flattering as is the condition of our country at the present period, because of its unexampled advance in all the steps of social and political improvement, it cannot be disguised that there is a lurking danger already apparent in the neglect of this warning truth, and that the time has arrived when the representatives of the people should be employed in devising some more appropriate remedy than now exists, to avert it.

Under our present revenue system, there is every probability that there will continue to be a surplus beyond the wants of the Government; and it has become our duty to decide whether such a result be consistent with the true objects of our Government.

Should a surplus be permitted to accumulate beyond the appropriations, it must be retained in the Treasury as it now is, or distributed among the people of the States.

To retain it in the Treasury, unemployed in any way, is impracticable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. To take from the people the right of bearing arms, and put their weapons of defence in the hands of a standing army, would be scarcely more dangerous to their liberties, than to permit the Government to accumulate immense amounts of treasure beyond the supplies necessary to its legitimate wants. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition.

To collect it merely for distribution to the States, would seem to be highly impolitic, if not as dangerous as the proposition to retain it in the Treasury. The shortest reflection must satisfy every one that, to require the people to pay taxes to the Government merely that they may be paid back again, is sporting with the substantial interests of the country, and no system which produces such a result can be expected to receive the public countenance. Nothing could be gained by it, even if each individual who contributed a portion of the tax could receive back promptly the same portion. But, it is apparent, that no system of the kind can ever be enforced, which will not absorb a considerable portion of the money to be distributed in salaries and commissions to the agents employed in the process, and in the various losses and depreciations which arise from other causes; and the practical effect of such an attempt must ever be to burden the people with taxes, not for purposes beneficial to them, but to swell the profits of deposit banks, and support a band of useless public officers.

A distribution to the people is impracticable and unjust in other respects. It would be taking one man's property, and giving it to another. Such would be the unavoidable result of a rule of equality, (and none other is spoken of, or would be likely to be adopted,) inasmuch as there is no mode by which the amount of the individual contributions of our citizens to the public revenue can be ascertained. We know that they contribute unequally; and a rule, therefore, that would distribute to them equally, would be liable to all the objections which apply to the principle of an equal division of property. To make the General Government the instrument of carrying this odious principle into effect, would be at once to destroy the means of its usefulness and change the character designed for it by the framers of the constitution.

But the more extended and injurious consequences likely to result from a policy which would collect a surplus revenue for the purpose of distributing it, may be forcibly illustrated by an examination of the effects already produced by the present deposit act. This act, although certainly designed to secure the safe-keeping of the public revenue, is not entirely free in its tendencies from any of the objections which apply to this principle of distribution. The Government had, without necessity, received from the people a large surplus, which, instead of being employed as heretofore, and returned to them by means of the public expenditure, was deposited with sundry banks. The banks proceeded to make loans upon this surplus, and thus converted it into banking capital; and in this manner it has tended to multiply bank charters, and has had a great agency in producing a spirit of wild speculation. The possession and use of the property out of which this surplus was created belonged to the people; but the Government has transferred its possession to incorporated banks, whose interest and effort it is to make large profits out of its use. This process need only be stated to show its injustice and bad policy.

And the same observations apply to the influence which is produced by the steps necessary to collect as well as to distribute such a revenue. About three-fifths of all the duties on imports are paid in the city of New York; but it is obvious that the means to pay those duties are drawn from every quarter of the Union. Every citizen in every State, who purchases and consumes an article which has paid a duty at that port, contributes to the accumulating mass. The surplus collected there, must, therefore, be made up of moneys or property withdrawn from other points and other States. Thus the wealth and business of every region from which these surplus funds proceed, must be to some extent injured, while that of the place where the funds are concentrated and are employed in banking are proportionably extended. But both in making the transfer of the funds which are first necessary to pay the duties and collect the surplus, and in making the re-transfer which becomes necessary when the time arrives for the distribution of that surplus, there is a considerable period when the funds cannot be brought into use; and it is manifest that, besides the loss inevitable from such an operation, its tendencies is to produce fluctuations in the business of the country, which are always productive of speculation, and detrimental to the interests of regular trade. Argument can scarcely be necessary to show that a measure of this character ought not to receive further legislative encouragement.

By examining the practical operation of the ratio for distribution adopted in the deposit bill of the last session, we shall discover other features that appear equally objectionable. Let it be assumed, for the sake of argument, that the surplus moneys to be deposited with the States have been collected and belong to them in the ratio of their federal representative population—an assumption founded upon the fact that any deficiencies in our future revenue from imports and public lands must be made up by direct taxes collected from the States in that ratio. It is proposed to distribute the surplus, say $30,000,000, not according to the ratio in which it has been collected and belongs to the people of the States, but in that of their votes in the colleges of electors of President and Vice President. The effect of a distribution of that ratio is shown by the annexed table, marked A.

By an examination of that table, it will be perceived that in the distribution of the surplus of $30,000,000 upon that basis, there is a great departure from the principle which regards representation as the true measure of taxation; and it will be found that the tendency of that departure will be to increase whatever inequalities have been supposed to attend the operation of our federal system in respect to its bearings upon the different interests of the Union. In making the basis of representation the basis of taxation, the framers of the constitution intended to equalize the burdens which are necessary to support the Government; and the adoption of that ratio, while it accomplished this object, was also the means of adjusting other great topics arising out of the conflicting views respecting the political equality of the various members of the confederacy. Whatever, therefore disturbs the liberal spirit of the compromises which established a rule of taxation so just and equitable, and which experience has proved to be so well adapted to the genius and habits of our people, should be received with the greatest caution and distrust.

A bare inspection, in the annexed table, of the differences produced by the ratio used in the deposit act compared with the results of a distribution according to the ratio of direct taxation, must satisfy every unprejudiced mind that the former ratio contravenes the spirit of the constitution, and produces a degree of injustice in the operation of the Federal Government which would be fatal to the hope of perpetuating it. By the ratio of direct taxation, for example, the State of Delaware, in the collection of $30,000,000 of revenue, would pay into the treasury $188,716; and in the distribution of $30,000,000 she would receive back from the Government, according to the ratio of the deposit bill, the sum of $306,122; and similar results would follow the comparison between the small and the large States throughout the Union; thus realizing to the small States an advantage which would be doubtless as unacceptable to them as a motive for incorporating the principle in any system which would produce it, as it would be inconsistent with the rights and expectations of the large States. It was certainly the intention of that provision of the constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises" shall "be uniform throughout the United States," to make the burdens of taxation fall equally upon the people, in whatever State of the Union they may reside. But what would be the value of such a uniform rule, if the moneys raised by it could be immediately returned by a different one, which will give to the people of some States much more, and to those of others much less, than their fair proportions? Were the Federal Government to exempt, in express terms, the imports, products, and manufactures of some portions of the country from all duties, while it imposed heavy ones on others, the injustice could not be greater. It would be easy to show how, by the operation of such a principle, the large States of the Union would not only have to contribute their just share towards the support of the Federal Government, but also have to bear in some degree the taxes necessary to support the Governments of their smaller sisters; but it is deemed unnecessary to state the details where the general principle is so obvious.

A system liable to such objections can never be supposed to have been sanctioned by the framers of the constitution, when they conferred on Congress the taxing power; and I feel persuaded that a mature examination of the subject will satisfy every one that there are insurmountable difficulties in the operation of any plan which can be devised, of collecting the revenue, for the purpose of distributing it. Congress is only authorized to levy taxes "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." There is no such provision as would authorize Congress to collect together the property of the country, under the name of revenue, for the purpose of dividing it equally or unequally among the States or the people. Indeed, it is not probable that such an idea ever occurred to the States when they adopted the constitution. But, however this may be, the only safe rule for us, in interpreting the powers granted to the Federal Government, is to regard the absence of express authority to touch a subject so important and delicate as this, as equivalent to a prohibition.

Even if our powers were less doubtful in this respect, as the constitution now stands, there are considerations afforded, by recent experience, which would seem to make it our duty to avoid a resort to such a system.

All will admit that the simplicity and economy of the State Governments mainly depend on the fact that money has to be supplied to support them by the same men or their agents who vote it away in appropriations. Hence, when there are extravagant and wasteful appropriations, there must be a corresponding increase of taxes; and the people, becoming awakened, will necessarily scrutinize the character of measures which thus increase their burdens. By the watchful eye of self-interest, the agents of the people in the State Government are repressed, and kept within the limit of a just economy. But if the necessity of levying the taxes be taken from those who make the appropriations, and thrown upon a more distant and less responsible set of public agents, who have power to approach the people by an indirect and stealthy taxation, there is reason to fear that prodigality will soon supersede those characteristics which have thus far made us look with so much pride and confidence to the State Governments as the mainstay of our union and liberties. The State Legislatures, instead of studying to restrict their State expenditures to the smallest possible sum, will claim credit for their profusion, and harass the General Government for increased supplies. Practically, there would soon be but one taxing power, and that vested in a body of men far removed from the people, in which the farming and mechanic interests would scarcely be represented. The States would gradually lose their purity as well as their independence; they would not dare to murmur at the proceedings of the General Government, lest they should lose their supplies; all would be merged in a practical consolidation, cemented by wide-spread corruption, which could only be eradicated by one of those bloody revolutions which occasionally overthrow the despotic systems of the old world.

In all the other aspects in which I have been able to look at the effect of such a principle of distribution upon the best interests of the country, I can see nothing to compensate for the disadvantages to which I have adverted. If we consider the protective duties, which are, in a great degree, the source of the surplus revenue, beneficial to one section of the Union and prejudicial to another, there is no corrective for the evil in such a plan of distribution. On the contrary, there is reason to fear that all the complaints which have sprung from this cause would be aggravated. Every one must be sensible that a distribution of the surplus must beget a disposition to cherish the means which create it; and any system, therefore, into which it enters, must have a powerful tendency to increase rather than diminish the tariff. If it were even admitted that the advantages of such a system could be made equal to all the sections of the Union, the reasons already so urgently calling for a reduction of the revenue would, nevertheless, lose none of their force; for it will always be improbable that an intelligent and virtuous community can consent to raise a surplus for the mere purpose of dividing it, diminished as it must inevitably be by the expenses of the various machinery necessary to the process.

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is, to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their own hands, to be used for their own profit. Each State will then support its own Government, and contribute its due share towards the support of the General Government. There would be no surplus to cramp and lessen the resources of individual wealth and enterprise, and the banks would be left to their ordinary means. Whatever agitations and fluctuations might arise from our unfortunate paper system, they could never be attributed, justly or unjustly, to the action of the Federal Government. There would be some guaranty that the spirit of wild speculation, which seeks to convert the surplus revenue into banking capital, would be effectually checked, and that the scenes of demoral-zation which are now so prevalent through the land would disappear.

Without desiring to conceal that the experience and observation of the last two years have operated a partial change in my views upon this interesting subject, it is, nevertheless, regretted that the suggestions made by me, in my annual messages of 1829 and 1830, have been greatly misunderstood. At that time, the great struggle was begun against that latitudinarian construction of the constitution which authorizes the unlimited appropriations of the revenues of the Union to internal improvements within the States, tending to invest in the hands, and place under the control, of the General Government, all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of State rights, and in derogation of State authority. At the same time the condition of the manufacturing interest was such as to create an apprehension that the duties on imports could not, without extensive mischief, be reduced in season to prevent the accumulation of a considerable surplus after the payment of the national debt. In view of the dangers of such a surplus, and in preference to its application to internal improvements, in derogation of the rights and powers of the States, the suggestion of an amendment of the constitution to authorize its distribution was made. It was an alternative for what were deemed greater evils—a temporary resort to relieve an over-burdened treasury, until the Government could, without a sudden and destructive revulsion in the business of the country, gradually return to the just principle of raising no more revenue from the people, in taxes, than is necessary for its economical support. Even that alternative was not spoken of but in connection with an amendment of the constitution. No temporary inconvenience can justify the exercise of a prohibited power, or a power not granted by the instrument; and it was from a conviction that the power to distribute even a temporary surplus of revenue is of that character, that it was suggested only in connection with an appeal to the source of all legal power in the General Government, the States which have established it. No such appeal has been taken, and, in my opinion, a distribution of the surplus revenue by Congress, either to the States or the people, is to be considered as among the prohibitions of the constitution. As already intimated, my views have undergone a change, so far as to be convinced that no alteration of the constitution, in this respect, is wise or expedient. The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the General Government and the States, its effect upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculation, idleness, extravagance, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson, that any transient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of our Government is to be borne in preference to an overflowing treasury.

I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

It is apparent from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognized by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency. The last, from the experience of the evils of the issues of paper during the Revolution, had become so justly obnoxious, as not only to suggest the clause in the constitution forbidding the emission of bills of credit by the States, but also to produce that vote in the convention which negated the proposition to grant power to Congress to charter corporations; a proposition well understood at the time, as intended to authorize the establishment of a national bank, which was to issue a currency of bank notes, on a capital to be created to some extent out of Government stocks. Although this proposition was refused by a direct vote of the convention, the object was afterwards in effect obtained, by its ingenious advocates, through a strained construction of the constitution. The debts of the Revolution were funded, at prices which formed no equivalent, compared with the nominal amount of the stock, and under circumstances which exposed the motives of some of those who participated in the passage of the act, to distrust.

The facts that the value of the stocks was greatly enhanced by the creation of the bank, that it was well understood that such would be the case, and that some of the advocates of the measure were largely benefited by it, belong to the history of the times, and are well calculated to diminish the respect which might otherwise have been due to the action of the Congress which created the institution.

On the establishment of a national bank, it became the interest of its creditors that gold should be superseded by the paper of a bank as a general currency. A value was soon attached to the gold coins, which made their exportation to foreign countries as a mercantile commodity, more profitable than their retention and use at home as money. It followed, as a matter of course, if not designed by those who established the bank, that the bank became, in effect, a substitute for the mint of the United States.

Such was the origin of a national bank currency, and such the beginning of those difficulties which now appear in the excessive issues of the banks incorporated by the various States.

Although it may not be possible, by any legislative means within our power, to change at once the system which has thus been introduced, and has received the acquiescence of all portions of the country, it is certainly our duty to do all that is consistent with our constitutional obligations, to prevent the mischiefs which are threatened by its undue extension. That the efforts of the fathers of our Government to guard against it by a constitutional provision were founded on an intimate knowledge of the subject, has been frequently attested by the bitter experience of the country. The same causes which led them to refuse their sanction to a power authorizing the establishment of incorporations for banking purposes, now exist in a much stronger degree to urge us to exert the utmost vigilance in calling into action the means necessary to correct the evils resulting from the unfortunate exercise of the power; and it is to be hoped that the opportunity of effecting this great good will be improved before the country witnesses new scenes of embarrassment and distress.

The President's Message.

[SENATE.]

Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency, of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles that regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us, bank issues constitute such a currency, and must ever do so, until they are made dependent on those just proportions of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, which experience has proved to be necessary, not only in this, but in all other commercial countries. Where those proportions are not infused into the circulation, and do not control it, it is manifest that prices must vary according to the tide of bank issues, and the value and stability of property must stand exposed to all the uncertainty which attends the administration of institutions that are constantly liable to the temptation of an interest distinct from that of the community in which they are established.

The progress of an expansion, or rather a depreciation of the currency, by excessive bank issues, is always attended by a loss to the laboring classes. This portion of the community have neither time nor opportunity to watch the ebbs and flows of the money market. Engaged from day to day in their useful toils, they do not perceive that, although their wages are nominally the same, or even somewhat higher, they are greatly reduced, in fact, by the rapid increase of a spurious currency; which, as it appears to make money abundant, they are at first inclined to consider a blessing. It is not so with the speculator, by whom this operation is better understood, and is made to contribute to his advantage. It is not until the prices of the necessities of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that the wages rise and gradually reach a justly proportioned rate to that of the products of their labor. When thus, by the depreciation in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the adulterations is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices. It is then perceived that the enhancement of the price of land and labor produces a corresponding increase in the price of products, until these products do not sustain a competition with similar ones in other countries, and thus both manufactured and agricultural productions cease to bear exportation from the country of the spurious currency, because they cannot be sold for cost. This is the process by which specie is banished by the paper of the banks. Their vaults are soon exhausted to pay for foreign commodities; the next step is a stoppage of specie payment—a total degradation of paper as a currency—unusual depression of prices, the ruin of debtors, and the accumulation of property in the hands of creditors and cautious capitalists.

It was in view of these evils, together with the dangerous power wielded by the Bank of the United States, and its repugnance to our constitution, that I was induced to exert the power conferred upon me by the American people to prevent the continuance of that institution. But although various dangers to our republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank to extort from the Government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished except a salutary change of public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the constitution. In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session, forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of the precious metals infused into our circulating medium. These measures will probably be followed up in due time by the enactment of State laws, banishing from circulation bank notes of still higher denominations; and the object may be materially promoted by further acts of Congress, forbidding the employment, as fiscal agents, of such banks as continue to issue notes of low denominations, and throw impediments in the way of the circulation of gold and silver.

The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various Registers and Receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in bank. The banks let out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the Receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be sent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the Government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in their notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely, as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the Government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people, generally, required that these operations should be checked, and it became the duty of every branch of the General and State Governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment for the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the fifteenth of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut of the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country, and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants, at Government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find, in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn.

It remains for Congress, if they approve the policy which dictated this order, to follow it up in its various bearings. Much good, in my judgment, would be produced by prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, at a reasonable reduction of price, and to limit the quantity which shall be sold to them. Although it is believed the General Government never ought to receive any thing but the constitutional currency in exchange for the public lands, that point would be of less importance if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation. Indeed, there is scarcely a mischief arising out of our present land system, including the accumulating surplus of revenue, which would not be remedied at once by a restriction on land sales to actual settlers; and it promises other advantages to the country in general, and to the new States in particular, which cannot fail to receive the most profound consideration of Congress.

Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government, at the time of the removal of the deposits. It was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States, that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts, by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposit banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposit banks.

The whole amount of public money transferred by the Bank of the United States in 1832, was $16,000,000. The amount transferred and actually paid by the deposit banks in the year ending the first of October last, was $39,319,899; the amount transferred and paid between that period and the 6th November, was $5,399,000; and the amount of transfer warrants outstanding on that day, was $14,450,000; making an aggregate of $59,168,894. These enormous sums of money first mentioned have been transferred with the greatest promptitude and regularity; and the rates at which the exchanges have been negotiated previously to the passage of the deposit act were generally below those charged by the Bank of the United States. Independently of these services, which are far greater than those rendered by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, a number of the deposit banks have, with a commendable zeal to aid in the improvement of the currency, imported from abroad, at their own expense, large sums of the precious metals for coinage and circulation.

In the same manner have nearly all the predictions turned out in respect to the effect of the removal of the deposits—a step unquestionably necessary to prevent the evils which it was foreseen the bank itself would endeavor to create in a final struggle to procure a renewal of its charter. It may be thus, too, in some degree, with the further steps which may be taken to prevent the excessive issue of other bank paper; but it is to be hoped that nothing will now deter the Federal and State authorities from the firm and vigorous performance of their duties to themselves and to the people in this respect.

In reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government, your particular attention is invited to those articles which constitute the necessities of life. The duty on salt was laid as a war tax, and was no doubt continued to assist in providing for the payment of the war debt. There is no article, the release of which from taxation, would be felt so generally and so beneficially. To this may be added all kinds of fuel and provisions. Justice and benevolence unite in favor of releasing the poor of our cities from burdens which are not necessary to the support of our Government, and tend only to increase the wants of the destitute.

It will be seen by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the accompanying documents, that the Bank of the United States has made no payment on account of the stock held by the Government in that institution, although urged to pay any portion which might suit its convenience, and that it has given no information when payment may be expected. Nor, although repeatedly requested, has it furnished the information in relation to its condition, which Congress authorized the Secretary to collect at their last session. Such measures as are within the power of the Executive have been taken to ascertain the value of the stock, and procure the payment as early as possible.

The conduct and present condition of that bank, and the great amount of capital vested in it by the United States, require your careful attention. Its charter expired on the third day of March last, and it has now no power but that given in the 21st section, "to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." Before the expiration of the charter, the stockholders of the bank obtained an act of incorporation from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, excluding only the United States. Instead of proceeding to wind up their concerns, and pay over to the United States the amount due on account of the stock held by them, the president and directors of the old bank appear to have transferred the books, papers, notes, obligations, and most or all of its property, to this new corporation, which entered upon business as a continuation of the old concern. Amongst other acts of questionable validity, the notes of the expired corporation are known to have been used as its own, and again put in circulation. That the old bank had no right to issue or reissue its notes after the expiration of its charter, cannot be denied; and that it could not confer any such right on its substitute, any more than exercise it itself, is equally plain. In law and honesty, the notes of the bank in circulation, at the expiration of its charter, should have been called in by public advertisement, paid up as presented, and, together with those on hand, cancelled and destroyed. Their reissue is sanctioned by

The President's Message.

[SENATE.]

no law, and warranted by no necessity. If the United States be responsible in their stock for the payment of these notes, their reissue by the new corporation, for their own profit, is a fraud on the Government. If the United States is not responsible, then there is no legal responsibility in any quarter, and it is a fraud on the country. They are the redeemed notes of a dissolved partnership, but, contrary to the wishes of the retiring partner, and without his consent, are again reissued and circulated.

It is the high and peculiar duty of Congress to decide whether any further legislation be necessary for the security of the large amount of public property now held, and in use by the new bank, and for vindicating the rights of the Government, and compelling a speedy and honest settlement with all the creditors of the old bank, public and private, or whether the subject shall be left to the power now possessed by the Executive and Judiciary. It remains to be seen whether the persons, who, as managers of the old bank, undertook to control the Government, retained the public dividends, shut their doors upon a committee of the House of Representatives, and filled the country with panic to accomplish their own sinister objects, may now, as managers of a new bank, continue with impunity to flood the country with a spurious currency; use the seven millions of Government stock for their own profit, and refuse to the United States all information as to the present condition of their own property, and the prospect of recovering it into their own possession.

The lessons taught by the Bank of the United States cannot well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands; and it will be fortunate if they seriously consider the consequences which are likely to result on a smaller scale from the facility with which corporate powers are granted by their State Governments.

It is believed that the law of the last session, regulating the deposit banks, operates onerously and unjustly upon them in many respects; and it is hoped that Congress, on proper representation, will adopt the modifications which are necessary to prevent this consequence.

The report of the Secretary of War ad interim, and the accompanying documents, all which are herewith laid before you, will give you a full view of the diversified and important operations of that Department during the past year.

The military movements rendered necessary by the aggressions of the hostile portions of the Seminole and Creek tribes of Indians, and by other circumstances, have required the active employment of nearly our whole regular force, including the marine corps, and of large bodies of militia and volunteers. With all these events, so far as they were known at the seat of Government before the termination of your last session, you are already acquainted; and it is, therefore, only needful in this place to lay before you a brief summary of what has since occurred.

The war with the Seminoles, during the summer, was, on our part, chiefly confined to the protection of our frontier settlements from the incursions of the enemy; and, as a necessary and important means for the accomplishment of that end, to the maintenance of the posts previously established. In the course of this duty, several actions took place, in which the bravery and discipline of both officers and men were conspicuously displayed, and which I have deemed it proper to notice, in respect to the former, by the granting of brevet rank for gallant services in the field. But as the force of the Indians was not so far weakened by these partial successes as to lead them to submit, and as their savage inroads were frequently repeated, early measures were taken for placing at the disposal of Governor Call, who, as commander-in-chief of the territorial militia, had been temporarily invested with the command, an ample force, for the purpose of resuming offensive operations, in the most efficient manner, so soon as the season should permit. Major-General Jesup was also directed, on the conclusion of his duties in the Creek country, to repair to Florida, and assume the command.

The result of the first movement made by the forces under the direction of Governor Call, in October last, as detailed in the accompanying papers, excited much surprise and disappointment. A full explanation has been required of the causes which led to the failure of that movement, but has not yet been received. In the mean time, as it was feared that the health of Governor Call, who was understood to have suffered much from sickness, might not be adequate to the crisis, and as Major-General Jesup was known to have reached Florida, that officer was directed to assume the command, and to prosecute all needful operations with the utmost promptitude and vigor. From the force at his disposal, and the dispositions he has made, and is instructed to make, and from the very efficient measures which it is since ascertained have been taken by Governor Call, there is reason to hope that they will soon be enabled to reduce the enemy to subjection. In the mean time, as you will perceive from the report of the Secretary, there is urgent necessity for further appropriations to suppress these hostilities.

Happily for the interests of humanity, the hostilities with the Creeks were brought to a close soon after your adjournment, without that effusion of blood which at one time was apprehended as inevitable. The unconditional submission of the hostile party was followed by their speedy removal to the country assigned them west of the Mississippi. The inquiry as to alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of those Indians, and the cause of their hostilities, requested by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of July last, to be made by the President, is now going on, through the agency of commissioners appointed for that purpose. Their report may be expected during your present session.

The difficulties apprehended in the Cherokee country have been prevented, and the peace and safety of that region and its vicinity effectually secured by the timely measures taken by the War Department, and still continued.

The discretionary authority given to General Gaines to cross the Sabine, and to occupy a position as far west as Nacogdoches, in case he should deem such a step necessary to the protection of the frontier, and to the fulfilment of the stipulations contained in our treaty with Mexico, and the movement subsequently made by that officer, have been alluded to in a former part of this message. At the date of the latest intelligence from Nacogdoches our troops were yet at that station; but the officer who has succeeded General Gaines has recently been advised, that, from the facts known at the seat of Government, there would seem to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining that position; and he was accordingly instructed, in case the troops were not already withdrawn under the discretionary powers before possessed by him, to give the requisite orders for that purpose, on the receipt of the instructions, unless he shall then have in his possession such information as shall satisfy him that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers, and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as previously explained to him.

Whilst the necessities existing during the present year, for the service of militia and volunteers, have furnished new proofs of the patriotism of our fellow-citizens, they have also strongly illustrated the importance of an increase in the rank and file of the regular army. The views of this subject, submitted by the Secretary of War, in his report, meet my entire concurrence, and are earnestly commended to the deliberate attention of Congress. In this connection, it is also proper to remind you, that the defects in our present militia system are every day rendered more apparent. The duty of making further provision by law, for organizing, arming, and disciplining this arm of defence, has been so repeatedly represented to Congress by myself and my predecessors, that I deem it sufficient, on this occasion, to refer to the last annual message and to former Executive communications, in which the subject has been discussed.

It appears from the reports of the officers charged with mustering into service the volunteers called for under the act of Congress of the last session, that more presented themselves at the place of rendezvous in Tennessee, than were sufficient to meet the requisition which had been made by the Secretary of War upon the Governor of that State. This was occasioned by the omission of the Governor to apportion the requisition to the different regiments of militia, so as to obtain the proper number of troops, and no more. It seems but just to the patriotic citizens who repaired to the general rendezvous, under circumstances authorizing them to believe that their services were needed, and would be accepted, that the expenses incurred by them, while absent from their homes, should be paid by the Government. I accordingly recommend that a law to this effect be passed by Congress, giving them a compensation which will cover their expenses on the march to and from the place of rendezvous, and while there; in connection with which, it will also be proper to make provision for such other equitable claims, growing out of the service of the militia, as may not be embraced in the existing laws.

On the unexpected breaking-out of hostilities in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, it became necessary, in some cases, to take the property of individuals for public use. Provision should be made by law for indemnifying the owners; and I would also respectfully suggest whether some provision may not be made, consistently with the principles of our Government, for the relief of the sufferers by Indian depredations, or by the operations of our own troops.

No time was lost, after the making of the requisite appropriations, in resuming the great national work of completing the unfinished fortifications on our seaboard, and of placing them in a proper state of defence. In consequence, however, of the very late day at which those bills were passed, but little progress could be made during the season which has just closed. A very large amount of the moneys granted at your last session accordingly remains unexpended; but as the work will be again resumed at the earliest moment in the coming spring, the balance of the existing appropriations, and in several cases which will be laid before you, with the proper estimates, further sums for the like objects may be usefully expended during the next year.

The recommendations of an increase in the engineer corps, and for a reorganization of the topographical corps, submitted to you in my last annual message, derive additional strength from the great embarrassments experienced, during the present year, in those branches of the service, and under which they are now suffering. Several of the most important surveys and constructions, directed by recent laws, have been suspended in consequence of the want of adequate force in these corps.

The like observations may be applied to the ordnance corps and to the general staff, the operations of which, as they are now organized, must either be frequently interrupted, or performed by officers taken from the line of the army, to the great prejudice of the service.

For a general view of the condition of the Military Academy, and of the other branches of the military service, not already noticed, as well as for fuller illustrations of those which have been mentioned, I refer you to the accompanying documents; and among the various proposals contained therein for legislative action, I would particularly notice the suggestion of the Secretary of War, for the revision of the pay of the army, as entitled to your favorable regard.

The national policy, founded alike in interest and in humanity, so long and so steadily pursued by this Government, for the removal of the Indian tribes originally settled on this side of the Mississippi to the west of that river, may be said to have been consummated by the conclusion of the late treaty with the Cherokees. The measures taken in the execution of that treaty, and in relation to our Indian affairs generally, will fully appear by referring to the accompanying papers. Without dwelling on the numerous and important topics embraced in them, I again invite your attention to the importance of providing a well-digested and comprehensive system for the protection, supervision, and improvement of the various tribes now planted in the Indian country. The suggestions submitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and enforced by the Secretary, on this subject, and also in regard to the establishment of additional military posts in the Indian country, are entitled to your profound consideration. Both measures are necessary, for the double purpose of protecting the Indians from intestine war, and in other respects complying with our engagements to them, and of securing our Western frontier against incursions which otherwise will assuredly be made on it. The best hopes of humanity in regard to the aboriginal race, the welfare of our rapidly extending settlements, and the honor of the United States, are all deeply involved in the relations existing between this Government and the emigrating tribes. I trust, therefore, that the various matters submitted in the accompanying documents, in respect to those relations, will receive your early and mature deliberation; and that it may issue in the adoption of legislative measures adapted to the circumstances and duties of the present crisis.

You are referred to the report of the Secretary of the Navy for a satisfactory view of the operations of the department under his charge during the present year. In the construction of vessels at the different navy yards, and in the employment of our ships and squadrons at sea, that branch of the service has been actively and usefully employed. While the situation of our commercial interests in the West Indies required a greater number than usual of armed vessels to be kept on that station, it is gratifying to perceive that the protection due to our commerce in other quarters of the world has not proved insufficient. Every effort has been made to facilitate the equipment of the exploring expedition authorized by the act of the last session, but all the preparation necessary to enable it to sail has not yet been completed. No means will be spared by the Government to fit out the expedition on a scale corresponding with the liberal appropriations for the purpose, and with the elevated character of the objects which are to be effected by it.

I beg leave to renew the recommendation made in my last annual message respecting the enlistment of boys in our naval service, and to urge upon your attention the necessity of further appropriations to increase the number of ships afloat, and to enlarge generally the capacity and force of the navy. The increase of our commerce, and our position in regard to the other powers of the world, will always make it our policy and interest to cherish the great naval resources of our country.

The report of the Postmaster General presents a gratifying picture of the condition of the Post Office Department. Its revenues, for the year ending the 30th June last, were $3,398,455 19, showing an increase of revenue over that of the preceding year of $404,878 53, or more than thirteen per cent. The expenditures for the same year were $2,755,623 76, exhibiting a surplus of $642,831 43. The Department has been redeemed from embarrassment and debt; has accumulated a surplus of more than half a million of dollars; has largely extended, and is preparing still further to extend, the mail service, and recommends a reduction of postages equal to about twenty per cent. It is practising upon the great principle which should control every branch of our Government, of rendering to the public the greatest good possible with the least possible taxation to the people.

The scale of postages suggested by the Postmaster General recommends itself, not only by the reduction it proposes, but by the simplicity of its arrangement, its conformity with the Federal currency, and the improvement it will introduce into the accounts of the Department and its agents.

Your particular attention is invited to the subject of mail contracts with railroad companies. The present laws providing for the making of contracts are based upon the presumption that competition among bidders will secure the service at a fair price. But on most of the railroad lines there is no competition in that kind of transportation, and advertising is therefore useless. No contract can now be made with them, except such as shall be negotiated before the time of offering or afterwards, and the power of the Postmaster General to pay them high prices is, practically, without limitation. It would be a relief to him, and no doubt would conduce to the public interest, to prescribe by law some equitable basis upon which such contracts shall rest, and restrict him by a fixed rule of allowance. Under a liberal act of that sort, he would undoubtedly be able to secure the services of most of the railroad companies, and the interest of the Department would be thus advanced.

The correspondence between the people of the United States and the European nations, and particularly with the British islands, has become very extensive, and requires the interposition of Congress to give it security. No obstacle is perceived to an interchange of mails between New York and Liverpool, or other foreign ports, as proposed by the Postmaster General. On the contrary it promises, by the security it will afford, to facilitate commercial transactions, and give rise to an enlarged intercourse among the people of different nations, which cannot but have a happy effect. Through the city of New York most of the correspondence between the Canadas and Europe is now carried on, and urgent representations have been received from the head of the Provincial Post Office, asking the interposition of the United States to guard it from the accidents and losses to which it is now subjected. Some legislation appears to be called for, as well by our own interest as by comity to the adjoining British Provinces.

The expediency of providing a fire-proof building for the important books and papers of the Post Office Department is worthy of consideration. In the present condition of our Treasury it is neither necessary nor wise to leave essential public interests exposed to so much danger, when they can so readily be made secure. There are weighty considerations in the location of a new building for that Department, in favor of placing it near the other Executive buildings.

The important subjects of a survey of the coast, and the manufacture of a standard of weights and measures for the different custom-houses, have been in progress for some years under the general direction of the Executive, and the immediate superintendence of a gentleman possessing high scientific attainments. At the last session of Congress, the making of a set of weights and measures for each State in the Union, was added to the others by a joint resolution.

The care and correspondence as to all these subjects, have been devolved on the Treasury Department during the last year. A special report from the Secretary of the Treasury will soon be communicated to Congress, which will show what has been accomplished as to the whole; the number and compensation of the persons now employed in these duties, and the progress expected to be made during the ensuing year; with a copy of the various correspondence deemed necessary to throw light on the subjects which seem to require additional legislation. Claims have been made for retrospective allowances in behalf of the superintendent and some of his assistants, which I did not feel justified in granting; other claims have been made for large increases in compensation, which, under all the circumstances of the several cases, I declined making without the express sanction of Congress. In order to obtain that sanction, the subject was, at the last session, on my suggestion, and by request of the immediate superintendent, submitted by the Treasury Department to the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives. But no legislative action having taken place, the early attention of Congress is now invited to the enactment of some expressed and detailed provisions in relation to the various claims made for the past, and to the compensation and allowances deemed proper for the future.

It is further respectfully recommended that, such being the inconvenience of attention to these duties by the Chief Magistrate, and such the great pressure of business on the Treasury Department, the general supervision of the coast survey, and the completion of the weights and measures, if the works are kept united, should be devolved on a board of officers organized specially for that purpose, or on the Navy Board attached to the Navy Department.

All my experience and reflection confirm the conviction I have so often expressed to Congress in favor of an amendment of the constitution which will prevent, in any event, the election of the President and Vice President of the United States devolving on the House of Representatives and the Senate; and I therefore beg leave again to solicit your attention to the subject. There were various other suggestions in my last annual message not acted upon, particularly that relating to the want of uniformity in the laws of the District of Columbia, that are deemed worthy of your favorable consideration.

Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business, and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation.

Having now finished the observations deemed proper, on this, the last occasion I shall have of communicating with the two Houses of Congress at their meeting, I cannot omit an expression of the gratitude which is due to the great body of my fellow-citizens, in whose partiality and indulgence I have found encouragement and support, in the many difficult and trying scenes through which it has been my lot to pass during my public career. Though deeply sensible that my exertions have not been crowned with a success corresponding to the degree of favor bestowed upon me, I am sure that they will be considered as having been directed by an earnest desire to promote the good of my country; and I am consoled by the persuasion that whatever errors have been committed will find a corrective in the intelligence and patriotism of those who will succeed us. All that has occurred during my administration is calculated to inspire me with increased confidence in the stability of our institutions; and should I be spared to enter upon that retirement which is so suitable to my age and infirm health, and so much desired by me in other respects, I shall not cease to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we are already so signally indebted, for the continuance of his blessings on our beloved country.

Death of Mr. Goldsborough.

MR. KENT addressed the Chair as follows:

MR. President: Yonder vacant seat, heretofore so ably and so faithfully filled, but too significantly indicates the object of my addressing you at this time.

I rise, sir, for the purpose of announcing to you and to the Senate the melancholy intelligence of the death of my very worthy and excellent colleague, the late ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH. He departed this life during the late recess, after a short illness, in the midst of his usefulness, and at a period when we should have been justifiable in allotting to him many years of vigorous health.

But few individuals have occupied a greater space in public estimation in his native State than MR. GOLDSBOROUGH. He filled, from an early period of his life, with no inconsiderable degree of reputation, various public stations, and was twice elected to a seat in this body. Possessing the advantages of a liberal education, which had been well improved, with the most polished address, he was ever found a ready and efficient debater, remarkable for his courtesy and politeness. He was truly said to have been "a man of manners and of letters too."

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH's exertions for the benefit of his fellow-men were not confined to public life. He was prominent as an agriculturist, making frequent and judicious experiments, enforcing his views by very able essays, thereby directing the attention of the agriculturist to such objects as were calculated to ameliorate and improve the condition of his exhausted lands. Truly exemplary in all the relations of private life, as a friend, neighbor, and in the domestic circle, he was unrivalled.

To me, personally, his loss is truly afflictive. A severe hoarseness, under which I have labored for some time, obliges me to be thus brief. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Honorable ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm."

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Madison's Writings.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by

The Treasury Circular.

{SENATE.

Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the revolutionary Congress, and of the conventions that formed the Constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject-matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared—long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow-men, until he and all who had been participants with him in the scenes he describes, have passed away—well deserves to become the property of the nation; and cannot fail, if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their Government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, and embodied in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 6, 1836.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the reading of the correspondence was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed.

Expunging the Journal.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that on the first day on which there was a Senate sufficiently full, he should ask leave to introduce a resolution to expunge from the journal certain sentences thereon. He would state, at the same time, that the resolution he should introduce would be in the same words as the one introduced by him at the last session, and it was his wish that the resolution might be disposed of by the Senate, before the other important business of the session commenced.

MONDAY, December 12.

Mr. BLACK, Senator from Mississippi, Mr. TALLMADGE, Senator from New York, and Mr. WEBSTER, Senator from Massachusetts, appeared to-day, and took their seats.

Statements of Commerce and Navigation.

Mr. BENTON called up the resolution he had offered, respecting an alteration in the mode of printing the annual report from the Treasury on commerce and navigation.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and communicated as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of Congress, and that said statement be printed in the same form and at the same price as the ordinary printing of the two Houses of Congress; that the same number of copies as are usually printed be furnished for the purpose of binding and distribution, and that five thousand additional copies be equally distributed to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. BENTON said that, on looking further into the existing law providing for the printing of this document, he had become convinced that some such modification of the resolution was necessary as had now been proposed. The only objection he had to it related to the five thousand additional copies to be printed for the Senate; he thought this number larger than necessary, and proposed that it be reduced to three thousand.

Mr. KNIGHT assenting, the resolution was so modified accordingly, and in this form it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Secretary of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a Secretary of the Senate, in place of WALTER LOWRIE, Esq., resigned.

On the first ballot, Mr. ASBURY DICKINS received 20 votes; Hon. ARNOLD NAUDAIN, late of the Senate, 18; scattering 3; 21 being necessary to a choice.

On the second ballot, Mr. DICKINS received 21; Mr. NAUDAIN 18; Mr. BRYAN 1; 21 being necessary to a choice.

Mr. DICKINS was accordingly declared to be duly elected Secretary of the Senate.

Memory of Mr. Kinnard.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, of Indiana, it was Resolved, That, in memory of the late Hon. Mr. KINNARD, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Indiana, the members of the Senate wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

Mr. CALHOUN, Senator from South Carolina, appeared to day in his seat.

The Treasury Circular.

The following resolutions, introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, being at their second reading:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Treasury order of the eleventh day of July, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

"Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue."

Mr. EWING, of Ohio spoke as follows: This extraordinary paper (the Treasury Circular) was issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 11th of July last in the form of a circular to the receivers of public money in the several land offices in the United States, directing them, after the 15th of August then next, to receive in payment for public lands nothing but gold and silver and certificates of deposits, signed by the Treasurer of the United States, with a saving in favor of actual settlers, and bona fide residents in the State in which the land happened to lie. This saving was for a limited time, and expires, I think, to-morrow. The professed object of this order was to check the speculations in public lands; to check excessive issues of bank paper in the West, and to increase the specie currency of the country; and the necessity of the measure was supported, or pretended to be supported, by the opinions of members of this body and the other branch of Congress. But, before I proceed to examine in detail this paper, its character and its consequences, I will briefly advert to the state of things out of which it grew.

I am confident, and I believe I can make the thing manifest, that the avowed objects were not the only, nor even the leading objects for which this order was framed; they may have influenced the minds of some who advised it, but those who planned, and those who at last virtually executed it, were governed by other and different motives, which I shall proceed to explain.

It was foreseen, prior to the commencement of the last session of Congress, that there would be a very large surplus of money in the public Treasury beyond the wants of the country for all their reasonable expenditures. It was also well understood that the land bill, or some other measure for the distribution of this fund, would be again presented to Congress; and, if the true condition of the public Treasury were known and understood, that its distribution, in some form or other, would be demanded by the country. On the other hand, it seems to have been determined by the party, and some of those who act with it thoroughly, that the money should remain where it was, in the deposit banks, so that it could be wielded at pleasure by the Executive. Hence the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the two Houses of Congress on the 8th day of December, 1835, (doc. 2, page 2,) makes the aggregate balance in the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1836, no more than $19,147,000; but now the controversy is ended, he shows, in his report of the 6th of December, 1836, that the true amount of that balance was $26,749,803, making an error of $7,602,803. There enters into this, and thence arises the egregious error, an estimate of the receipts for the last quarter of the then current year. After three-quarters of that quarter had elapsed; after this was in the hands of inferior officers, and, in the ordinary course of business, within the knowledge of his several bureaux at Washington, receipts within that quarter of about seven millions, he estimates the aggregate receipts for the whole quarter at $4,950,000, whereas the true amount, as now reported, was $11,950,000, making a difference in the receipts of that single quarter of seven millions. I think I am very safe in saying that this most extraordinary error never would have occurred in this report if it had been the wish of the Executive to parade before the nation a very prosperous state of the public Treasury, and a large receipt for the year 1835. If nothing had been feared about the land bill or distribution project, the estimate for that quarter would probably have equalled the actual receipts.

The statement of the Secretary, however, showed a surplus; but he proceeds to calculate it away in the year 1836. He conjectures that the receipts of that year will amount to $19,750,000, and of this he allows the public lands to produce $4,000,000. The whole receipt being less by about $4,000,000, than sufficient to sustain the estimated expenses of the year. But in his report of December 6, 1836, he gives the receipts of the same year at $47,691,898; more, by about $28,000,000, than his estimate; and of this the public lands yield $24,000,000, six times the amount of that estimate.

These facts are striking; and if the errors originate in mere mistake, which I am willing to believe, they indicate a most extraordinary degree of ignorance as to the business of the country, and the direction of its capital, or a mind easily biased and led into error by preconceived opinions.

But Senators, in the course of the debate which afterwards sprung up on the land bill, went much farther than the Secretary of the Treasury. They denied, and most unequivocally, that there was any surplus, or that there would be any; and, when some of us offered an estimate of what would be the receipts into the Treasury in the current year, we were told that it would be very difficult to fasten that estimate upon us at this session of Congress. I, however, for one, determined to relieve gentlemen from all trouble on that score, as far as regarded myself. On the 15th of March, 1836, I submitted my estimate of the revenues and expenditures of the current year, in a speech which I caused to be printed in pamphlet form. In this I estimated the receipts from customs for the year at $19,000,000
The public lands at more than 20,000,000
And I made the whole amount on hand, and received and receivable, in that year, in round numbers, without deducting expenditures - 77,000,000

The customs, it seems, have produced $23,000,000, which is $4,000,000 more than my estimate. The public lands $24,000,000—about the sum which I had supposed. And the footing of the column in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which answers to my estimate of $77,000,000, is $74,441,702, being two and a half millions less than I conjectured. More than this deficit, however, is accounted for by the fact that the bank stock which I had supposed would fall in, within the current year, has not yet been sold, or the avails of it received into the Treasury.

When the true state of things became too obvious to be any longer successfully contested; when it became apparent to every one here and to the public that there was a large amount of public money lying in the deposit banks, and likely to remain there for years, an injury to the public, and beneficial to nobody, except bankers and brokers; and when no other means seemed to offer of resisting a distribution of this fund, the country became suddenly threatened with a foreign war—and, at one time, the walls of our Capitol were actually threatened with demolition by the great guns of the French navy—we were in imminent danger of invasion, and appropriations to the amount of more than $80,000,000 were called for by gentlemen who are in favor of economy and reform, to enable the Executive to prepare for defence. But this spectre vanished. Then we were threatened with Indian invasion and Indian massacre on our whole North-western frontier. The squabble with a miserable horde of naked savages in the swamps of Florida, which has engaged the attention of this warlike administration for the last year, was magnified into a general and formidable rising of all the tribes east of the Rocky Mountains, and military preparations were called for that we might be in armor to do battle with them. At last a report of the Secretary of War, sanctioned by the President, put an end to all this absurdity; the deposit bill passed, after a desperate struggle, and then came this measure—the Treasury order—intended to destroy its effect.

This order grew out of the contest to which I have referred. It was issued not by the advice of Congress or under the sanction of any law. It was delayed until Congress was fairly out of the city, and all possibility of interference by legislation was removed, and then came forth this new and last expedient. It was known that these funds, received for public lands, had become a chief source of revenue, and it may have occurred to some that the passage of a Treasury order of this kind would have a tendency to embarrass the country; and as the bill for the regulation of the deposits had just passed, the public might be brought to believe that all the mischief occasioned by the order was the effect of the distribution bill. It has, indeed, happened, that this scheme has failed; the public understand it rightly, but that was not by any means certain at the time the measure was devised. It was not then foreseen that the people would as generally see through the contrivance as it has since been found that they do.

There may have been various other motives which led to the measure. Many minds were probably to be consulted, for it is not to be presumed that a step like this was taken without consultation, and guided by the will of a single individual alone. That is not the way in which these things are done. No doubt one effect hoped for by some was, that a check would be given to the sales of the public lands. The operation of the order would naturally be, to raise the price of land by raising the price of the currency in which it was to be paid for. But, while this would be the effect on small buyers, those who purchased on a large scale would be enabled to sell at an advance of ten or fifteen per cent. over what would have been given if the United States lands had been open to purchasers in the ordinary way. Those who had borrowed money of the deposit banks and paid it out for lands, would thus be enabled to make sale to advantage, and by means of such sales make payment to the banks who found it necessary to call in their large loans, in order to meet the provisions of the deposit bill. The order, therefore, was likely to operate to the common benefit of the deposit banks and the great land dealers, while it counteracted the efforts of the obnoxious deposit bill.

There may have been yet another motive actuating some of those who devised this order. There was danger that the deposit banks, when called upon to refund the public treasure, would be unable to do it: indeed, it was said on this floor that the immediate effect of the distribution bill would be to break those banks. Now this Treasury order would operate to collect the specie of the country into the land offices, whence it would immediately go into the deposit banks, and would prove an acceptable aid to them while making the transfers required by law. These seem to me to have been among the real motives which led to the adoption of that order.

Mr. BENTON replied to Mr. EWING, and read a passage from the President's Message to show the reason for issuing the specie circular, and that it was to save the public lands from becoming the prey of speculators in exchange for worthless bank notes. He also read from a speech of Mr. WEBSTER, in 1816, to show the dangers of paper money and the duty of the Government to collect its duties and taxes in gold and silver only. The following is the extract read:

"Mr. W. said he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the House once more to the subject of the collection of the revenue, and to present the resolutions which he had submitted. He had been the more inclined to do this, from an apprehension that the rejection yesterday, of the bill which had been introduced, might be construed into an abandonment, on the part of the House, of all hope of remedying the existing evil. He had had, it was true, some objections against proceeding by way of bill, because the case was not one in which the law was deficient, but one in which the execution of the law was deficient. * * * The situation of the country, said Mr. W., in regard to the collection of its revenues, is most deplorable. With a perfectly sound legal currency, the national revenues are not collected in this currency, but in paper of various sorts, and various degrees of value. * * It is quite clear that by the statute all duties and taxes are required to be paid in the legal money of the United States, or in the Treasury notes, agreeably to a recent provision. It is just as clear that the law has been disregarded, and that the notes of the banks of a hundred different descriptions, and almost as many different values, have been received, and are still received, where the statute requires legal money or Treasury notes to be paid. * * There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper, because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain it than to obtain other paper or specie. But on these subjects it is that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to foresee the evil before every man feels it, and to take all necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience. * * * The only power which the Government possesses of restraining the issue of the State banks, is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or at least provide now for exercising it in reasonable time, because the currency of some part of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not yet universal. * * But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion, and I now repeat the opinion, that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. * * * It can hardly be doubted that the influence of the Treasury could have effected all this. If not, it could have withdrawn the deposits, and the countenance of the Government, from institutions which, against all rule and all propriety, were holding great sums in Government stocks, and making enormous profits from the circulation of their own dishonored paper. That which was most wanted was the designation of a time for the corresponding operation of banks of different places. They could have been made by the head of the Treasury better than by anybody, or everybody else. * * * This Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against defalcation or bad and depreciated paper. It is bound, also, to collect the taxes of the people on a uniform system." * * * * *

[Having read these passages from the speech of Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. BENTON thus concluded his own justification of the Treasury special order:]

the finances and the currency, as well as the public lands. The Bank of the United States regulated the State banks by the simple process of excluding their paper from the Federal receipts and expenditures; and this was effected by the 24th and 25th articles of the by-laws of the corporation already read. She excluded them to make room for her own notes; and this is the extent of her skill and of her merit in all this boasted regulation of local currencies of which we hear so much. The Federal Government has only to do the same, and the State bank issues are repelled upon their sources, and become comparatively harmless. It is receivability for federal dues; it is receivability at the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, which gives them wings to fly over the continent, and enables them to pass, without regard to the credit or solvency of the bank from which they come. It is the Federal Government endorsement which does the mischief; and this endorsement, for all the purposes of false credit and want of responsibility, is given to the whole issue of every bank whose paper is made receivable for public dues. The experiment has been tried, and local paper has failed as a national currency, and out of that failure arose the second United States Bank. It will fail again, and again, and forever! There is no safety for the federal revenues but in the total exclusion of local paper, and that from every branch of the revenue—customs, lands, and post office. There is no safety for the national finances but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver. After forty years of wandering in the wilderness of paper money, we have approached the confines of the constitutional medium. Seventy-five millions of specie in the country, with the prospect of annual increase of ten or twelve millions for the next four years, three branch mints to commence next spring, and the complete restoration of the gold currency, announce the success of President Jackson's great measures for the reform of the currency, and vindicate the constitution from the libel of having prescribed an impracticable currency. The success is complete; and there is no way to thwart it, but to put down the Treasury order, and to reopen the public lands to the inundation of paper money. Of this, it is not to be dissembled, there is great danger. Four deeply interested classes are at work to do it—speculators, local banks, United States Bank, and politicians out of power. They may succeed, but he (Mr. B.) would not despair. The darkest hour of night is just before the break of day; and, through the gloom ahead, he saw the bright vision of the constitutional currency erect, radiant, and victorious. Through regulation or explosion, success must eventually come. If reform measures go on, gold and silver will be gradually and temperately restored; if reform measures are stopped, then the paper system runs riot, and explodes from its own expansion. Then the Bank of the United States will exult in the catastrophe, and claim its own re-establishment, as the only adequate regulator of the local banks. Then it will be said the specie experiment has failed! But no; the contrary will be known, that the specie experiment has not failed, but it was put down by the voice and power of the interested classes, and must be put up again by the voice and power of the disinterested community.

Statements of Commerce and Navigation.

The joint resolution introduced some days ago by Mr. BENTON, providing for the earlier preparation of the annual report on commerce and navigation was read a third time, and passed—

When the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 15.

Mr. RIVES presented the credentials of RICHARD E. PARKER, Senator elect from Virginia; and

Mr. BROWN presented the credentials of ROBERT STRANGE, Senator elect from North Carolina.

MESSRS. STRANGE and PARKER appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

MONDAY, December 19.

THE CHAIR presented the credentials of Mr. BUCHANAN, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, for six years from the 4th of March next.

Mr. Clay's Land Bill.

Mr. CLAY, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose to ask leave to introduce the land bill.

The operation of the bill which had heretofore several times passed the Senate, and once the House, commenced on the last of December, 1822, and was to continue five years. It provided for a distribution of the nett proceeds of the public lands during that period, upon well-known principles. But the deposit act of the last session had disposed of so large a part of the divisible fund under the land bill, that he did not think it right, in the present state of the Treasury, to give the bill—which he was about to apply for leave to introduce—that retrospective character. He had accordingly, in the draught which he was going to submit, made the last day of the present month its commencement, and the last day of the year 1841 its termination. If it should pass, therefore, in this shape, the period of its duration will be the same as that prescribed in the former bills. The Senate will readily comprehend the motive for fixing the end of the year 1841, as it is at that time that the biennial reductions of ten per cent. upon the existing duties cease, according to the act of the 2d March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and a reduction of one-half of the excess beyond twenty per cent. of any duty then remaining is to take effect. By that time, a fair experiment of the land bill will have been made, and Congress can then determine whether the proceeds of the national domain shall continue to be equitably divided, or shall be applied to the current expenses of the Government.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the credentials of the Hon. JUDAH DANA, elected a Senator from the State of Maine, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. ETHER SHEPLEY; after which, the oath to support the Constitution of the United States was administered to Mr. DANA by the Vice President, and he took his seat.

Further Public Deposits with the States.

Mr. CALHOUN, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bill:

A bill to extend the provisions of certain sections therein named of the act of the 23d June, 1836, regulating the deposits of the money that may be in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1838.

Be it enacted, &c., That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, on the terms and according to the provisions of the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the act to regulate the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d day of June, 1836.

Mr. C., in introducing the bill, observed that he had not asked leave to introduce this bill without satisfying himself that there would be a large surplus of the public revenue remaining in the Treasury at the termination of the next year, after allowing for very liberal appropriations on all proper subjects of expenditure. From the calculations he had made, he was convinced that the amount of this surplus would not fall short of eight millions of dollars.

Assuming, then, that there would be a surplus, the question presented itself as to what should be done with it. That question Mr. C. would not now attempt to argue. The discussion of it at this time would be premature and out of place. He proposed to himself a more limited object, which was to state the points connected with this subject, which he considered as established; and to point out what was the real issue at present. One point was perfectly established by the proceedings of the last session—that, when there was an unavoidable surplus, it ought not to be left in the Treasury, or in the deposit banks, but should be deposited with the States. It was not only the most safe, but the most just, that the States should have the use of the money in preference to the banks. This, in fact, was the great and leading principle which lay at the foundation of the act of last session—an act that would forever distinguish the 24th Congress—an act which will go down with honor to posterity, as it had obtained the almost unanimous approbation of the present day. The passage had inspired the country with new hopes. It had been beheld abroad as a matter of wonder, a phenomenon in the fiscal world, such as could have sprung out of no institutions but ours, and which went in a powerful and impressive manner to illustrate the genius of our Government.

Mr. WALKER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance; and, in supporting his motion, observed that he had been one of those who voted against what was now openly avowed to be a distribution bill. Since the money had been distributed, some of the largest States had already come forward and applied to Congress for the repeal of that section of the bill which provided for the refunding of the money by the States, when it should be needed by the General Government. He would remind the Senate that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who had been one of the authors and advocates of this measure, did expressly tell the Senate that it would be but a single operation; and when the Senate were warned that that bill would be only a precedent for the distribution policy in future, the distinguished Senator had assured them of the contrary, and had insisted that it was a single and solitary measure, intended only to meet a contingency. Yet, what was the Senate now asked to do? To create a surplus for the purpose of future distribution. Mr. W. really thought that such a proposition demanded examination by some committee, and he hoped that the Senate would not consent to take a leap in the dark. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had presented, as one ground of his opposition to letting the public money remain in the deposit banks, a desire to prevent the public land from passing into the hands of speculators. But the gentleman's remedy had not met the evil. The distribution bill had not prevented the monopoly of the public lands by speculators, nor would it ever prevent it. If the gentleman did really desire to obviate that evil, let him join in recommending that part of the President's Message which proposed to limit the sale of the public lands to actual settlers. Should this recommendation be adopted, there would remain no surplus to be distributed. For how was the surplus created? By referring to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be found that, in the first three-quarters of the last year, twenty millions of dollars had been paid into the Treasury for the public lands, which was at the rate of about twenty-five millions a year. Yet, what portion of this amount was needed for actual settlers? Not more than $5,000,000; or, according to an estimate made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, not over $8,000,000. Thus there would be a reduction in the receipt of $16,000,000, being double the amount of the surplus predicted by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. Let him, then, adopt the President's recommendation, and the evil apprehended could not take place. But should the Senate pass the bill which had now been introduced, they would have passed the Rubicon, and the distribution policy would, in spite of all opposition, become the settled policy of the Government.

Mr. W. called upon the Senate and upon the country to remark that they were now invoked by the gentleman from South Carolina to create a surplus for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. BUCHANAN, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the bill, was in favor of its commitment. The subject extended itself into so many ramifications, was so complex and so extensive, that no leading measure ought to be adopted in relation to it without its previously undergoing the careful investigation of a committee. There were two counter projects now before the Senate, which were essentially incompatible with each other. One had been reported by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States on certain conditions; the other to deposit the surplus that might accrue, under the provisions of the bill of the last session. Both these plans, it was obvious, could not prevail; while the President had recommended the sale of the public domain to actual settlers only. On this matter Mr. B. expressed no opinion, but should be guided in a great measure by the wishes and opinions of gentlemen coming from the new States.

Should the President's recommendation be adopted, there would probably be no surplus. He should like to see a responsible report from the Committee on Finance. On the question whether there would or would not be a surplus on the 1st of January next he expressed no opinion.

The question of referring the bill to the Committee on Finance was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows:

YEES.—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wright—22.

The Chair voted in the affirmative, and so the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Treasury Circular.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of Mr. EWING's joint resolution, rescinding the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, and prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate the power to specify the kind of funds to be received in payment for the public lands. The question was on ordering the resolution to a second reading.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I am very glad that a resolution to rescind this order has been thus early introduced; and I am glad, too, since the resolution is to be opposed, that opposition comes early, in a bold, unequivocal, and decided form. The order, it seems, is to be defended as being both legal and useful. Let its defence, then, be made.

The honorable member from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) objects even to giving the resolution to rescind a second reading. He avails himself of his right, though it be not according to general practice, to arrest the progress of the measure at its first stage. This, at least, is open, bold, and manly warfare.

The honorable member, in his elaborate speech, founds his opposition to this resolution, and his support of the Treasury order, on those general principles respecting currency which he is known to entertain, and which he has maintained for many years. His opinions some of us regard as altogether ultra and impracticable; looking to a state of things not desirable in itself, even if it were practicable; and, if it were desirable, as being far beyond the power of this Government to bring about.

The honorable member has manifested much perseverance and abundant labor, most undoubtedly, in support of his opinions; he is understood, also, to have had countenance from high places; and what new hopes of success the present moment holds out to him, I am not able to judge, but we shall probably soon see. It is precisely on these general and long-known opinions that he rests his support of the Treasury order. A question, therefore, is at once raised between the gentleman's principles and opinions on the subject of the currency, and the principles and opinions which have generally prevailed in the country, and which are, and have been, entirely opposite to his. That question is now about to be put to the vote of the Senate. In the progress and by the termination of this discussion, we shall learn whether the gentleman's sentiments are or are not to prevail, so far, at least, as the Senate is concerned. The country will rejoice, I am sure, to see some declaration of the opinions of Congress on a subject about which so much has been said, and which is so well calculated, by its perpetual agitation, to disquiet and disturb the confidence of society.

The member from Missouri charges those who wish to rescind the Treasury order with two objects: first, to degrade and disgrace the President, and next, to overthrow the constitutional currency of the country.

For my own part, sir, I denounce nobody; I seek to degrade or disgrace nobody. Holding the order illegal and unwise, I shall certainly vote to rescind it; and, in the discharge of this duty, I hope I am not expected to shrink back, lest I should do something which might call in question the wisdom of the Secretary, or even of the President. And I hope that so much of independence as may be manifested by free discussion and an honest vote is not to cause denunciation from any quarter. If it should, let it come.

As to an attempt to overthrow the constitutional currency of the country, if I were now to enter into such a design, I should be beginning, at rather a late day, to wage war against the efforts of my whole political life. From my very first concern with public affairs, I have looked at the public currency as a matter of the highest interest, and hope I have given sufficient proofs of a disposition at all times to maintain it sound and secure, against all attacks and all dangers. When I first entered the other House of Congress, the currency was exceedingly deranged. Most of the banks had stopped payment, and the circulating medium had then become, indeed, paper money. So soon as a state of peace enabled us, I took some part in an effort, with others, to restore the currency to a better state; and success followed that effort.

But what is meant by the "constitutional currency," about which so much is said? What species, or forms of currency, does the constitution allow, and what does it forbid? It is plain enough that this depends on what we understand by currency. Currency, in a large, and perhaps, in a just sense, includes not only gold and silver and bank notes, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjusts exchanges, and settles balances, in the operations of trade and business. But if we understand by currency the legal money of the country, that which constitutes a lawful tender for debts, and is the statute measure of value, then, undoubtedly, nothing is included but gold and silver. Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender, in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints, or foreign coins, at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain, and of the very highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and, although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress has no power granted to it, in this respect, but to coin money, and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper, or any thing else, for coin, as a tender in payment of debts, and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power, fully, in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established, and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it, would shake the whole system.

I desire, sir, even at the expense of some repetition, to fix the attention of the Senate to this proposition, that Congress, having by the constitution authority to dispose of the public territory, has passed laws for the complete exercise of that power; laws which not only have fixed the price of the public lands, the manner of sales, and the time of payment, but which have fixed, also, with equal precision, the medium, or kinds of money, or of other things, which shall be received in payment. It has neglected no part of this important trust; it has delegated no part of it; it has left no ground, not an inch, for executive interposition.

The only question, therefore, is, what is the law, or what was the law, when the Secretary issued his order?

The Secretary considers that that which has been uniformly done for twenty years, that is to say, the receiving of payment for the public lands in the bills of specie-paying banks, is against law. He calls it an "indulgence," and this "indulgence" the order proposes to continue for a limited time, and in favor of a particular class of purchasers. If this were an indulgence, and against law, one might well ask, how has it happened that it should have continued so long, especially through recent years, marked by such a spirit of thorough and searching reform? It might be asked too, if this be illegal, and an indulgence only, why continue it longer, and especially why continue it as to some, and refuse to continue it as to others?

But, sir, it is time to turn to the statute, and to see what the legal provision is. On the 30th of April, 1816, a resolution passed both Houses of Congress. It was in the common form of a joint resolution, and was approved by the President; and no one doubts, I suppose, that, for the purpose intended by it, it was as authentic and valid as a law in any other form. It provides that, "from and after the 20th day of February next, (1817,) no duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable in specie on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

This joint resolution authoritatively fixed the rights of parties paying, and the duties of officers receiving. So far as respects the notes of the Bank of the United States, it was altered by a law of the last session; but, in all other particulars, it is, as I suppose, in full force, at the present moment; and as it expressly authorizes the receipt of such bank notes as are payable and paid on demand, I cannot understand how the receipt of such notes is a matter of "indulgence." We may as well say that to be allowed to pay in Treasury notes, or in foreign coins, or, indeed, in our own gold and silver, is an indulgence, since the act places all on the same ground.

The honorable member from Missouri has, indeed, himself furnished a complete answer to the Secretary's idea; that is to say, he defends the order on grounds not only differing from, but totally inconsistent with, those assumed by the Secretary. He does not consider the receipt of bank notes hitherto, or up to the time of issuing the order, as an indulgence, but as a lawful right while it lasted. How he proves this right to be now terminated, and terminated by force of the order, I shall consider presently. I only say now, that his argument entirely deprives the Secretary of the only ground assigned by him for the Treasury order.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Treasury order of the 11th of July is against the plain words and meaning of the law of 1816; against the whole practice of the Government under that law; against the honorable gentleman's own opinion, as expressed in his resolution of the 23d of April; and not reconcilable with the necessity which was supposed to exist for the passage of the act of last session.

THURSDAY, December 22.

Treasury Circular.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. EWING's resolution to rescind the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, and to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from delegating his power to specify what kind of funds shall be received in payment for the public lands.

Mr. NILES said there were reasons, he thought weighty reasons, which would justify Senators in voting against this resolution, without committing themselves in any sense, or in any degree, in regard to the great questions of currency and revenue, to which the Senator had referred. Without reference to what might be his opinion as to the true policy of the Government in the collection of the revenue, whether from the public lands or the customs, he was prepared to vote against this resolution. To pass this resolution, would be to censure and condemn an act of the Executive as being wrong, ab initio, or at the time of its adoption. Whether the rule prescribed in the Treasury order be a wise and just one, for the settled action of the Government, is a question entirely distinct from that, whether it may have been expedient and proper at the time it was adopted. He was satisfied that the Treasury order could be justified, viewed as a temporary measure only, intended to remedy evils of great magnitude, arising from the extraordinary circumstances connected with the sales of the public lands; and he was not sure that this was not the true light in which it ought to be considered. It was the duty of the Executive to watch over the public revenue, and see that it was secure. Was there no hazard from the extensive and gambling speculations in the public lands paid for only in bank bills, which were handed over by the receivers to the deposit banks and placed to the credit of the United States? A large portion of the purchases were paid for in bills of the deposit banks, which, after going into the hands of the receivers, were returned and loaned out again, to go through the same operation. This was virtually reviving the old credit system, as the United States received nothing but credit for the lands. If there was no hazard to the revenue from these practices, and from the magnitude and extent of the sales made upon this kind of credit, then gentlemen over the way had altered their opinions very much within the last six months. During the last session of Congress, we were repeatedly, and almost daily, told by those who now oppose the Treasury order, that the funds of the Government in the Western deposit banks were insecure, and that nothing but credit was received for the public lands. Can gentlemen have forgotten their often-repeated declarations on this subject? If so, they must be blessed with short memories. Again and again did Senators refer to the small amount of specie in those banks, and an impression was attempted to be made, that their specie funds were the only solid security for the large sums due the United States.

The order was calculated to correct, and, to a considerable extent, no doubt, has corrected, this evil. It insured something valuable for the lands, and that something valuable was transferred to the deposit banks, and formed a more solid basis for the Government credits.

The order was also calculated to check speculation in the public lands, which, in itself, was an evil of no small magnitude, transferring the best part of the national domain into the hands of heartless speculators, to the great injury of actual settlers, and the detriment of the whole country. Public opinion was rising up against it, and required that something should be done to arrest an evil of so extensive and serious a nature. What other or better measure could have been adopted, until Congress should convene, which might adopt such further legislation in regard to the sales of the lands as the public interests may require?

Sir, said Mr. N., there is another reason why I cannot vote for the resolution before the Senate. A new rule has been adopted in regard to the sale of the public lands, that has been in operation for a time and which has a tendency to check speculation. I would not repeal that rule, and open again the floodgates of speculation; certainly not until I know whether Congress will pass any act regulating the sale of the public lands. It is, I think, the duty of Congress to do this; the interest of the country requires it; public sentiment demands it; and it is strongly recommended by the President. If Congress suffer the session to pass off, without attempting to regulate the sale of the public lands so as to check speculation, they will neglect their duty to the country. Believing that there will be additional legislation on the subject, which may supersede the Treasury order, he was not at this time prepared to disturb it. Changes in any extensive business are always attended with some inconvenience, and should be avoided as much as possible. When it shall be settled that Congress will not alter the system, it may become necessary to decide whether the rule prescribed in the order shall be maintained, or the old practice restored; and if we do any thing on this subject, our action should be more comprehensive; it should embrace the whole subject, and be settled by law what currency shall be received for the payment of the revenues, not only from the lands, but from customs, and all other dues. The doubt and uncertainty which hangs over this subject ought to be removed.

For these reasons, therefore, he should vote against rescinding the Treasury order, even if he was satisfied that the rule it prescribes was not one which it would be expedient and just to establish as a settled policy.

The Expunging Resolution.

Mr. BENTON laid on the table a resolution to expunge from the journal of the Senate the resolution of March, 1834, censuring the conduct of the President for removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States, &c.; which was ordered to be printed. [The resolution is in the same words with the one on the same subject introduced by Mr. BENTON at the last session.]

TUESDAY, December 27.

Admission of Michigan.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, on the subject of the admission of Michigan into the Union, with documents, stating that Michigan had complied with the regulations of the conditional act of admission.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the Message and documents be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON remarked that, as the President had given his opinion that Michigan had complied with the requisite terms of admission, and as he had said that he should have issued his proclamation accordingly, had the information arrived during the recess of Congress, he (Mr. B.) regarded the proposed reference as a mere matter of form, and would prefer that a joint resolution of admission should forthwith be passed by both Houses.

Mr. GRUNDY would still prefer the course which he had suggested, and on this account: that the first convention had not assented to the terms of admission, but another convention had decided to accede to the proposition made by the Congress of the United States. The great inquiry now was, are the proceedings in accordance with the act of admission? The decision of which question depends on information which ought to be ascertained before the actual admission, though the President had said that, in his opinion, all was right, and, if the information had come during the recess, he would have acted accordingly. Mr. G. had no design to produce any delay, by a reference to a committee. He should not withdraw his motion, and he hoped the Senator would withdraw his opposition.

The Message was referred.

The Treasury Circular.

The Senate proceeded to the special order, the further consideration of the joint resolution introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, on this subject, the question being on the amendment or substitute offered by Mr. RIVES to that resolution; which substitute proposes to refuse to receive for the public dues the bills of such banks as issued, after certain specified periods, bills under certain specified denominations; the substitute also leaving in the power of the deposit banks to refuse such funds as they may think proper.

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Chair: Mr. President—The first resolution seeks to repeal the Treasury order—"the specie circular," as it is called—of the 11th of July, 1836. The second is intended to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury, by his authorized agents, from directing what funds shall be received for customs, or for the public lands, and prohibiting him from making any discrimination in the funds so receivable between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue. The main purpose of the resolution is to rescind the order of the Executive, bearing date on the 11th of July, 1836, directed to "receivers of public money and to the deposit banks."

Can this be accomplished? Is this matter within our power? It seems to me that if these resolutions should pass both Houses of Congress, the object which the Senator from Ohio has in view would not thereby be effected. If the order of the 11th of July, 1836, was issued by authority of law, the resolution of the Senator from Ohio should seek to repeal the law upon which the order is based, and which gave authority for issuing the order. If the order of the Secretary of the Treasury has not been issued in pursuance of law, the order itself is of no effect; and any resolution which we could pass, rescinding such an order, would be alike ineffectual.

If the Secretary had the legal power to send forth the order, it is beyond the legislative control of Congress. If the Secretary, or the President, through the Secretary, had the right to promulgate the circular, he may be answerable for the manner in which he exercises that right; but the act cannot itself be repealed by any legislation of Congress.

If the Secretary had not the authority, the power, the right to issue the order, then the order itself is perfectly nugatory.

The Executive is an independent branch of the Government. The Senate can have no more power over the rightful acts of that branch of the Government, than it has over an order of the House of Representatives, or an order of the Judiciary.

One branch of the Government, exercising its powers and its duties within the constitution and the law, cannot have its acts rescinded and set at naught by the action of any other branch of the Government.

If the order, then, has been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in pursuance of law, the mode proposed to get rid of it is objectionable, and, in my view, unwarrantable. If not issued in pursuance of law, the adoption of the resolution would seem to me equally objectionable and unwarrantable. In such a case, the officer should be, and ought to be, held amenable for such an assumption of power. It therefore occurs to me, that the object the Senator from Ohio has in view cannot be attained in the way proposed; and if the last resolution of the Senator from Ohio should be adopted, it seems to me that the direct effect would be to prohibit receivers from accepting the paper of local banks, under any circumstances, in payment of the public dues. It proposes, in terms, to take the power from the Secretary of the Treasury to designate the kind of money receivable; and, should it be adopted, if any effect shall be produced whatever, it will be to exclude from the offices of our receivers all local bank paper. They would be bound to take nothing but gold and silver, unless the joint resolution of April, 1816, is imperative and obligatory; and if that be so, the Executive had no authority to restrain the legal operation of that resolution; for, if binding, it gives to the debtor rights which cannot be infringed or taken away by executive power. If the order of July 11, 1836, was unauthorized, the resolution to rescind it would be unnecessary. Its adoption could not prevent the immediate promulgation of a similar order, in case the Executive, charged with the execution of the laws, should consider it to be his duty to do so. To accomplish the object the Senator from Ohio has in view, we must go beyond the order itself; we must go to the law on which that order was based, and in the execution of which it is presumed that the order in question was issued. To render the order of no effect, we must amend the law.

I propose, Mr. President, first to examine the question, whether the Executive had a legal authority to issue the order of the 11th of July, 1836; and, if he had the power, whether it was a matter of policy for him to exercise it at the time and under the circumstances he did.

Had the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the power to issue the order of the 11th of July last?

On this point I can entertain no doubt. It seems to my mind to be clear and free from difficulty; and so far from its being a wanton assumption of power, so far from its being illegal, it is a power in strict accordance with the requisitions of existing laws, and which the

President, charged with their execution, was bound to issue if he considered the public interest demanded it.

I cannot, then, consider the order of the 11th July last as illegal—as against the material binding provisions of the resolution of the 30th April, 1816. I cannot regard the issuing of that order as any assumption of power on the part of the President. And, for aught I see, the order must stand, unless the President shall see fit himself to withdraw it; or unless Congress, by its own legislation, shall take away the foundation upon which that order rests—shall pass some law that shall render the order itself inoperative.

In reference to the policy and expediency of that measure, I am free to admit that a great diversity of opinion is entertained by different portions of the business community. The President says that he directed the issuing of the order with a view to the safety of the public funds, and to the interests of the people generally. No man, unless familiarly acquainted with the state and condition of the banks which had in deposit the public funds, the practices of those institutions with reference to the facilities furnished to the purchasers of the public domain, the amount of the actual sales of the public lands, and the means used in making these acquisitions from time to time, could determine the policy, expediency, or necessity, of such an order as that which was issued on the 11th of July last.

The reasons which induced the President to direct the issuing of the specie circular, are given in the circular, and in the Message, and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me they were reasons in no way conflicting with the constitution or the law. Certainly some of the very reasons had been urged by gentlemen on the other side during the last session of Congress. To save the public domain from passing into the hands of speculators, to prevent an improper use of the public funds in deposit, to check the issues of overtrading banks, and to save the property of the nation, were among the reasons which induced the Executive to send forth the specie circular. And these very considerations were reiterated time and again on this floor in the course of the last session, in relation to the security and safety of the money of the nation then deposited in the State banks.

The President, then, was bound, if the reasons stated were founded in fact, to issue this order, which was to effect the very objects so much desired at the last session—the safety of the public funds, and the preservation of the public domain. The order could never have been issued from any political considerations—from any desire for individual popularity: every man must have known that its political effect would have been precisely that which has been produced. Higher considerations than a thirst for personal popularity, or for political distinction, must have prompted the President to have issued this order. It was nothing less than a settled conviction that the public interest demanded the measure. He designed it as a mere temporary expedient; and it remains now for Congress to decide whether any thing, and, if any thing, what shall be done in relation to this matter.

I have nothing further to add, in answer to the charge made against the Secretary, for the course pursued by him in the execution of the deposit bill. I should not have troubled the Senate with any remarks, had I not wished to avail myself of this opportunity to speak of that measure. I gave my vote in favor of that bill, and I have reason to believe that that vote has received the decided sanction of the yeomanry of New Hampshire. The bill passed both Houses of Congress by unexampled majorities, and yet the minority in the Senate, as well as in the House of Representatives, comprise some of our most distinguished statesmen and purest patriots. The bill, as it passed, was most emphatically and most truly nothing more nor less than a bill for the regulation, deposit, and safe keeping of the common treasure of the whole country. There is no room for doubt, with respect to the character of that measure. The thirteenth section of that bill, among other things, provides that the States receiving their proportion of the surplus shall pledge their faith “to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury.” Whatever may be the practical operation of this measure, it was regarded at the time in no other light than a bill to regulate the local banks having the public money in deposit, and to transfer from those banks portions of the common fund to places of greater security, the respective treasuries of the several States. I cannot believe that among those then belonging to the Senate, who gave to this bill their support, there was a single individual of the number, who would for a moment countenance the idea of taxing, directly or indirectly, the people for the purpose of distributing money to the people. I never could have yielded my assent to any such principle; and, in voting for the deposit bill, no Senator could believe that he was thereby yielding his assent to any such doctrine. I hold it to be subversive of the very foundation upon which rests our representative Government. Such a principle is opposed to the best and purest feelings of patriotism; to the letter, the spirit, the genius of our free institutions. I never could have given my vote for this bill as a distribution bill. This character has been most unjustly given to this measure here and elsewhere. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken if he supposes that it is so understood by the great body of the people of the States. The legislative act of New Hampshire shows most clearly the sentiments of that State with reference to this measure. She has voted to receive her portion of the money; but the legislation of that State has most sacredly guarded the principal as rightfully belonging to the United States; that while she considers herself justly entitled to the beneficial use of her portion of the surplus, so long as it shall remain uncalled for, she holds the principal to be of right the property of the General Government. It is true that New Hampshire by her act will deposit her share of the fund among the several towns of that State for safe keeping. But the State possesses the power, by her distress warrants, to enforce collection at any time, against any town which should neglect or refuse to pay when demanded; and the pending act subjects the town to indictment, in case any part of the principal of the money therein deposited should be used for any purpose; and the court are required to impose on such a town a fine equal to the part of the principal thus appropriated, and to issue execution against any such a town, to be levied and collected in the usual mode. Thus had his own State managed in relation to this matter; and gentlemen may be assured that whenever occasion shall demand that any portion of this money should be returned to the National Treasury, for the use of the General Government, that State will promptly and properly comply with such a demand.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Unexpended Appropriations.

Mr. BENTON rose to move the printing of the document from the Treasury Department, which had been called for on his motion, and had come in a few days ago. It was a document showing the unexpended balances of appropriations which would remain in the Treasury on the 1st day of January next, the amount of each balance, the object to which it was applicable, and the date of the law by which the appropriation was made. It was the amplification and substantiation of that part of the President's Message at the commencement of the session, in which he said that these unexpended balances were estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, and which are outstanding appropriations, to be met by reimbursements from the States, if the revenue fall short of meeting them; and that this large amount unexpended was the effect of the lateness of the period at which the appropriations had been made. This fourteen and a half millions has been called a surplus, for which the Government has no use; and it would seem that some States, acting on this idea, were for treating the deposit act as a distribution law, and using the money deposited with them, as if the Government in reality had no use for it. Nothing, he said, could be more erroneous than this idea. This fourteen and a half millions were not a surplus, but appropriated money—appropriated too late to be used this year, but remaining applicable to its objects, under the act of 1795, for two full years after the year in which the appropriation was made. The document contains a detailed statement of each object, and in the list would be found objects belonging to every branch of the public service; and every State would find some objects near and dear to itself, and for which the State had been long soliciting. Among these objects were the branch mints in the South and in New Orleans, the custom-houses in Boston and New York, the Treasury and Patent Offices in this city, many fortifications, roads, and block-houses, west of Missouri and Arkansas, half a dozen Indian tribes, and among them the Cherokee treaty, on which alone the balance was $4,245,000. This latter was a good specimen of the whole of these delayed appropriations, and illustrated the manner practised at the last session to create an unavoidable surplus. First, the ratification of the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible exertions made to defeat it; then the appropriation law under the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible efforts made to defeat it. Finally, on the 2d day of July, the appropriation passed; and then Mr. John Ross, a true coadjutor of the surplus party, went home to prevent the Indians from receiving the money; and succeeded; and so saved this four millions and a quarter for distribution, as a part of that unavoidable surplus for which the States are told, and even Georgia herself is told, the Federal Government has no use! Now, there was some use for this four and a quarter millions. The United States would have to raise it otherwise if she did not get it back from the States; for the compact with Georgia, made thirty-four years ago, and by which the United States obtained Alabama and Mississippi, will have to be carried into effect. And so of every object mentioned in the document. There were above two hundred of these objects, and money would have to be provided for carrying each of them into effect; for they were not of a nature to be abandoned; and this head of mine, (said Mr. B., putting his finger to his forehead,) this head of mine, as belonging to a member of the Finance Committee, was now occupied with this subject, and was considering how far duties could be reduced, and how far they would have to be kept up, and what tax otherwise unnecessary must be retained to supply the place of these fourteen and a half millions, if the deposit act is perverted by any of the States into a distribution law. Now, he wanted this fact carried home to the people of the States in such form that it could not be disputed. He would therefore move to have this document printed, and five copies sent to the Governor of each State, ten copies sent to each branch of the State Legislatures, and 1,000 extra copies be supplied to the Senate for its distribution.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to make a very few remarks on the very extraordinary motion of the Senator from Missouri, and to ask for the yeas and nays on the question. The sending out this paper in the manner proposed would make an erroneous impression on the minds of those to whom it would be sent, and would be an unusual departure from the ordinary practice of the Senate. Did not every Senator know that there was a large amount left in the Treasury, say five millions of dollars, by the deposit law of the last session, for the purpose of meeting these balances? Did not every Senator know that, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there were three millions of dollars of these appropriations that would not be wanted, and were therefore transferred to the surplus fund in pursuance of a standing law? And was there not, besides, a large sum in the hands of the disbursing officers of the Government? He knew, Mr. C. said, that every exertion would be made in order to defeat the deposit bill at this session. He knew well that the battle was yet to be fought—a battle in which the people would be on one side, and the office-holders and office-seekers on the other.

Election of Chaplain.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a chaplain. The Rev. Mr. Goodman, having received 22 votes, was duly elected.

THURSDAY, December 29.

Admission of Michigan.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union; which was, by consent, read twice.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the bill now receive its third reading; it was but short; the facts of the case were well known.

Mr. EWING objected to the bill's receiving its third reading at this time. It was far too important in its character to be hurried through the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN joined in the objection. He had not looked much at the question involved in the bill, nor was he acquainted with the facts of the case; but, assuming them to be as had been stated in the President's Message, this was one of the very gravest questions ever submitted to the Senate. It was certainly one which required to be maturely considered, and carefully weighed. He wished more time for reflection: first, that he might more accurately ascertain what the facts were; and, secondly, that he might weigh them in his mind with the care they demanded. He presumed others were of like mind; and, with a view to ascertain the wishes of the Senate, he would move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, and that it be made the order of the day for that day week.

Mr. GRUNDY did not object to allowing gentlemen a reasonable time, but thought the day named too distant. There was one good reason why the bill should receive an earlier consideration: the distribution of the deposits was to take place soon after the 1st day of January next, and it was desirable, if the bill was to pass at all, that it passed early enough to admit the State of Michigan to receive, with her sisters of the confederacy, her due proportion of the public moneys; but if the whole subject was put off, as had been moved, the passage of the bill might be so far delayed as to render this impossible. This, surely, was a strong argument for as early an attention to the subject as possible. As to the facts of the case, they were detailed in the President's Message, and in the documents which had been reported with the bill: he was fully aware that they presented a case, in regard to which the judgments of gentlemen might widely differ; but the facts themselves were few, and might soon be told. In June last, Congress had passed a bill declaring that, on certain conditions therein set forth, the new State of Michigan should be received into the Union: one of which was, that certain boundary lines should be assigned to the State; and another, that a convention of the people of Michigan, convened for the express purpose, should express their assent to these conditions, and agree to come into the confederacy on the terms prescribed. The act contained no directions as to the manner in which such convention should be called. A convention was ordered by the Legislature of Michigan; which met, and concluded to reject the conditions of admission, and communicated such dissent to the President of the United States. On farther reflection, however, without any particular form of legislation, the people themselves had since spontaneously met in their primary assemblies, and called a second convention, by which body it had been agreed to accept the conditions of the law, and thus to enter the confederacy. It was since ascertained that from 5,000 to 6,000 votes for this latter convention had been cast for the same members who had formerly decided to refuse the terms of admission, and from 8,000 to 9,000 in favor of men of a different opinion. This, he believed, was about as correct a statement of the facts of the case as could be obtained by greater delay. The question was certainly open as to the validity of the acts of this latter convention, on which, no doubt, there would be a diversity of opinion; but as to the facts there could be no dispute. It would appear, on examination, that although a majority of the people of Michigan had, at the date of the first convention, been opposed to accepting the terms of admission, yet, at the time the last was held, an overflowing majority had been in favor of the measure. When these facts should be found and admitted to be as stated, Mr. G. should give his views as to what ought to be the consequence. But he was anxious that the law should be passed in time for Michigan to get her proportion of the public money. The Secretary could not make the distribution on the first of the month, as all the returns would not then be in, but he might probably be in circumstances to do so within ten days thereafter.

Mr. CALHOUN said that no Senator was more anxious that the new State of Michigan should be received into the confederacy than himself, or could be more willing that she should obtain her due proportion of the public money placed in deposit with the several States. He desired to interpose no unnecessary delay, and would vary his motion so as to propose that this bill be made the order for Tuesday next. (Monday, he presumed, would scarcely be a business day, and many of the members might be absent.) According, however, to the statement given by the gentleman himself, there was at the bottom of this subject one of the gravest, the very gravest, questions which could be agitated; so grave, indeed, that important as he conceived the deposit act to be, he could almost prefer that their respective proportions of the surplus fund should be withheld from all the States, than that a bill like this should rashly be passed. He wished, he repeated it, more time for reflection.

Mr. MORRIS was one of the committee who had reported the bill, yet he did not concur in the preamble as reported. He did not, indeed, doubt that Michigan ought to be admitted into the Union, and should rejoice at her admission. But, as the chairman had correctly stated the act of Congress, providing for her admission, made it conditional, and required her previous assent to the condition, that assent was to be made known to the President of the United States. Now, the assent of the people of Michigan had not yet reached the President at the date of his last communication, and therefore Congress did not officially know the fact. The first question was, whether the Senate was competent to declare the act of the last convention a valid act. The law required that a convention should be called for the express object of expressing assent or dissent to the conditions of reception. Now, the Senate had learned from the President's Message that the people of Michigan had assembled in a convention called by their own Legislature, and had declared their dissent, and had communicated such dissent to the President. But, after this solemn act by a convention legally called, it seemed that there had another convention been gotten up without any authority of law, and on the acts of this body the present bill was founded. It involved questions of the highest magnitude. Mr. M. went on to express his opinion that the doings of the latter convention could be no guide for the legislation of Congress, who ought to act just as if no such body had ever met. He was of opinion that the third section of the admission law, which required the previous assent of the people of Michigan to conditions presented by Congress, was an imposition upon that people; but the correct mode would now be to repeal that act and to receive the State at once. The whole law had proceeded on the hypothesis that there was an unsettled boundary line between Michigan and the State south of her; but, as one of the Senators of that State, he considered the question of boundary as fully settled. He was willing to admit Michigan, but not on grounds which were unfounded in fact. He gave notice that he should, when the bill came up for consideration, move to strike out the preamble; it was intended as a key to the bill; but it was calculated rather to mislead than to guide to the true principle on which the bill was founded. It was possible that, on further reflection, he might change his mind; but such were his present impressions.

Mr. GRUNDY said that the committee, when draughting the bill, had also taken under consideration that view of the subject presented by the Senator from Ohio; and if, on Monday, the Senate should concur in that view, no regard would be had in the bill to the late convention accepting the terms of admission, and thus the object of admission would be attained. But it was on this ground that Mr. G. preferred the preamble: that Michigan could then never claim, as a State, what Congress had thus decided against. And, as there was an inveterate controversy between Michigan and Ohio, he thought it the better way to bind Michigan, so that under no pretext could she set up a claim to a section of country belonging to Ohio. If the preamble should be stricken out, the subject would be more open to controversy than if it should be retained. Mr. G. believed that, by the preamble, Michigan would be estopped from coming forward and claiming anything. It was merely on this ground that he was in favor of retaining the preamble. But, to obviate objections, he was willing that the bill should be postponed, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN was aware that the present was not the proper occasion to discuss the merits of the bill which had been reported: nor did he purpose to enter on its discussion; but, as other gentlemen had briefly stated their opinions on the subject, he should in like manner state what was his own view of the matter. He did not consider the subject of the bill as peculiarly grave or difficult, save as it was always a grave question whether a new State should be received into the Union. The language of the admission act, which had passed last year, was very plain to him, so much so, indeed, that he had expected the President would have issued his proclamation at once, without referring the question to Congress for decision. Mr. B. here quoted the act, and observed that it contained no provision requiring any legislative action on the part of Michigan, to authorize a convention of the people. It would have been improper that it should. He insisted it was perfectly competent for the people of that Territory to hold a convention spontaneously, without any application to the Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

Legislature about the matter; and if they had done so, the only question was whether such convention had decided to accept the conditions of admission which Congress had (very properly, in his judgment) required. He believed it had: and the case was therefore very plain. He understood there had been more votes, by 2,000 on both sides, given in this latter than in the first convention; and no matter how many unsuccessful attempts had previously been made, if their consent had at last been given, there was an end of the matter; they were clearly entitled to admission. He should not enter on the argument, but merely threw out his opinion, which he should be ready, at the proper time, to enforce with what little power he might command.

Mr. EWING concurred with his colleague (Mr. MORRIS) in the opinion that the last convention held in Michigan was altogether illegal and unauthorized. He saw in it nothing which was entitled to be called a convention of the people. He was also opposed to the preamble of the bill. He had not examined the bill itself, and could not say what might be his opinion of it, should the preamble be stricken out; but how much soever it might operate as an estoppel to the new State of Michigan from ever hereafter mootng again the vexed question of her boundary line, he was not in favor of having that estoppel effected by what he considered a mere fiction. [Mr. E. quoted the admission act, to show the conditions of admission.] Now, did any one suppose that it was a fulfilment of this condition for the people to rise up in their primary assemblies, without legal organization or civil authority, and declare their assent to the conditions of admission? Was society thus to be reduced to its elements, and was it to act without social organization? The act of Congress had recognized no such principle; it had recognized the principle of social organization; and to hold the validity of the acts of such an assemblage as had come together under the name of a convention of the people, was, in his judgment, so strange as to amount almost to an absurdity. Interested or not, he thought, in all fairness, the estoppel effected by such an act of assent ought not to be accepted and held binding. It was based upon an act that was wholly void. It was said, indeed, that a majority of the people had voted; but where was the evidence of any regular social organization in the convention? What guarantee did Congress possess that it had been convened according to the forms of the constitution? Who voted? Who notified the people at large of the time and place of meeting? Did the people all consent to such time, and such place? It was, at least, not probable they did. The people of this country were in the habit of looking to some regular and recognized authority in all their proceedings. A, B, and C, in a particular county, declaring that they would meet to consider this public question, did not lay the basis of a convention. How had the election of members of the convention been conducted? Who had been the judges of election? had they been sworn? if so, their oath must have been extrajudicial. And who had been permitted to vote? It had been said, there were two thousand more votes given on either side than in the first convention. That that number of votes had been counted he did not doubt; but where was the evidence that they had been given? No warrant, or qualifications of voters, had been alluded to. Mr. E. had no objection to the admission of Michigan, but let it be done regularly, and in a proper manner; and let nothing like trick be practised upon the people of the new State, by an estoppel improperly obtained against their claims.

Mr. MORRIS was very thankful for information that would show the ground on which the parties stood in the discussion. He understood the gentleman (Mr. BUCHANAN) thus: that all which was required of the people of Michigan was that they should choose a convention, and that such convention should assent to the act of admission. The gentleman even went further; if one convention had failed, the people might choose another, and so go on ad infinitum. This doctrine, Mr. M. thought, went directly to dissolve the whole elements of society, and to destroy all the obligations of law. It amounted to this: that if an act of Congress should be passed for the punishment of an offence, which act required a judicial investigation, the people might, notwithstanding, rise in an original assembly, and themselves inflict the punishment.

Again: if Michigan had adopted a constitution, it was bound to abide by that constitution. But this proposed act of Congress would give the people of Michigan the power to amend and add to that constitution. Mr. M. thought that doctrines of this kind ought not to be tolerated. And if such an original convention was proper, how was it to be created? Was one county to notify another, or one individual another? or how was it to be done? If the people of Michigan might act in this irregular way, then so might the people of any of the States, and all government and law would be thus already dissolved into their original elements, and the whole fabric of our institutions would be reduced to a shadow. And the fault would not be so much in the people of Michigan as in this proposed act of Congress. Mr. M. thought much mischief would follow the passage of the bill with such a preamble. It would be establishing by Congress the doctrine that we are not to be governed by law, but by popular frenzy. When the Legislature of Michigan passed the law authorizing a convention, was there any objection made to that law? But why pass the law, if the people might rise in an original convention? It was such a convention that at least accepted the terms of admission—a convention which, as the President had informed us, was got up without law; and the President had therefore not issued his proclamation of admission. It seemed to Mr. M. that all this was a wide departure from the constitution and laws of the country; and he should, therefore, at the proper time, move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BUCHANAN regretted that, in expressing a mere general opinion, he had unintentionally given rise to the present discussion. The Senator from Ohio, who had just taken his seat, had stated the ground he had taken in such strong terms, that Mr. B. supposed that if an angel from heaven should attempt to convince him of the contrary, he would labor in vain. That honorable Senator had discovered that he (Mr. B.) was a great latitudinarian; and that, if the principles he had stated should once be admitted, every thing would run to confusion. The people, it seemed, would rise, and not only legislate for themselves, but execute justice also!—(he presumed by Lynch law.) But he denied the justice of any such inferences from his doctrine. By what authority had the first convention been held? Not from any power given by the act of Congress to the Legislature of Michigan to pass a law calling a convention. Why, then, had such an act been passed? Clearly from the necessity of the case. Michigan had been acting as a sovereign State, and Congress had been treating with her touching her admission into the Union. It had been very proper in the Legislature to pass such a law; but the convention assembled under it had proved ineffectual. Congress had acted wisely in not requiring any act of the Legislature to give validity to the convention. The sovereign people of the State of Michigan had a right to do, in this matter, just what they should please to do. And even had the Legislature refused to pass a law calling a convention, the people would still have possessed the right to meet in their primary assemblies, and make their wishes known to the Legislature. He admitted that Congress should first be satisfied that the convention had acted in a regular manner, and had actually concurred in the conditions of admission. But, when this was provided, it was no longer a matter of favor to receive the new State. It was her right to come in. He should not go into the argument at this time; when the bill came up, he should be happy to meet the two Senators from Ohio in its discussion.

Mr. BENTON said it was impossible that any question could arise about the admission, on which every gentleman had not already made up his mind. The subject had already been four or five years before Congress. Mr. B. insisted that the question was a mere question of right—a right which existed four years ago, but which had been met at the threshold, and fought inch by inch, till, at the last session of Congress, the friends of the admission had determined to sit it out. The admission had been resisted in a manner unknown to the history of the country. And now it was to be put off till Monday, when the Senate had rather occasion to sit at night in these short days; and the nights would be necessary for the discussion of this question. If all the questions brought forward should be discussed, they must begin with Adam, who had but one woman to govern, and enter into the history of original conventions. There was no necessity of postponing till Monday. All the time would be little enough for them to get rid of what was pent up within them almost to bursting on this subject. But if postponed, then, when Monday should come, Mr. B. would come and sit down in his chair, and would camp on this ground till Michigan should be admitted.

The discussion ended by making the bill the order of the day for Monday next.

MONDAY, January 2, 1837.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN MCKINLEY, elected by the Legislature of the State of Alabama, a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March next.

Mr. PRESTON appeared in his seat to-day.

Land Bill.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee to whom it was referred, reported Mr. CLAY's land bill, with an amendment, striking out the whole bill save the enacting clause, and substituting another which restricts the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and to them in small quantities, accompanied with many guards against its being evaded by speculators.

Admission of Michigan.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the previous orders of the day be postponed, for the purpose of considering the bill to admit the State of Michigan into the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN was opposed to the motion; the documents accompanying the bill had but this morning been laid upon the tables, and no time had been allowed for even reading them over.

Mr. GRUNDY insisted on his motion. Of one point he was fully satisfied—that Michigan had a right to be received into the Union; on this, he presumed there would be but little difference of opinion, the chief difficulty having respect to the mode in which it was to be done. There seemed more difference of opinion, and he presumed there would be more debate, touching the preamble concerning the bill itself; but he could not consent to postpone the subject. Congress were daily passing laws the effect of which pressed immediately upon the people of Michigan, and concerning which they were entitled to have a voice and a vote upon this floor, and, therefore, the bill for their admission ought to receive the immediate action of the Senate. As to the documents, they were not numerous. The gentleman from South Carolina might readily run his eye over them, and he would perceive that the facts of the case were easily understood. Indeed, there was but one of any consequence, respecting which there was any controversy.

The orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

A bill to admit the State of Michigan into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Whereas, in pursuance of the act of Congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said State of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as described, declared, and established, in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the State of Michigan shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in carrying into effect the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," shall consider the State of Michigan as being one of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to strike out the preamble.

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate as follows:

To understand fully the objection to this bill, it is necessary that we should have a correct conception of the facts. They are few, and may be briefly told.

Some time previous to the last session of Congress, the Territory of Michigan, through its Legislature, authorized the people to meet in convention, for the purpose of forming a State Government. They met accordingly, and agreed upon a constitution, which they forthwith transmitted to Congress. It was fully discussed in this chamber, and, objectionable as the instrument was, an act was finally passed, which accepted the constitution, and declared Michigan to be a State, and admitted into the Union, on the single condition, that she should, by a convention of the people, assent to the boundaries prescribed by the act. Soon after our adjournment the Legislature of the State of Michigan (for she had been raised by our assent to the dignity of a State) called a convention of the people of the State, in conformity to the act, which met at the time appointed, at Ann Harbor. After full discussion, the convention withheld its assent, and formally transmitted the result to the President of the United States. This is the first part of the story. I will now give the sequel. Since then, during the last month, a self-constituted assembly met, professedly as a convention of the people of the State, but without the authority of the State. This unauthorized and lawless assemblage assume the high function of giving the assent of the State of Michigan to the condition of admission, as prescribed in the act of Congress. They communicated their assent to the Executive of the United States, and he to the Senate. The Senate referred his Message to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee, on its own authority, reported this present bill for the admission of the State.

Such are the facts out of which grows the important question, had this self-constituted assembly the authority to assent for the State? Had they the authority to do what is implied in giving assent to the condition of admission? That assent introduces the State into the Union, and pledges in the most solemn manner to the constitutional compact which binds these States in one confederated body; imposes on her all its obligations, and confers on her all its benefits. Had this irregular, self-constituted assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts of sovereignty in the name of the State of Michigan? She could only come in as a State, and none could act or speak for her without her express authority; and to assume the authority without her sanction is nothing short of treason against the State.

Again: the assent to the conditions prescribed by Congress implies an authority in those who gave it to supersede in part the constitution of the State of Michigan; for her constitution fixes the boundaries of the State as part of that instrument which the condition of admission entirely alters, and to that extent the assent would supersede the constitution; and thus the question is presented, whether this self-constituted assembly, styling itself a convention, had the authority to do an act which necessarily implies the right to supersede in part the constitution.

But further: The State of Michigan, through its Legislature, authorized a convention of the people, in order to determine whether the condition of admission should be assented to or not. The convention met; and, after mature deliberation, it dissented to the condition of admission; and thus again the question is presented, whether this self-called, self-constituted assemblage, this caucus—for it is entitled to no higher name—had the authority to annul the dissent of the State, solemnly given by a convention of the people, regularly convoked under the express authority of the constituted authorities of the State?

If all or any of these questions be answered in the negative—if the self-created assemblage of December had no authority to speak in the name of the State of Michigan—if none to supersede any portion of her constitution—if none to annul her dissent to the condition of admission regularly given by a convention of the people of the State, convoked by the authority of the State, to introduce her on its authority would be not only revolutionary and dangerous, but utterly repugnant to the principles of our constitution. The question then submitted to the Senate is, had that assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts?

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary holds that this self-constituted assemblage had the authority; and what is his reason? Why, truly, because a greater number of votes were given for those who constituted that assemblage than for those who constituted the convention of the people of the State, convened under its constituted authorities. This argument resolves itself into two questions—the first of fact, and the second of principle. I shall not discuss the first. It is not necessary to do so. But if it were, it would be easy to show that never was so important a fact so loosely testified. There is not one particle of official evidence before us. We had nothing but the private letters of individuals, who do not know even the numbers that voted on either occasion; they know nothing of the qualifications of voters, nor how their votes were received, nor by whom counted. Now, none knows better than the honorable chairman himself, that such testimony as is submitted to us to establish a fact of this moment, would not be received in the lowest magistrate's court in the land. But I waive this. I come to the question of the principle involved; and what is it? The argument is, that a greater number of persons voted for the last convention than for the first, and therefore the acts of the last, of right, abrogated those of the first; in other words, that mere numbers, without regard to the forms of law or the principles of the constitution, give authority. The authority of numbers, according to this argument, sets aside the authority of law and the constitution. Need I show that such a principle goes to the entire overthrow of our constitutional Government, and would subvert all social order? It is the identical principle which prompted the late revolutionary and anarchical movement in Maryland, and which has done more to shake confidence in our system of government than any event since the adoption of our constitution, but which happily has been frowned down by the patriotism and intelligence of the people of that State.

What was the ground of this insurrectionary measure, but that the government of Maryland did not represent the voice of the numerical majority of the people of Maryland, and that the authority of law and constitution was nothing against that of numbers. Here we find, on this floor, and from the head of the Judiciary Committee, the same principle revived, and, if possible, in a worse form; for, in Maryland, the anarchists assumed that they were sustained by the numerical majority of the people of the State in their revolutionary movements; but the utmost the chairman can pretend to have is a mere plurality. The largest number of votes claimed for the self-created assemblage is 8,000; and no man will undertake to say that this constitutes any thing like a majority of the voters of Michigan; and he claims the high authority which he does for it, not because it is a majority of the people of Michigan, but because it is a greater number than voted for the authorized convention of the people that refused to agree to the condition of admission. It may be shown by his own witness, that a majority of the voters of Michigan greatly exceed 8,000. Mr. Williams, the president of the self-created assemblage, stated that the population of that State amounted to nearly 200,000 persons. If so, there cannot be less than from 25,000 to 30,000 voters, considering how nearly universal the right of suffrage is under its constitution; and it thus appears that this irregular, self-constituted meeting did not represent the vote of one-third of the State; and yet, on a mere principle of plurality, we are to supersede the constitution of Michigan, and annul the act of a convention of the people regularly convened under the authority of the government of the State.

But, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) this assembly was not self-constituted. It met under the authority of an act of Congress; and that act had no reference to the State, but only to the people; and that the assemblage in December was just such a meeting as that act contemplated. It is not my intention to discuss the question whether the honorable Senator has given the true interpretation of the act, but, if it were, I could very easily show his interpretation to be erroneous; for, if such had been the intention of Congress, the act surely would have specified the time when the convention was to be held, who were to be the managers, who the voters, and would not have left it to individuals who might choose to assume the authority to determine all these important points. I might also readily show that the word "convention" of the people, as used in law or the constitution, always means a meeting of the people regularly convened by the constituted authority of the State, in their high sovereign capacity, and that it never means such an assemblage as the one in question. But I waive this; I take higher ground. If the act be, indeed, such as the Senator says it is, then I maintain that it is utterly opposed to the fundamental principles of our federal Union. Congress has no right whatever to call a convention in a State. It can call but one convention, and that is a convention of the people of the United States to amend the federal constitution; nor can it call that, except authorized by two-thirds of the States.

Ours is a federal republic—a union of States. Michigan is a State—a State in the course of admission—and differing only from the other States in her federal relations. She is declared to be a State in the most solemn manner by your own act. She can come into the Union only as a State, and by her voluntary assent, given by the people of the State in convention, called by the constituted authority of the State.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

To admit the State of Michigan, on the authority of a self-created meeting, or one called by the direct authority of Congress, passing by the authorities of the State, would be the most monstrous proceeding under our constitution that can be conceived; the most repugnant to its principles, and dangerous in its consequences. It would establish a direct relation between the individual citizens of a State and the General Government, in utter subversion of the federal character of our system. The relation of the citizens to this Government is through the States exclusively. They are subject to its authority and laws only because the State has assented they should be. If she dissents, their assent is nothing; and, on the other hand, if she assents, their dissent is nothing. It is through the State, then, and through the State alone, that the United States Government can have any connection with the people of a State; and does not, then, the Senator from Pennsylvania see, that if Congress can authorize a convention of the people in the State of Michigan, without the authority of the State, it matters not what is the object, it may in like manner authorize conventions in any other State, for whatever purpose it may think proper?

Michigan is as much a sovereign State as any other; differing only, as I have said, as to her federal relations. If we give our sanction to the assemblage of December, on the principle laid down by the Senator from Pennsylvania, then we establish the doctrine that Congress has power to call at pleasure conventions within the States. Is there a Senator on this floor who will assent to such a doctrine? Is there one, especially, who represents the smaller States of this Union, or the weaker section? Admit the power, and every vestige of State rights would be destroyed. Our system would be subverted, and, instead of a confederacy of free and sovereign States, we would have all power concentrated here, and this would become the most odious despotism. He, indeed, must be blind, who does not see that such a power would give the Federal Government a complete control of all the States. I call upon Senators now to arrest a doctrine so dangerous. Let it be remembered that, under our system, bad precedents live forever; good ones only perish. We may not feel all the evil consequences at once, but this precedent, once set, will surely be received, and will become the instrument of infinite evil.

It will be asked, what shall be done? Will you refuse to admit Michigan into the Union? I answer, no; I desire to admit her; and if the Senators from Indiana and Ohio will agree, I am ready now to admit her as she stood at the beginning of last session, without giving sanction to the unauthorized assemblage of December.

But if that does not meet their wishes, there is still another by which she may be admitted. We are told that two-thirds of the Legislature and people of Michigan are in favor of accepting the conditions of the act of last session. If that be the fact, then all that is necessary is, that the Legislature should call another convention. All difficulty will thus be removed, and there will be still abundant time for her admission at this session. And shall we, for the sake of gaining a few months, give our assent to a bill fraught with principles so monstrous as this?

We have been told, that unless she is admitted immediately, it will be too late for her to receive her proportion of the surplus revenue under the deposit bill. I trust that on so great a question a difficulty like this will have no weight. Give her at once her full share. I am ready to do so at once, without waiting her admission. I was mortified to hear on so grave a question such motives assigned for her admission, contrary to the law and constitution. Such considerations ought not to be presented when we are settling great constitutional principles. I trust that we shall pass by all such frivolous motives on this occasion, and take ground on the great and fundamental principle that an informal, irregular, self-constituted assembly, a mere caucus, has no authority to speak for a sovereign State in any case whatever; to supersede its constitution, or to reverse its dissent deliberately given by a convention of the people of the State, regularly convened under its constituted authority.

Mr. GRUNDY confessed that he could not see any thing in the whole proceedings calculated to excite alarm. The Senator (Mr. CALHOUN) had told the Senate that a proceeding in Maryland had excited more apprehension in regard to our institutions than any thing that had occurred since the establishment of our Government. Now, that was the gentleman's opinion; but he (Mr. G.) had seen the time when there was felt more solicitude with respect to the stability of our Union than what had recently happened in Maryland, or in the proceedings which had been adopted in Michigan. In order to determine the question before the Senate, it might be as well to take a short review of the facts and circumstances connected with it.

By the ordinance of 1787 it was provided that this Territory, and all portions of the territory ceded by the State of Virginia north-west of the Ohio, should be admitted as a State, not by conventions called for the purpose of ratifying a proposal made by Congress, but upon the fair condition that when their population should have amounted to a certain number. Michigan, at the time she first applied to be admitted into the Union, possessed a population of one-third more than was required by the ordinance of 1787. But he should state that, before asking for admission, as she had a right to do, she called a convention, and framed a constitution. The General Government had at that time a right (without prescribing the terms to be found in the act of the 2d March, 1836) to receive her into the Union. But what did Congress do? Did they comply with her request, or with the terms of the ordinance? No. Congress prescribed different provisions from any to be found in the ordinance. Now, according to the view he took of the subject, this sovereign and independent State, having the same right to be represented on that floor as South Carolina or Tennessee, has been for a long time kept knocking at the doors of Congress, and still they were shut against them. He would, having said this much, say nothing further on this part of the subject.

At the last session, and for some sessions previous to that, a very serious controversy had arisen between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan. What, he asked, did Congress do, in its great desire to see tranquillity and harmony restored between them? It passed the act of 1836. And yet the Senator from Ohio (Mr. EWING) now wanted to see no such provision as that contained in the act of 1836, and which he (Mr. GRUNDY) believed to have been placed there by the committee in the proper discharge of their duty, and which he thought commendable in them.

[Mr. EWING explained. I contended for the third section. I thought it of no importance then, nor do I now.]

Mr. GRUNDY resumed. He was speaking of the Senator's exertions in regard to another bill, or other bills, which were introduced to fix the northern boundary of the State of Ohio; and before that was accomplished Senators insisted that Michigan could not be admitted into the Union. Well, what was the objection now to her admission? None that he could see. But when the Senate came to pass this act of admission, they put in this section:

"That, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as in that section described declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required," &c.

Now, that was the provision to which this preamble has a reference. Did that section say that the Legislative Assembly of Michigan should call a convention to decide on the subject? Not a word did it contain to that effect. Did the constitution of Michigan authorize the calling of a convention on the part of the Legislature? Not a word did the constitution contain on the subject? But the Legislature did call a convention, and they refused to assent to the conditions contained in the act of Congress.

Now, to judge that Congress did not intend putting a legal construction on the section, that the intervention of the Legislature should be necessary, let him suppose that the Legislature should refuse to act, and consequently call no convention, and the people of Michigan had risen up una voca, and given their assent to the meeting in convention, would gentlemen have said "the convention must be called by the Legislature?" Now, this was the consent of the people of Michigan—of the population entitled to vote, residing there. And shall the Legislature of that State have the power to refuse or grant that which the people may demand on so important a subject as this? It seemed to him it ought not to be required; and, therefore, the conclusion he drew from the question was, that the people have a right to convoke their assemblies, the delegates from which have a right to meet in convention, and there, if they deem proper, ratify the conditions prescribed by Congress. If he were right in that conclusion, then the preamble was correct; and if wrong, it ought to be struck out. He felt no concern in regard to this branch of the subject at all. He was free to admit that, without the preamble, he was ready to vote for the bill. But for the third section of the act of 1836, let him tell the Senate, Michigan would have been represented here, and in the other House, long ago. Well, now the people have been called upon in their primary capacity, and have given their assent to the conditions of Congress, why should the Senate cause further delay in admitting her? The Senator from South Carolina had said it would not take long to have another convention. He (Mr. G.) admitted it; but every moment did her injury. Senators were, by delay, violating a greater principle than that of which the gentleman had spoken. It was a greater infraction of principle than any known to free government.

He admitted, with the Senator from South Carolina, that the testimony establishing the fact of the assent of the people of Michigan was of great importance, and in this case not according to the strict rules of legality; yet the testimony was of such a character that Legislatures would not refuse to act upon it, although courts of justice would reject it, because not duly accredited by the oaths of witnesses. But did not Senators do daily many acts upon testimony not on oath, but for which the statements of men of high standing, honor, and honesty, guaranteed their truth?

What, he asked, was the amount of the testimony produced? Why, that between five and six thousand votes were given at the election of members for the convention in September last, and that from eight to nine thousand were given for the delegates who formed the convention in December. What was the object in calling upon the people of Michigan? It was to know whether they were willing to come into the Union on the terms prescribed by the act of the 2d of March, 1836. They have answered, and given their assent. In one county there was given at the first election for the delegates who were elected, 180 votes of a majority. These delegates constituted the majority in the first convention; and by their votes the assent of Michigan was refused. At the first election, about 1,700 votes were cast, including both parties. At the last election, 1,900 votes were given in favor of the assenting party alone. The whole thing was changed, and must have been changed by the revolution of opinion.

Without going further into the subject, he wanted the Senator from South Carolina to inform the Senate how he would do justice to the people of Michigan; and, further, how the passage of the bill was to be obtained in any form. Would he send the people back again to a convention? The delay was unnecessary, and objections would be made of a similar character. Why should the Senator not vote for the bill, the preamble being struck out. What difficulty was there in it? For his (Mr. G.'s) part, he could not see any. He contended that there was nothing of a political character in this matter, either on one side or the other; therefore, it was fairly on principle that a difference of opinion could be said to exist. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, "Can Congress call a convention in a State?" he answered, "No!" nor did it in this instance; neither does the preamble or bill give such a power, nor imply it. He would conclude his remarks by merely declaring that, whether the preamble should be stricken from the bill or not, he would vote for it.

TUESDAY, January 3.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill declaring the admission into the Union of

The State of Michigan.

The question pending was on a motion made yesterday by Mr. MORRIS to strike out the preamble of the bill. This motion Mr. M. now varied, by moving an amendment to the preamble, (recapitulating the proceedings in Michigan under the act of the last session of Congress for the admission of the State,) which modification he was desirous of trying before the question should be taken on striking out the preamble.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said: To the bill now before the Senate I have no other objection than that which I stated at the last session, viz: that I feel reluctant to admit a new State into the Union, unless she come in regularly, in accordance with a law of Congress previously enacted.

But I waived this objection in the case of Arkansas, because a precedent had been set by the admission of Michigan at the last session. Still, however, I think it wrong; the practice is loose, irregular, and calculated to lead to bad consequences. And I think it proper to say that in the present question, in any of its forms, the State of Ohio has no interest whatever; none in the preamble, none in the bill itself, save that interest which she shares in common with all the other members of the confederacy; and, in voting on this question, I shall vote precisely as if Ohio were the most distant State in the Union from Michigan, instead of being separated from it only by a boundary line, which line was once disputed.

On this subject my colleague and myself entirely concur. Indeed, we have from the first differed but little in our opinion as to the controversy lately pending between our State and Michigan; but we here concur entirely as to the effect of this preamble upon her, and we may fairly assume that we speak the opinion and feelings of the State on that point. We hold this preamble untrue in fact, and of most dangerous tendency. Our State, for whose benefit gentlemen profess to have inserted it, has no interest in the thing. She does not ask for it; and if she had an interest, no matter how deep and vital, she would not consent that that interest should be subserved by stating, in a solemn act of legislation, that which is untrue.

Permit me to reiterate that there exists at this moment no controversy whatever between Ohio and Michigan, nor does there exist, at least on the part of the citizens of Ohio, the slightest feeling of enmity toward their neighboring fellow-citizens. There is no such feeling there; and I well know there is none here. The controversy which once agitated and excited them is now settled. Congress, by its act, has assented to the boundary claimed by Ohio in 1803, before Michigan was erected into a Territory; and unless the act of 1805 is irrevocable, there can never again be any controversy between Ohio and Michigan on the question of boundary. If it is pronounced irrevocable, then it is not in the power of Congress to modify or touch it, and the boundary therein specified will be declared by the Supreme Court to be the true boundary. But if that act is not irrevocable, we are so affected by it that it never can be revived against Ohio.

But I said the preamble to this bill asserts what is not a fact. I shall endeavor to make that position good. What is its language?

"Whereas, in pursuance of the act of Congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled 'An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed,' a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said State of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as described, declared, and established, in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore"—

Now, I take it that, in the insertion of this preamble, the Judiciary Committee meant to declare that the convention referred to was a legal convention; that it was such a convention as is contemplated in the act of Congress for the admission of Michigan into the Union; that it was a convention according to law. This is the fact asserted in the preamble, and this I controvert.

The evidence is well condensed in the recital which my colleague offered as an amendment to the preamble, and we have it more at large from the President, in his official communication now on our tables. From this it appears that a convention, called by an act of the Legislature of Michigan, did assemble, and, after deliberation, did refuse to enter the Union under the conditions of the act of Congress, and that their dissent was forwarded to the Executive. Now, it is said by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) this convention was not held according to the act of Congress; that Congress directed the people to meet; and that no reference was had in the act to the interposition of the Legislature of Michigan; but that a subsequent convention, which, it is said, afterwards assembled, alone satisfied the law. The question, then, is between the two conventions. If the first was legal, the last was not. If the first was not legal, then we may inquire into the legality of the second. Now, let me put one question to that honorable Senator; I ask him whether, had the first convention, instead of rejecting, accepted the conditions contained in the act of Congress, would he, in that case, have held that assent illegal? Would he then have said that it was a convention not held according to the act of Congress? I would almost venture to say that he would not; I rather think the convention would have passed pretty well. But if so, what has altered the matter? If that was a proper mode of calling a convention which assented, why was it not a proper mode of calling a convention which refused its assent? But after the convention assembled by the Legislature of the State of Michigan (for our act did recognize her as a State, though I think very improperly) had dissented, no attempt whatever was made by the constituted authorities of the State to bring together another; none whatever. But an assemblage of the people, in meetings which are familiarly denominated caucuses, was held in some of the counties, and mutually agreed to call a new convention. Committees get together, and, after consultation, publish a time and place at which it is to assemble. The whole matter was utterly unauthorized, save by party organization, and was the effect of such organization. Will any man dispute it? Will any man pretend that this latter convention was the effect of a simultaneous and spontaneous impulse of the whole people of Michigan? Is there any, the least proof of such being the fact? The convention originated in county calls; and all the counties but two joined in the plan, and held elections for delegates. What evidence is there of any regularity in these elections?

Let us look at the papers. We have, to be sure, the act of the convention itself, giving the assent of the State to the act of admission, and which was transmitted to the President of the United States. And we have the certificate of General Williams, said to have been the presiding officer of the convention, and the names of the delegates. But there is not any official act or signature of any officer known to the laws either of Michigan or of the United States; not the slightest proof of their election or qualification. That paper, containing the assent of Michigan in a matter so important, is not at all authenticated. Where do you find the law according to which it was conducted? There is none. It rests on nothing. There was a meeting of certain individuals held at a place called, I believe, Ann Arbor; and we have certain resolutions of theirs, which are to avail against the doings of a convention held in pursuance of a law of the State, and all whose acts are fully and legally authenticated. I cannot recognize such a paper. I must do violence to my own judgment, should I receive it. Even the chairman of the Judiciary Committee could not do it. He called upon the Senators elect (and whose admission here is to follow the passage of the bill) to say that every thing at this self-styled convention was well and duly conducted; and they do say so, and give the private letters of certain individuals to that effect. And they give, further—and that I understand to be the evidence principally relied on—an article from a Detroit newspaper, stating that such an election was had, such convention held, 3,000 more votes were given for the delegates to this last convention than for those who constituted the first convention. This, sir, is the evidence to support an organic law of a new State about to enter the Union! Yes, of an organic law, the very highest act a community of men can perform. Letters, referring to other letters! and a scrap of a newspaper!

I am not satisfied that the Government of my country, or of any portion of it, should stand on such a foundation. I am not willing that an organic law of a sovereign State should be thus made and thus authenticated.

But supposing that all the counties of Michigan did agree to the proposal, and did send delegates to this last convention, and we had the returns of the elections; yet who, I ask, presided at the polls? Who determined what votes should be received? How many votes was each man who favored the object permitted to give? Who voted? Was it the qualified electors, or was it all the men, women, and children, of Michigan and its vicinity?

Mr. BUCHANAN said: Mr. President, judging from the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) this would seem to be a question big with the fate of the constitution and the country. According to him, the adoption of the preamble to the bill admitting Michigan into the Union, as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, would entail upon us evils as numerous and as deadly as those contained in Pandora's box, whilst hope would not even remain. After depicting in melancholy colors the cruel destiny of our country, should this precedent be established, he concludes by saying, that in such an event this Government would become "one of the most odious and despotic Governments that ever existed on the face of the earth."

I presume it is attributable to my colder temperament that I feel none of these terrors. In my opinion, they spring altogether from the Senator's ardent imagination and creative genius. Since I came into public life, I have known the country to be ruined at least twenty times, in the opinion of gentlemen; yet it would seem that the more we are thus ruined, the more we flourish. Experience has taught me to pay little attention to these doleful predictions.

Admission of Michigan.

The best answer which can be given to the Senator is to come at once to the question. To state it in its plain and simple character will at once dissipate every fear. Its decision will be attended with but little difficulty, because it involves no new principles; and as to its importance as a precedent, we shall probably never hear of it again, after the admission of Michigan into the Union.

What, then, is the question? On this subject our memories would seem to be strangely in fault. We cannot recollect from one session to the other. I wish to recall the attention of Senators to the fact. It was deemed of great importance at the last session to obtain the consent of Michigan to the settlement of the boundary between her and Ohio. To accomplish this purpose was then of so much consequence, in our opinion, that we offered to Michigan a large territory on her northern boundary, as a compensation for what she should yield to Ohio on the south; and we made her acceptance of this offer a condition precedent of her admission into the Union. We then believed, and I still believe, that this was the only mode of settling forever the disputed boundary between Ohio and Michigan, which has already involved us in so many difficulties, threatening bloodshed and civil war on that frontier. This was then deemed the only mode of obtaining an absolute relinquishment of all claim, on the part of the people of Michigan, to the territory in dispute with Ohio. It became my duty at the last session to investigate this subject thoroughly; and I had many conferences upon it with the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, (Mr. CLAYTON)—a man of as clear a head and as honest a heart as ever adorned this chamber. I am happy to state that, although we concurred in opinion that Michigan had no right to this territory under the compact of 1787, yet we also believed that the only mode of putting the question at rest forever was to obtain her own solemn recognition of the right of Ohio. For this very purpose, the third section was inserted in the act of the last session, declaring "that, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission" into the Union, the boundaries of the State of Michigan, as we then established them, "shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required."

Shall we now, after Michigan has given this assent in the terms prescribed, release her from this obligation? Shall we now strike out the preamble by which we recognize the validity and binding effect of the assent given by the last convention of delegates, and thus throw the boundary question again open? Shall we undo all we have done with so much care at the last session, and admit Michigan into the Union as though we had never required from her any assent to this condition? I trust not. And here permit me to express my astonishment that the Senators from Ohio should both advocate this course. I have no right to judge for them, but it does seem to me they are willing to abandon the only security which we have against a repetition of the scenes which we have already witnessed on the frontiers of Ohio and Michigan.

To show that my fears are not vain, let me present the state in which this question will be placed, in case we do not adopt the preamble. I think I may assert, with perfect safety, that there are ninety-nine citizens of Michigan out of every hundred who firmly believe that the ordinance of 1787 fixes irrevocably the southern boundary of that State. If this were its correct construction, it will not be denied by any that no human power can change it without the consent of the people of Michigan. This ordinance, which is confirmed by the Constitution of the United States, to use its own language, is a compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory, and must forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent. Hence the vast importance of obtaining the consent of Michigan to the proposed change in her boundary. The language of the ordinance under which she claims the disputed territory is as follows: "Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States (Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois) shall be subject so far to be altered that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan." Michigan contends that Congress having determined to form two States north of this line, the ordinance makes it irrevocably her southern boundary. Some of the most distinguished men in the country, we know, are of this opinion. Can any Senator, therefore, believe for a moment that, if we now leave this question unsettled, it will never be tried by Michigan? Can we believe that she will acquiesce in a decision of Congress which a vast majority of her people believe to have been unjust? Release her from the assent which she has given to the settlement of this question, and then it remains as open as it ever was. The point, then, to be decided is, whether the ordinance does fix her southern boundary or not. Admitting it did, it is manifest that the act of Congress repealing it, and giving the territory in dispute to Ohio, would be a violation of its provisions, and thus become a dead letter.

Yes, sir, the consent of Michigan is all-important to the peace and quiet of the Union; and now, when we have obtained it, shall we cast it away by rejecting this preamble? That is the question which I shall now proceed to discuss.

Why, then, should we reject this preamble, which will forever terminate the dispute between these two States? Because, says the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) this convention of delegates, elected by the people of Michigan, was not authorized by a previous act of their State Legislature, and therefore their proceedings are a nullity. It is revolutionary, it is dangerous in itself to our rights and liberties, and still more dangerous as a precedent for future cases. If this be true, the people of Michigan are in a most unfortunate position. At the last session of Congress, if we had attempted to insert in the bill a provision to make the previous act of the Legislature necessary, it would then have been opposed as a revolutionary measure. It would have been demonstrated by Senators that the Legislature of Michigan was an unauthorized assembly, possessing no legitimate powers; that it was a body which we had never recognized; and, therefore, we could refer nothing to its decision. In making these assertions, I speak from the record.

It appears from the journals that, on the 26th of January last, the Vice President communicated to the Senate "the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan," on the subject of their right to be admitted into the Union. On the motion of Mr. Hendricks, this memorial was referred, accompanied by a declaration "that the Senate regard the same in no other light than as the voluntary act of private individuals." Mr. Ruggles moved to strike out this declaration; and, on the yeas and nays, his motion was rejected by a vote of 30 to 12. Thus the Senate then solemnly determined that the Legislature of Michigan was a mere assembly of private individuals; and yet now we are told by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that, because this very Legislature did not pass an act to authorize the holding of the convention, all its proceedings are void and revolutionary. How will he reconcile this inconsistency? Truly, the people of Michigan are in a deplorable condition. They cannot avoid the whirlpool of Scylla without being engulfed in Charybdis. At the last session, their Legislature was a mere lawless assembly; but now they are so omnipotent that the sovereign people of the State cannot elect delegates to a convention without their previous authority. Let us proceed one step further with our evidence from the record. The bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union, when first reported by the committee, provided that the assent to the boundaries of the State, required by the third section, should be given by their Senators and Representative in Congress, and by the Legislature of the State. I speak from memory, but I feel confident I am correct. It would have been a vain attempt to support this provision in the face of the vote of the Senate to which I have referred. What, sir, refer to a body whom we had solemnly declared was composed merely of private individuals the question of assent to a condition for the purpose of binding the sovereign people of Michigan! This would have been as absurd as it was inconsistent. We should then have been told that there was no mode of escaping this difficulty but by at once dispensing with every intermediate agency, and referring the question directly to the original source of power, the people of Michigan in their primary capacity. This was done, and that, too, by a unanimous vote of the Senate. On the 1st of April last, Mr. Wright moved to strike out the provision to which I have referred, and to insert in its stead that the assent required should be given by "a convention of delegates elected by the people of the said State for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required." Every Senator then in his place voted for this amendment, and by his vote decided that it was proper to submit the question to delegates elected by the people in their primary capacity. It was thus unanimously incorporated into the law.

How does the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) now attempt to evade the force of this argument? He cannot contend that the act of Congress refers to any action of the State Legislature as being necessary to the call of this convention. If he did, the act itself would stare him full in the face.

[Mr. CALHOUN here explained. He said he would not here argue the question whether Congress meant to make a previous act of the State Legislature necessary; but if it did not, the act of Congress would itself be unconstitutional, because we had recognized Michigan as a State, and Congress have no right to call a convention in a State.]

Mr. BRIDGEMAN resumed. I did not misunderstand the Senator. He contended that the act of Congress calling such a convention was unconstitutional; and to establish his proposition he said that Congress, under the federal constitution, could only call a convention upon the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States.

Does the Senator mean seriously to contend that the mere proposition made by Congress to the people of Michigan, for the purpose of obtaining their assent to a change of boundary, is a convention called under the authority of Congress within a State? Such an argument would be a perversion of terms. If you make propositions to any foreign power, and suggest that their willingness to accept them may be ascertained by a convention of delegates elected by the people, how can this be construed into a convention called by your own sovereign authority? No, sir; this was a mere offer, on the part of the Government of the United States, to make a bargain with the people of Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

Michigan. It presupposes a perfect equality, in this respect, between the parties. They had the same right to refuse that we had to offer. They may voluntarily consent to your terms, as they have done in this case, and then it becomes a contract which cannot afterwards be violated; but if they had dissented, the negotiation would have been at an end. This is what the Senator denominates a convention called by Congress within the limits of the State of Michigan. Surely no further argument on this point of the case can be necessary.

Congress might have proposed to Michigan that the question should be decided at the polls, by a vote of the people. It was better, however, to submit it to a convention of delegates, because they could deliberate. This was emphatically to be the act of the people in their sovereign capacity. It was a question whether they should be received as a member into our great family of nations upon the terms which we had proposed. It was to be the establishment of new political relations of the most important character, affecting them and their children for many generations. It was a question over which, under their own constitution, their servants, the members of the Legislature, had no control. To what other tribunal could we so properly have referred this question, as to that of a convention of delegates elected by the people?

There can, then, be no objection to the act of Congress, unless it be that the people are not competent, in the very nature of things, to give the assent required, without the intervention of the Legislature. But this would be to condemn the conduct of our ancestors. It would be at war with the most glorious events of our own history. Besides, the very conduct of the people of Michigan, upon this occasion, disproves the position. There was no tumultuous and lawless rising up of the people against a settled form of government, as one might suppose, judging from the arguments upon this floor.

They conducted the election with regularity and order, according to the established laws and usages of the State.

Hear what General Williams, the president of the convention, says upon the subject, in his communication to the President of the United States: "The convention," says he, "originated through primary meetings of the citizens of the several counties, in ample time to afford notice to the whole State. Pursuant thereto, the elections, kept open for two days, on the 5th and 6th instant, (December,) have been held in all the counties except Monroe and Macomb. These elections were fair and open, and conducted in all respects as our other elections, and the returns made to the county boards, and canvassed as prescribed by the laws of the late Territory of Michigan in similar cases. The result has been a decided expression of the voice of a majority of the people, approbatory of the resolution enclosed."

VOL. XIII.—6

Is there any doubt of this "decided expression of the voice of the majority of the people?" Can any Senator upon this floor question it? Has there been a single memorial, or even a single private letter produced, calling it in question? Nay, more: has a single voice been raised in Michigan against entering the Union on the terms proposed? Not one, to our knowledge.

If it were necessary to place the claims of Michigan upon other grounds, it might be done with great force. Suppose we were to admit that their proceedings had been irregular, ought that to exclude her from the Union? On this subject we ought to act like statesmen acquainted with the history of our own country. We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously to such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with paternal care, to nurse them with kindness, and, when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are, do they contain a sufficient population? have they adopted a republican constitution? and are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part. And yet we have in all these instances waived this objection, and approved the constitution thus formed. We have admitted Tennessee and Arkansas into the Union, notwithstanding this objection; and I trust we shall pursue a similar course towards Michigan, especially as there can be no doubt but that her people have assented to our terms of admission.

The case of Missouri was a very strong one. Congress agreed to admit her into the Union upon the condition that her Legislature should substantially change a provision in her constitution touching a very delicate subject. Under her constitution the Legislature had no power to make this change; nor could it have been effected without a long and troublesome process. But Congress cut the gordian knot at once, and agreed to accept the engagement of the Legislature as the voice of the people. We have never had any occasion to regret this disregard of forms.

I now come, Mr. President, to speak upon subjects concerning which I should gladly be silent. The internal concerns of the States should never be introduced upon this floor when it can be avoided; but the Senators from South, Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) and Ohio (Mr. MORRIS) have thought differently, and have rendered it necessary for me to make some observations in reply.

First, then, I would ask, what possible connection can be imagined between the conduct of the Senatorial electors of Maryland, who refused to execute a trust for which they were elected, and that of the people of Michigan, who chose delegates to a convention upon the express invitation of an act of Congress? The Maryland electors refused to perform their duty under the State constitution; but the people of Michigan did give their assent to the condition which we had prescribed to them, and upon which alone they could enter the Union. There is as great a difference between the two cases as "between a hawk and a hand-saw." Standing here as a Senator, I have no right to pronounce judgment upon the conduct of these electors. They are responsible to the people of the State of Maryland, not to me.

The other Maryland question, to which the Senator adverted, is one of a very different character. It involves the decision of the important principle whether, under a settled form of constitutional government, the people have a right to change that form in any other manner than the mode prescribed by the constitution. If I were to admit that they did not possess this power, still the Senator is as much of a revolutionist as myself. He admits that if the Legislature of Michigan had passed a law authorizing this convention, and fixing the time and place of its meeting, then its proceedings would have been regular and valid. But who gave the Legislature of Michigan this authority? Is it contained in the constitution of the State? That is not pretended. Whence, then, shall we derive it? How does the Senator escape from this difficulty? Upon his own principles, it would have been a legislative usurpation; and yet, he says, if the Legislature had acted first, the convention would have been held under competent authority.

Now, for my own part, I should not have objected to their action. It might have been convenient, it might have been proper, for them to have recommended a particular day for holding the election of delegates and for the meeting of the convention. But it is manifest that, as a source of power to the convention, legislative action would have been absurd. The constitution of Michigan fixes the boundaries of the State. For this purpose, it refers to the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, establishing the Territory. How could these boundaries be changed? If in no other manner than that prescribed in the constitution of Michigan, it would have been a tedious and troublesome process, and would have delayed, for at least two years, the admission of the State into the Union. First, such an amendment must have been sanctioned by a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives. Then it must have been published for three months. Afterwards it must have received the approbation of two-thirds of both Houses of a Legislature subsequently elected. And, after all these prerequisites, it must have been submitted to a vote of the people, for their ratification. It was to avoid these very difficulties that the Senate, at their last session, adopted, by a unanimous vote, the measure which the Senator now calls revolutionary, referred the decision of the question directly to the sovereign people of Michigan in their primary capacity. Then was the appropriate moment for the Senator to have objected to this course; that was the occasion on which to convince us that this was an unconstitutional and lawless proceeding. He suffered the precious moment to escape, and it is now too late to tell the people of Michigan that they shall be punished by an exclusion from the Union, because they thought proper to take us at our word. That would have been the time to have inserted an amendment in the bill requiring a previous act of the Legislature, prescribing the mode of electing the delegates. But the Senator was then silent upon this subject. There had then been no proceedings in Maryland, such as he now calls revolutionary. A word upon that subject. We are told in that sacred and venerated instrument which first proclaimed the rights of man to the world, that "all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed." But suppose the case of a State whose constitution, originally good, had, from the lapse of time, and from the changes in the population of different portions of its territory, become unequal and unjust. Suppose this inequality and injustice to have gone to such an extent that the vital principle of representative republics was destroyed, and that the vote of a citizen in one county of the State was equivalent to that of six citizens in another county. Suppose that an equal disproportion existed between taxation and representation, and that, under the organic forms of the constitution, a minority could forever control the majority. Why, sir, even under such circumstances, I should bear with patience whilst hope remained. I would solicit, I would urge the minority, I would appeal to their sense of justice, to call a convention, under the forms of the constitution, for the purpose of redressing the grievances; but if, at last, I found they had determined to turn a deaf ear to all my entreaties, I should then invoke the peaceable aid of the people, in their sovereign capacity, to remedy these evils. They are the source of all power; they are the rightful authors of all constitutions. They are not forever to be shackled by their own servants, and compelled to submit to evils such as I have described, by the refusal of their own Legislature to pass a law for holding a convention. Whoever denies this position, condemns the principles of the declaration of independence and of the American Revolution. There is not one of the old thirteen States whose Government was not called into existence upon these very principles. It is now too late in the day, in our favored land, to contend that the people cannot change their forms of government at pleasure. The glorious experiment which we are trying in this country would prove a total failure, if we should now decide that the people, in no situation, and under no circumstances, can hold a convention without the previous consent of their own Legislature. It is not my province to say whether the proper time for this peaceful action of the sovereign people, in their primary capacity, has yet arrived, or will ever arrive, in Maryland. That question may safely be left to them; but I feel no terrors, my fancy conjures up no spectres from such doctrines as I have advanced.

Mr. BENTON said: Nominally, and upon record, this is a Michigan question—a question to admit the State of Michigan into the Union; in fact and in substance, it is now converted into a Pennsylvania and a Maryland question, to arrest or paralyze the proceedings against the United States Bank charter in the former, and to arrest or paralyze the proceedings in favor of a convention in the latter. This is the form given to it yesterday by the movement of the Senators from South Carolina and Ohio, (Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. MORRIS;) so that little Michigan, which had seemed to be the subject of discussion before the Senate, was suddenly found to be nothing but the tail to the kite, dangling in the air below, while all eyes were fixed upon the imposing apparition of the two Atlantic States, rising and hovering above. In this way, the young Michigan was suddenly eclipsed and lost sight of; and the lawless and revolutionary movement, as it was styled, in Pennsylvania, against the sanctity of a certain charter, and the lawless and revolutionary movement, as it was stigmatized, in Maryland, in favor of a convention of the people, became the engrossing theme of denunciation and vituperation. Greatly did Mr. B. rejoice that the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had followed no part of this unhappy example; that he had carefully eschewed all animadversion; that he had positively refused to take any part, or to have any share, in discussing State measures here; and had confined himself to the duties of defence imposed upon him by the novel and aggressive course pursued by others. That Senator's first care was to defend a gentleman of his own State, Mr. Dallas, who had been assailed here by name; and in that he had so acted as to effect what he (Mr. B.) had thought to be impossible: he had increased his high character for private worth, and had added to the exalted opinion entertained of the goodness of his heart; for this generous defence was volunteered in favor of one with whom it was not his fortune to be on terms of intimacy. He showed the injustice done to that gentleman by attributing to his letter meanings which did not belong to it, and drawing inferences as foreign to his character as they were to his writing. He (Mr. B.) had read that letter, but not since it had been the subject of animadversion; and it might be that his knowledge of the amiable character, purity of heart and purpose, and modesty of deportment of the writer, had prevented him from so scanning his words as to be able to find the deep mischief which they concealed; for certainly he had not seen the anarchical spirit attributed to it. In many things he agreed with him, especially in that which related to vested rights; in some things he did not; but where he did not agree, it was still the disagreement which left unimpeached the high character for public and private worth which Mr. Dallas brought with him, as a Senator from Pennsylvania, to this chamber, and carried back with him from this chamber to Pennsylvania.

Mr. B., with as much reluctance as he had felt in adverting to Pennsylvania affairs, must now advert to the Maryland branch of this question. It seems that there is a movement in Maryland to organize a convention, by the inherent and unalienable rights of the people, and, without a legislative act, to alter and change the constitution of the State. The convention held in Michigan is one of this kind, and, therefore, the recognition of an act done by that convention is resisted on this floor, by the friends of the anti-convention party in Maryland, for fear it may operate in favor of the convention party in that State. This is the way that Maryland politics are lugged into this debate, and made part of this discussion. Mr. B. said he had often seen gentlemen argue one question with an eye to another, but, usually, with the delicacy of not lugging in, by name, this other question, which had no place upon the record. But this delicacy has not been observed upon this occasion. Michigan alone is in the record before us; yet Pennsylvania has been dragged in by name; Maryland has been dragged in by name; and not only dragged in, but made the principal subject of debate, and the most furious denunciations levelled at a portion of their citizens. The advocates for the Maryland convention are, not incidentally and by way of innuendo, lashed and scourged here while lashing and scourging the Michigan convention, but they are singled out, seized upon, and dragged forcibly and violently into this chamber; and then denounced in such style that, no doubt, the question of the Maryland convention is considered as completely crushed by the force which assails it here. Be it so, said Mr. B., if the people of sovereign States are willing to have their affairs governed by denunciation here. It will certainly be a one-sided game on this floor, for it was manifest that there was one party at least here who would not attack the impending measures of any State, nor attack the conduct or motives of the citizens of any State, in acting as they pleased on what concerned themselves; there was one party, at least, here, who would limit themselves to the just defence of the absent and the assailed. The Maryland convention party, then, is arraigned and condemned here for proposing to do what Michigan has done, and the act of Michigan must be stamped with reprobation by Congress, lest it become a precedent, sanctioned by the approbation of Congress, for the justification of the convention party in Maryland. This is the state of the question before us; and Mr. B. would immediately proceed to vindicate, not by an argument of his own, but by example, authority, and precedent, drawn from our early history, and from the writings of the founders of the republic, and others which claimed respect, the act which Michigan has done, and which a party in Maryland proposes to do. Mr. B. then read and commented briefly upon several passages from the writings of Mr. Madison, Judge Wilson, of Pennsylvania, General Hamilton, and Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution. Mr. Madison, speaking of the alleged defect of powers in the convention of 1787, which formed the federal constitution, says :

"They (the members of the convention) must have reflected that, in all great changes of established Government, form sought to give way to substance; that a rigid adherence, in such cases to the former, would render nominal and nugatory the transcendent and precious right of the people to 'abolish or alter this Government, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness,' since it is impossible for the people spontaneously and universally to move in concert towards their object, and it is therefore essential that such changes be instituted by some informal and unauthorized propositions, made by some patriotic and respectable citizen, or number of citizens. They must have recollected that it was by this irregular and assumed privilege of proposing to the people plans for their safety and happiness, that the States were first united against the danger with which they were threatened by their ancient Government, that committees and Congresses were formed for concentrating their efforts, and defending their rights, and that conventions were elected in the several States for establishing the constitutions under which they are now governed. Nor could it have been forgotten that no little ill-timed scruples, no zeal for adhering to ordinary forms, were anywhere seen, except in those who wished to indulge, under these masks, their secret enmity to the substance contended for."—Federalist, No. 40.

Here, said Mr. B., the authority of the people, in their original sovereign capacity, to abolish, alter, and change, their form of government, is fully and expressly set forth. The want of legislative authority to guide or direct them is directly waived; and some patriotic and respectable citizen or citizens are looked to, to commence the informal and unauthorized propositions which are to lead to a convention, and to end in the adoption of fundamental changes.

Such citizens are not considered by Mr. Madison as anarchists, disorganizers, disturbers of the peace, despoilers of property, &c., but as public benefactors, prompted by patriotism to take the lead in a work of public good and necessity. Mr. B. particularly noted, and read twice over, the concluding sentence of this extract from Mr. Madison. He said that Mr. M. was one of the most careful men in abstaining from personalities and the imputation of motives; but here was a keen cut, and a home thrust, at the old Tories of the Revolution—King George the Third's men, the conservatives of fifty years ago, who were indulging their secret enmity to the real rights of the people, under the mask of zeal for adhering to forms, and conscientious scruples against acting without authority.

[Mr. Benton then read from the proceedings of the States at the time of the adoption of the federal constitution, that State constitutions, without authority of law, were of common occurrence.]

Mr. B. having shown, from the opinions of the most eminent men, and from examples of the highest character, that conventions were independent of State legislation, demanded how it was that State Legislatures assumed to have power to grant or withhold them? He wished to see their grant for the exercise of this authority? He wished to see how it was that they who were servants, and dressed up in a little brief authority, undertook to govern and direct the people in the exercise of an inherent and unalienable right? They could not get this authority from the people, for it assumed a supremacy over the people. There was but one way to deduce their title, and that was through divine right! and by the grace of God! Any thing short of this acknowledges the sovereignty of the people, and puts an end to the pretension; so that a Legislature which should now assume to authorize the people to hold a convention, if put to a derivation of their own authority, would have to adopt the style of those kings of Europe who hold that God has put the people into their care, and endowed them with all authority for their protection and preservation. A legislative advice, counsel, or recommendation to the people to hold a convention, and an appropriation of money to defray its expenses, is certainly a convenience, but it is not a prerequisite; and conventions to change the form of Government may be held by the people when they please; taking care to submit their work to a direct vote of the people themselves, or to a new convention elected for the express purpose of approval or rejection, as was done in the case of the Constitution of the United States; and thus making sure of the approbation of a majority of the people before the new constitution is put in force.

Mr. B. had now finished his view of this question, and would make a brief application of the whole to the case of Michigan. The people there had held a convention, by their own power, to accept a fundamental condition of their admission into the Union. They have accepted the condition; and the objection is, that the convention was a lawless and revolutionary mob, and that law ought to be made to suppress and punish such assemblages in future. Mr. B. would hold a proposition for such a law to be the quintessence not of European, but of Asiatic despotism; and sure he was, it would receive no countenance by the vote of this chamber. In saying this, he spoke upon a recollection of the past, as well as upon a view of the present. At the last session of Congress all this denunciation of lawless and revolutionary mobs had been lavished upon the convention both of Arkansas and Michigan, because, being Territories, they had held conventions, and framed constitutions, without the authority of Congress. Our answers to these denunciations were the same that we give now, namely: 1. That they had a right to do so without our authority, and all that we could require was, that they should send us their constitutions, that we might see they were republican; and, 2. That these Territories had several times applied to Congress for an act to regulate the holding of their conventions, which were always refused by the political party which then held the supremacy in this chamber; and that to refuse them an act to regulate the holding of a convention, when they asked for it, and then to denounce them for holding a convention without law, was unreasonable and contradictory, and subjected ourselves to the reproach both of injustice and inconsistency. These were our answers then; and we added, that those who denounced the Arkansas and Michigan conventions for lawless and revolutionary mobs, would find themselves unsupported by the vote of the Senate; which turned out to be the fact, for the negative vote was exceedingly small; and Mr. B. would add, that the result would be the same now; and that, after all this denunciation of the convention in Michigan, the convention party in Maryland, and the disorganizing party in Pennsylvania, the vote would be about as it was at the last session, exceedingly small, and entirely too inconsiderable to give any countenance to their denunciations.

Mr. B. concluded by expressing the hope that the Senate would not adjourn until it finished this question. It was due to Pennsylvania and Maryland that we should stop a debate in which their concerns were improperly introduced; and it was due to Michigan herself that she should be relieved from this attendance at our doors. She has been debarred of her rights for years; she is a State, if not a State of the confederacy; she has a right to be admitted; and the admission of a State is a question of that dignity to be entitled, not only to a speedy decision, but to a preference over all other questions until it was decided. He repeated, what he had said some days before, that he had come with his cloak to camp on this floor until the vote was taken; and, that being his idea of what all ought to do, he would not consume time by speaking.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Admission of Michigan.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union; the question being on the motion of Mr. MORRIS to amend the bill.

Mr. BAYARD said: In my opinion, sir, the present bill involves a monstrous political heresy, and gives its sanction by implication to a doctrine which would subvert all regular government. It is true, sir, that upon its face there is nothing exceptionable, but you cannot strip it of its contemporaneous facts, you cannot blot from the page of history its concomitant circumstances. The Message of the President and other documents are now matters of record. What, then, sir, is the case before us? Not a single insulated act, but a matter which, in the web of human affairs, involves consequences which cannot be trammelled up. The effect, sir, of to-day becomes the cause of to-morrow, and it behooves us to look warily to the principles which we establish. The case is simply this: the people of a part of Michigan Territory, without waiting for a previous act of Congress assigning the boundaries of their State, and authorizing the formation of a constitution and State Government, undertook, on the 11th May, 1835, to form a constitution and State Government, and applied for admission into the Union at the last session. Congress passed an act on the 15th June, 1836, accepting, ratifying, and confirming, the constitution and State Government, but provided, as a condition precedent to her admission, that the assent of a convention of delegates, chosen by the people, should be given to the boundaries prescribed in the act. I say, sir, the people of a part of Michigan Territory undertook to do this, because, at that time, Michigan Territory embraced not only the peninsula of Michigan, but the whole of the present Territory of Wisconsin, and contained within its limits 177,000 square miles, or nearly three times the area of the great State of Virginia. The peninsula of Michigan, which had previously formed a part of Indiana Territory, was separated from that Territory and established as an independent one by the act of Congress of the 11th January, 1805. Subsequently to this period, Indiana in the mean time having been formed into a State, an act of Congress was passed, (on the 18th April, 1818,) authorizing the formation of a constitution and State Government for Illinois, and the 7th section of that act added to the peninsula of Michigan the rest of the North-western Territory, comprising the present Wisconsin Territory, which it declared should be attached to, and made part of, Michigan Territory, subject, however, to be disposed of by Congress according to the right reserved in the 5th article of the ordinance of July 13, 1787.

When the immense territory on the north of the Ohio River, formerly called the North-western Territory, was ceded to the United States by Virginia, the 5th article of the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, which was declared to be a compact between the original States and the people and States of the said Territory, provided that it should be divided into not less than three nor more than five States, and proceeded to parcel it out into three States, whose boundaries it fixed, with the express provision, however, that those boundaries might be altered, and that Congress should have the authority to form one or two States in that part of the territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. At first, this whole region of country passed under one name, that of "the Territory north-west of the river Ohio," and was subject to a single Territorial Government. In the year 1800, by the act of Congress of the 7th May, it was divided into two parts, for the purpose of temporary government, by a line beginning at the Ohio, and opposite the mouth of the Kentucky River, and running thence to Fort Recovery, and thence north until it intersected the territorial line between the United States and Canada. That portion of it which lay on the eastern side of the division line retained the name of the Territory north-west of the river Ohio, and that on the western side of the line was called Indiana Territory. The peninsula of Michigan was thus divided between these two Territorial Governments. When, subsequently, in the year 1802, the State of Ohio was, by the act of Congress of the 30th April, in that year, authorized to form a constitution and State Government, and the boundaries of that State were established, the balance of the Territory north-west of the river Ohio, that is to say, the other portion of the peninsula of Michigan, was attached to Indiana Territory. By act of Congress of the 11th January, 1805, this Territory of Indiana was again divided, and the peninsula of Michigan established as a separate Territory. From the year 1805, then, until the year 1818, the Territorial Government of Michigan extended only over the peninsula of that name. When, however, in the latter year, by act of Congress of the 18th April, Illinois was authorized to form a constitution and State Government, and the boundaries of that State were established as they had been of the State of Indiana, by the act of April 19, 1816, the remaining portion of the old North-western Territory was added to the peninsula of Michigan, and the whole subjected to one Territorial Government. This immense region of country, covering an area of 177,000 square miles, was subject, however, by the express provision of the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, to be formed by the authority of Congress into one or two States. Such, sir, was the state of things when the inhabitants of the peninsula of Michigan, disregarding this authority of Congress, undertook to form a constitution and State Government for themselves. The preamble to their constitution is in these words: "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, as established by the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, do agree," &c.; which description embraced only the inhabitants of the peninsula of Michigan, which had, as has been stated, in the first instance, been made a separate Territory by that act of Congress. In doing so, these people professed to act in conformity with the ordinance of July, 1787, and to derive their authority from that ordinance; which, as has been seen, expressly reserves to Congress the right to form one or two States in the Territory as it then existed. As both Congress and the inhabitants of that peninsula could not have the same right, it is perfectly clear that the act of those people was unwarranted by any provision of law, and a mere nullity. This was the view taken of the subject at the time of their application to Congress at the last session, and hence, sir, the resolution of the 26th of January, 1836, referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) "that the Senate regard the memorial purporting to be from the State of Michigan in no other light than as a voluntary act of private individuals." But, sir, consent takes away error, and Congress thought proper, at a subsequent period, by the act of the 15th June, 1836, to accept, ratify, and confirm, the constitution and State Government which had been formed by the inhabitants of the peninsula, with this proviso, however, that the limits of the State should embrace not merely the peninsula, but likewise a region of country lying on the north-west of Lake Michigan; thus adding to the proposed new State both territory and population, and requiring, as a condition precedent to her admission into the Union, that the assent of a convention of delegates chosen by the people should be given to the boundaries prescribed in the act. The simple question, then, would seem to be whether this condition has been complied with. Congress, not doubting but that such assent would be cheerfully and promptly given, further provided that, as soon as such assent should be given, the President should announce the fact by proclamation, and "that, thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be considered complete, and the Senators and Representatives who have been elected by the said State, as its representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, without further delay."

It is thus seen, sir, that not only the fact of assent is provided for, but also the evidence by which that fact is to be established. It is clear that the President is made the judge of that fact, and that he might have bound the United States at least by his proclamation. We could not have controverted the fact, and the Senators from Michigan might have taken their seats on this floor. But, sir, although the President might have assumed this responsibility, he has, at least, in this instance, wisely abstained from trampling on the law and constitution. I cannot see how it was possible for him, under the circumstances of this case, to have declared that a convention of delegates, chosen by the people of Michigan, had given its assent to the boundaries prescribed by the act of Congress. Whatever may have been his motive for this course, no proclamation has been issued, but the whole matter is referred to Congress by his Message of the 27th of December, 1836. By that Message and the accompanying documents it appears that a convention of delegates assembled on the 26th of September, 1836, at Ann Arbor, in conformity with an act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, passed on the 25th of July, 1836, and resolved "that this convention cannot give their assent to the proposition contained in said proviso; but the same is hereby rejected." By the same Message and documents, it further appears that another convention of delegates assembled on the 14th of December, 1836, at Ann Arbor, without any previous law of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, but which originated from the resolutions and proceedings of primary meetings of the citizens in the several counties, which assumed to be a convention of delegates chosen by the people in compliance with the act of Congress, and this convention gave its assent to the condition. As the case stands, the simple question is, whether the condition has been complied with; or, in other words, has a convention of delegates, chosen by the people, given its assent? The act which we have now under consideration, in its preamble, declares that such assent has been given in compliance with the law.

It must be recollected that, at the time of forming this constitution, the Territory of Michigan was composed, as I have stated, of the whole of the remaining portion of the North-western Territory, embracing the present state of Michigan and the Wisconsin Territory, and covering an area of 177,000 square miles; that the peninsula of Michigan had been subjected to a separate Territorial Government by the act of the 11th January, 1805, and had so continued up to the year 1818, when, on the creation of the State of Illinois, the balance of the North-western Territory had been incorporated with it. The people of the peninsula of Michigan wishing to form themselves into a State, instead of describing themselves as inhabitants of the peninsula, in terms adopted an equivalent form of expression, namely: "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, as established by the act of the 11th January, 1805," which was precisely the peninsula of Michigan.

This is nothing more than a description of the people who proposed to form themselves into a free and independent State, as contradistinguished from the other inhabitants of the then existing Territory of Michigan. It is the natural and proper mode of describing a people or nation, namely, by the place or country of their residence; but it does not import any limitation of boundaries, any more than the phrase "We, the people of the United States," in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States, limits the boundaries of the United States to those which existed at the time of its adoption. If it were otherwise, how came we at this moment to possess the immense region on the western side of the Mississippi, or how came we to possess Florida? It is very unusual and unnecessary to settle boundaries in the constitution, and I question whether there are more than half a dozen cases to be found among the different States of this Union. In the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, it became necessary to do so, because the act of Congress which authorized the formation of their respective constitutions, required that it should be done.

The word State has a double meaning: in the one, it indicates the people who compose the community, in the other the territory inhabited by them. In forming a constitution it is the people who form themselves into a sovereign State, and their identity would be the same, whether they continued to occupy the same territory or not. The reference, by way of description, to the region of country they inhabit, is no more of the essence of the compact than a description of an individual in a deed, as A B, of the District of Columbia, would be of the essence of his contract, requiring that he should, in all time to come, reside in the District of Columbia, in order to avail himself of its provisions. But, sir, there is another and a conclusive answer to this objection; which is, that the inhabitants not having possessed the right at all, in the first instance, to form a constitution and State Government, the same is binding and valid only so far as it was ratified by the act of Congress of June 15, 1836; and that act having refused to confine the new State to the peninsula of Michigan, but having required that it should embrace a region of country on the north-western side of the lake, it follows that if it were true that the preamble established the boundaries of the State, it was in that particular vacated by the act of Congress. For it must be recollected that the ordinance of 1787 gave to Congress the right to erect one or two States in the then existing Territory of Michigan, which was the remaining portion of the old North-western Territory. The result, sir, then, is this: that to call a convention to express its assent to the boundaries established by Congress, is not to call a convention to amend or alter the constitution, since the constitution, neither in point of fact, nor in point of law, established any boundaries; and, consequently, that the enlargement or diminution of its territory became a matter of ordinary legislation, a power which is exercised every day by the Legislatures of the respective States, in sessions made by them to the United States.

But if it be true that the enlargement or diminution of the territory is a matter of ordinary legislation where the boundaries are not fixed by the constitution, a fortiori, it is a matter of ordinary legislation to call a convention to enlarge or diminish the territory, where the duty to do so is imposed by competent authority. The right of a Legislature to call a convention at any time must depend on the constitution of the State; and the powers of the convention, when called, will depend on the provisions of the law under which it is assembled; because the people, in voting for such a convention, cannot be understood to invest it with any other power than that which they have previously agreed it should have in the passage of the law to which they have, through their Legislature, given either their express or implied consent. The people are the source of all power. When assembled in a state of nature, lege solutus, in their sovereign capacity, their power is without any practical limitation. It is the whole will of the community, sustained by its whole force. But, as they cannot meet en masse when spread over a large country, recourse is had to the principle of representation; and, when the sovereign power is delegated, a constitution becomes necessary in order to limit the powers granted. If the whole legislative power were delegated, without restriction, then the Legislature, who are the depositaries of that power, would possess it in as absolute a degree as that in which it belonged to the whole community, assembled in its sovereign capacity; that is, without any practical limitation. The constitution of a State is not, therefore, generally a mere grant of power to a particular body; it does not consist in an enumeration of certain powers which are granted, but vesting at once the whole legislative power in a particular body, it provides for limitations on its exercise. Hence the necessity for bills of rights and reservations in favor of individual liberty and security; hence the provisions in relation to trial by jury, to the power of arrest, to the habeas corpus, to freedom of conscience in religious matters, and freedom from unreasonable seizures and searches; hence the necessity of guarding the existence of the executive and judicial powers by constitutional provision, which might otherwise be absorbed by the legislative power. All this results from the very nature of legislative power, which, whether it resides in the whole community or is delegated by that community to a particular body, is without practical limitation other than that provided for in the constitution of the society. And herein, sir, consists the great and essential difference between the constitution of a State and the constitution of the Federal Government. The first has all the powers that are not prohibited, the latter has no powers but those which are granted. The principle is all-important in the construction of the two instruments. The Federal Government is one of enumerated powers. There is no general delegation of the whole legislative power of the community, restrained merely by exceptions and limitations; but the delegation is of "all legislative powers therein granted." It is true that the same language might be used in a State constitution, and, in such case, would require the same construction. But when, as in the case of the constitution of Michigan, it is declared that "the legislative power shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives," it is the legislative power of the whole community, and has no practical limitation but what is to be found in other parts of the constitution. I mean, of course, as a rule of construction growing out of its own provisions. There is, also, as respects the States of this Union, another limitation, namely, the Constitution of the United States. But the principle is the same, for the Constitution of the United States, having received the assent of the same people, may be considered as incorporated with, and forming, for the purpose of construction, a part of the State constitution, in the limitations it imposes on the exercise of State sovereignty. As it appears, then, that the object of calling a convention in Michigan was not to amend or alter the constitution, but to give its assent to what the legislative power might itself have assented to, namely, the enlargement of its territory, it follows that the power to call such a convention is a mere act of ordinary legislation, and the duty having been imposed by Congress to do so, it was the business and right of the Legislature of that State to perform that duty. It was the duty and right of the Legislature of Michigan to call the convention, because the people of Michigan, when they formed their constitution, declared that the Legislature alone should possess the right of expressing and binding the public will in matters of ordinary legislation. Upon the question whether a convention should be called, the time and place of its assembling, the mode of its election, the qualification of its electors, no portion of the community had the right to dictate to any other portion; nor could the will of the community be ascertained on those points in any other mode than that agreed upon in the constitution. And why, sir? Because the people of Michigan had previously agreed, each man with each and every other, when they adopted their constitution, that the Legislature should be the exponents of the public will in such a case. That any portion of the community, be it great or small, should call itself the people, and affect to express and bind the public will, under such circumstances, is a fraud upon the rights of every man in it, and a gross and manifest infraction of the social compact into which he entered when he agreed, with others, to form a sovereign State, and delegate the legislative power to a particular body. I say, then, sir, without the fear of contradiction, that when the people themselves, who cannot act in mass, delegate to their representatives, by their constitution, the legislative power of the community, each and every man of them parts with the right to express and bind the public will in any other mode than through their Legislature, in relation to matters falling within the scope of that power. Such is the compact, and it is they themselves who establish it.

Mr. BROWN said: The admission of Michigan as a member of the Union had been resisted mainly by those who oppose it on the ground that she is, at this time, a sovereign State, and that the convention which assembled in December last, and gave its assent to the terms proposed by the act of the last session of Congress, was not called into being by a law of the Legislature of Michigan, and is therefore to be considered as irregular and revolutionary in its nature, by assuming to act without such authority. He thought it required but a very slight examination of the subject for them to arrive at the conclusion that, on all questions of legislation by Congress touching her condition, she is to be contemplated and regarded as a Territory and not as a State. Not having complied with the terms of the act of Congress passed at the last session for her admission into the Union, she is not a confederate State. If she exists, then, as a State at all, it must be in the character of a foreign and independent sovereignty. To maintain a doctrine so absurd as this was, and so utterly subversive of the authority of the General Government over its territory, its advocates must, of necessity, be driven to admit the right of the people of a Territory to throw off the power of the General Government without its consent, and to establish an independent Government at their own will and pleasure. Whether a State may rightfully secede from the Union or not, is a question about which the ablest statesmen have differed; but that a Territory, having in itself no sovereignty, may rightfully withdraw from the authority of the Federal Government, (unless by that right acquired by successful revolution,) is a proposition so disorganizing in its tendency as to find scarcely a single advocate. It is true that Michigan has, for some time past, exercised the powers of a State, preparatory to her admission into the Union, which were simply permissive, and not by virtue of any rights she had as a State, independent of the authority of the General Government. She is, then, for all practical purposes, to be regarded in our legislation as still remaining in her territorial condition. If this opinion be correct, then the sanctuary of State rights, for which so many apprehensions have been expressed, will not be invaded by our recognizing the acts of the late convention, giving the assent of the people of Michigan to the terms proposed by the act of Congress. The honorable Senator from Delaware had argued to show that the legislative branch of a Government was to be regarded as the depository of the public will, and that in the States all power not prohibited by their constitutions might be exercised by their Legislatures; and deduces, as a consequence from the principles which he contended for, that the assembling of a convention in Michigan, without authority from her Legislature, was irregular and of revolutionary tendency. This doctrine, said Mr. B., was, in his opinion, radically wrong, and had led to many of the erroneous conclusions which had characterized the present discussion. The legislative branch of a State Government was to be considered the depository of the public will of the people, represented by it only for certain purposes, and to the extent of the powers conferred on it by the constitution under which it acted. All other powers resided in the great body of the people, in which exists the ultimate authority and sovereignty of a State. The constituted authorities of a State, no, not even a convention itself, possess no inherent power of sovereignty, and each are but the mere agents of the people, who constitute the sovereignty. It is therefore derogating rather too much from this power of the people of a State to claim for their Legislature the right to direct them when and how they shall proceed to assemble in convention. It strips the sovereign power of one of its highest and most powerful attributes, and leaves it at the will of the agent created by it to decide when it may rightfully exercise that power. In some of the States the power is expressly given to their Legislatures to decide when a convention shall be called, and to provide for the manner of calling the same. This, of course, is a restriction by the people of those States, imposed by themselves, on their original right to assemble in convention through the instrumentality of primary assemblies, and which they are constitutionally bound to observe. But no such restriction can be alleged as existing in the constitution of Michigan to prevent her people from assembling in convention spontaneously, for the purpose of expressing her willingness to come into the Union on the terms proposed by Congress. Her constitution points out the manner in which future amendments to that instrument are to be made; but no mode is prescribed by it as to the manner in which her people are to assemble in convention for the purpose of being admitted into the Union as a State. As her people never have conferred on any of her public functionaries this power, it, of course, remains among them, as belonging to that class of residuary powers with which she has never parted. If, sir, said Mr. B., this reasoning be correct, the people of Michigan have rightfully exercised the power of calling a convention through their primary assemblies—a right consecrated by the principles of the Revolution, and from the exercise of which some of the oldest, if not the wisest, State constitutions had sprung into existence. In determining this question, he thought it their duty, as statesmen, to disencumber it of mere questions of form, and to ascertain substantially what was the will of the people of Michigan in reference to their admission into the Union. All the facts before them went to prove, most conclusively, that it was not only the will of a majority of them to obtain admission into the Union, but that there was almost entire unanimity of sentiment among her citizens in favor of it. Had a single remonstrance been presented from any part of that Territory against the proceedings of her convention? No, not a single voice had been heard from that quarter opposed to it. Her citizens, therefore, could not feel otherwise than greatly indebted to those who had come forward as her guardians here to protect her from the dire calamities of being admitted to a participation of the benefits of our happy Union! For himself, he had always been taught to consider it as a measure of no ordinary advantage to the people of a Territory to be raised from a state of territorial dependence to the elevated condition of a sovereign State of our confederacy. If we were about to do an act which might operate to restrain the privileges of her people, then it would behoove us to construe strictly the powers under which we act. While the rule of construction which he had just laid down was applicable to such a case as the one adverted to, the opposite rule of giving a liberal interpretation to our powers was equally obligatory where the object was to enlarge the privileges of the citizen. In other words, he considered it to be not only a safe rule in practice, but one demanded by our free institutions, in deciding on questions in which the rights of the citizen are involved, whether in courts of justice or legislative bodies, to give a construction to the power under which they act that will rather favor than abridge the rights.

Mr. NILES said he had witnessed the course this debate had taken with some surprise; great principles had been drawn into discussion, not necessarily belonging to the subject, and sentiments expressed, and doctrines maintained, which he had heard with no small degree of astonishment and regret; he could hardly realize that he was in the American Senate, and at this enlightened period when the principles of free Governments were supposed to be well understood and well settled. In view of what he had witnessed in this debate, he felt it his duty to allude to a fact which, whether agreeable to hear or not, he believed ought not to be entirely overlooked. Sir, said Mr. N., for some years past the American Senate, the most important branch of this Government, a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and possessing a portion of the executive and judicial authority, has not enjoyed the confidence of the people of the United States; and he feared, greatly feared, that what had taken place on the bill before us was not calculated to increase or strengthen the public confidence. Are we to be told that the people have decided inconsiderately, rashly, and unjustly? This will not do. Unless he was entirely mistaken, the principles which had been asserted, and the doctrines that had been so strenuously maintained, would be received with some astonishment by the people of this country.

The question before the Senate he regarded a very simple one; it was really a question of facts; merely, whether the condition of the act of Congress of last session, providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, had been complied with. In considering this question, gentlemen had gone into the first principles of government, and made what he regarded a bold attack on popular power, on the fundamental principle of popular sovereignty, which lies at the foundation of all our institutions. These doctrines were rather antiquated; they belonged to the school of the restoration in England, and the political writings of Sir Robert Filmore; they were the present doctrines of the conservatives in all the Governments in Europe, of the advocates of arbitrary power, and of existing abuses, however flagrant. But in this country it was not necessary to trace them so far; it was not necessary to go back beyond the memorable period of '98; they were the doctrines of that day, of the period in our political history which has been appropriately called the "reign of terror." Is it supposed that the principles and spirit of '98 and '99 can be revived? Is it supposed that, instead of having advanced, we have retrograded in political intelligence, and in a just understanding of the principles of free government?

What were the doctrines of that day—the doctrines to which the alien and sedition laws, and other kindred measures, owed their origin? He would refer gentlemen to them, and the speeches by which they were attempted to be maintained. The speeches we have heard are of the same character, maintaining the same principles and breathing the same spirit; but it will be no disparagement to any one who has taken part in this debate to say, that the heresies of that day have not been defended with more spirit or ability now than they were then. Then their advocates were able, experienced, talented, distinguished, and illustrious men; one of them bearing an intimate relation to the Senator from Delaware. They put forth their whole strength, and staked their all, politically—the ascendancy of their party and their individual prospects—on the support of the same doctrines we have heard mentioned on these occasions. But they failed, and the cause of democracy triumphed.

And what were those doctrines? They were, that the people could not be trusted; that they were their own worst enemies; that all the disorders, real or imaginary, that prevailed, were attributable to a wild spirit of democracy—to popular frenzy. An honest but fearless expression of opinion, concerning men and measures, was denounced as a spirit of insubordination, disorganization, and rank jacobinism. A distinguished leader of that party, now no more, belonging to a neighboring State to his own, a gifted son of genius, a brilliant star in the constellation of that day, whose impassioned, fervid, and glowing eloquence has never been surpassed in the halls of Congress, declared what were the evils and the remedy. I allude, said Mr. N., to Fisher Ames. He declared that the disease which threatened general and universal ruin to our institutions and our future prospects was rooted deep; that it had found its way into the very hearts of the people. This disease was democracy; it was the will and sovereignty of the people. "It was not that the skin was blistered, but their very bones were carious." Yes, the people were corrupt, even to their bones. In his fertile and vivid imagination, he conjured up and predicted greater evils for his country, which were to flow from this wild spirit of democracy, than have been portrayed on the present occasion. His country was to be visited with all the horrors of the French revolution; anarchy, confusion, and bloodshed, were to desolate the land; and, in the federal visions of that day, the ghosts of Robespierre, Danton, and Marat, were seen fitting through our atmosphere. The disease of that period was democracy; the people were said to be rising up to overthrow the Government, and destroy those noble institutions which they themselves had established. And it was the aim of those in authority to put down that wild spirit of democracy by the strong arm of power, and to maintain their authority, not through the public will, and as an emanation from it, but in opposition to it—in defiance of it. It was for this purpose that the alien and sedition laws were passed. And why is it, said Mr. N., that these laws, and particularly the latter, have become a stench in the nostrils of the people; and that for nearly forty years they have borne the stamp of universal reprobation upon their face—the deep and indelible stamp of infamy, which will go down to the latest posterity, or as long as there is a single spark of liberty in the hearts of the American people? Is the execration in which those laws are held to be charged to their being unconstitutional? Far from it. A large portion of the legislation of Congress has been charged with being in violation of the constitution; and the alien and seditious acts were declared to be constitutional, not only by Congress, but by the Executive and Judiciary. No; the infamy which has attached to those obnoxious acts did not proceed from their being unconstitutional, whether they are so or not. The people do not form opinions so unreasonably or unjustly. We must look for the cause of opprobrium to a different source—the true character and design of those laws. They were regarded as a premeditated and high-handed attack upon popular power; a deadly blow at the sovereignty of the people; a bold and daring attempt to overthrow the public will, to put down the popular opinion, and to rule the country regardless of it. They were considered as an attempt to change the very element of the Government, which is founded on public opinion, and convert it into a Government of force.

But that great scheme failed; and are its exploded, reprobated doctrines now to be revived? Are we now to be told that there is no political power remaining in the people? that, having established and put in operation Governments, they have parted with all political power whatever? that they cannot revise or new-model this form of Government they have themselves established, unless in pursuance of a provision in the constitution, or in accordance with a law of the Legislature? This is maintaining that sovereignty resides in the constituted authorities, and not in the people at large; it is raising the creature above his creator, the agent above the principal. It is exalting the Legislature above, and making it independent of, the constituent body.

The constitutions of most of the States contain some provision for altering or amending them; some through the agency of a convention, and some otherwise. But such constitutional provision is not inconsistent with and cannot take away the right and power of the people, acting in their primarily original capacity, to change their system of government.

This is a right which they have not delegated, and which, of course, must abide with the people at large. Conventions of the people may be called, and often are, in pursuance of a law of the Legislature; yet this is a mere matter of convenience. But does the law confer on them their power? That is the question. If it does, then a Legislature can grant to another body greater power than it possesses itself; even the power to change or destroy those very forms under which it exists; a power to destroy the Legislature itself. This is preposterous, and shows the absurdity of the principle contended for. If a convention does not derive its power from the Legislature, from whence can it derive it, except from the people? What is a convention? Is it not a body representing the people in their primary, elementary capacity, and wholly independent of the Legislature and constituted authorities? If this is not a true idea of a convention of the people, he should like to be informed what a convention is. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) asks, who and what are the people? He was surprised at such an inquiry from any quarter, and still more that it should come from one who has had so much to do with conventions, and attempts to call forth the latent energies of State rights and popular power. He did not understand the Senator's answer to his own question, further than his declaration that he himself (Mr. P.) was one of the people. The inquiry, however, was, he thought, easily answered. The people, in one sense, are the whole population of a State; but in a political sense, the people were that portion of the population which possessed the political power in a State: it did not mean women or children, but the whole body of citizens with whom the political power of a State resided.

MR. CRITTENDEN said that this was the only bill he had seen in that Senate, during his term of service, which had a preamble attached to it. It was his opinion that it was wholly unnecessary. However, it was deemed necessary by some gentlemen, for the sake of some argument or elucidation, to insert the preamble; but why, or wherefore, he did not apprehend. Did this preamble, he asked, vary and alter the construction of the law? Was it not the same with or without it? Had he been present when the bill was reported, he would have opposed the adoption of the preamble, because it did not tell the truth, and the whole truth. It bore upon its face what the lawyers call a suppressio veri. Now, if the Senate were right in supposing that the convention of December last was a legitimate and constitutional assembly, and that its proceedings were valid and binding, did the striking out or retaining of the preamble affect the deliberations of the convention, one way or the other? He thought not. Michigan had precluded herself from no right by it, and a right would be binding upon her, whether the preamble should be retained or not. Was not that very clear? Then, why retain it? Gentlemen had much better lay it aside, and, by making no allusion to it, they would avoid all the questions upon which they had been so long debating. If there was to be a preamble at all, it was proper, as the Senator from Ohio (MR. MORRIS) had said, that it should contain a true and complete history of the whole proceeding. He, MR. C., would vote for the preamble provided all the facts were introduced; or, if the question should be made, he would vote for striking it out. He thought that all parties might consistently do that. He expressed his anxiety for the speedy admission of Michigan into the Union, and said that he was then prepared to vote for the bill, and trusted that gentlemen would concur with him in opinion, that there was no necessity for the insertion of a preamble.

The question was then put on MR. MORRIS'S amendment to the preamble of the bill, and decided in the negative:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Southard, Swift, White—18.

So the amendment to the preamble was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

On motion of MR. CLAY, the Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the Treasury order of July, 1836.

The question being on MR. RIVES'S substitute,

MR. STRANGE addressed the Chair: I am opposed to the original resolutions, because they propose to rescind an executive order. I do not mean by this a mere verbal criticism, for I suppose the honorable Senator really meant what his resolution contained, and proposes to rescind or repeal an executive order by a vote of the National Legislature; and this, with due deference, I conceived to be a manifest solecism. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this Government are wisely separated by the constitution, and one cannot interfere with the province of another. The legislative prescribes rules for the executive and judiciary, but cannot itself perform any legislative or judicial function, except in the special cases set forth in the constitution. Congress may, if it be necessary and proper, command the Executive to repeal the Treasury order, but cannot itself repeal it. Congress passes laws for the government of every citizen, from the highest to the lowest, and at his own peril he yields or withholds obedience. As well, and even with more propriety, might the Supreme Court say it repeals an act of Congress, when it pronounces it unconstitutional, and refuses to enforce it. And as well might Congress say it repeals a decision of the Supreme Court, when that decision, having opened its eyes to some defect in the existing law, induces it to prescribe a new rule for future action. Even when the decisions of the court are palpably repugnant to the existing law, Congress cannot repeal them. Congress may direct what decisions shall be made in future, but cannot repeal those already published. Neither can it repeal the decisions of the Executive. The Legislature prescribes rules for the government of both these departments, and to each of them it must be left to apply them; and each must, in the first instance, judge how far its own actions square with the rules prescribed, upon its own official responsibility. A direct declaration of repeal, therefore, must be altogether inoperative, and of course an absurdity. The truth is, this Treasury order is altogether an executive act, and can only be undone by executive authority. Congress may command its repeal, and doubtless the Executive would yield such command respectful obedience. But it strikes me there is something in the mode of this undertaking to effect the repeal of the Treasury order, not consistent with strict parliamentary propriety; at least, not altogether consistent with the professed purpose of those who desire its repeal. It is laid down in Jefferson's Manual, the highest authority acknowledged by us in such matters, that "When the House commands any thing, it is by order. But facts, principles, their own opinions and purposes, are expressed in the form of resolutions." Now, the resolutions before us, while they assume the name of resolutions, effect the office of orders, and to perform more, as I think I have before shown, than even an order would be competent to accomplish.

Treasury Circular.

But, again, I am opposed to the resolutions, because they propose to prescribe a rule, unnecessarily, as I conceive, in a matter where, from its nature, a large discretion is desirable, being highly convenient, and in no degree liable to dangerous use. I know it is the fashion of the day to suppose that the executive authority is the only one liable to abuse, or in any way likely to threaten the liberties of the country. Among the blessings, Mr. President, for which we of the present day are debtors to Heaven, there are none, politically speaking, for which we have more just reason to be grateful, than that the formation of our constitution has not been left to our own hands; that we have received it ready formed, in all its beautiful proportions, by men who seem to have been commissioned by Heaven for this very thing. Surrounded by an atmosphere just purified by the storms and convulsions of the Revolution, every one feeling more strongly than any other want that of an equal, wise, and impartial Government, they addressed themselves to the task with no faculty biased by local or personal passions. They sought for truth with their visual organs purged from the mists of prejudice, and they found her. They listened to her inspired instructions, and penned the happy constitution under which we now live, the envy of other nations, and the pride of our own. They divided Government into three departments, and prescribed the sphere in which each should move. Harmony and safety will ever attend its action, while each strictly observes the law of its creation. But it is difficult to say from which the most direful results are to be apprehended, should it with eccentric movement forsake its natural orbit, and invade those of its sister planets. Viewing this matter in the light of experience, we should be led to suppose that from the legislative department there was the greatest reason for jealousy of usurpation, or invasion of the province of others. The most remarkable and desolating revolutions of which modern history furnishes an account are those of England and France, and the complete prostration of the executive and judicial authorities beneath the feet of the legislative marked those sanguinary events. But to press this portion of the subject no farther, suffice it to say, that true wisdom dictates to each department great forbearance towards the others, and a no less scrupulous abstinence from infringing upon their rights, than a jealous care of its own. The collection of the revenue is strictly an executive act. The Legislature, to be sure, can alone prescribe the subjects of revenue, and the mode of its collection; but the funds, to use the language of the resolution, in which receivable, is, in the general, a fair subject to be left to the Executive, under the constitution, and the broad range of circumstances which may from time to time arise. The general principle, certainly, (from which neither common reason nor convenience will allow of any wide departure,) is, that the public revenue should be collected in what is obviously equivalent to so much gold and silver, the acknowledged standards of value both by the constitution and the usage of trade. What is so equivalent must depend greatly upon circumstances continually fluctuating—the currents of trade, and the peculiar application for which any given portion of the revenue is designed. Sometimes the ease of the citizen may be consulted to a great extent, in perfect consistency with the security of the Treasury; and at others, nothing short of the precious metals themselves will serve the purposes of the public demands. I do not mean to say that Congress has not the power of dictating even the funds in which the revenue may be paid, or that there is any thing improper in her doing so; but that, in general, the officer whose business it is to supervise the Treasury, in his turn under the supervision of the Executive, will be well capable of judging, and much more competent to act to the advantage of the public, under sudden emergencies, (which no human sagacity is sufficient to foresee,) when untrammelled by rigid, inflexible rules; and, therefore, unless strong considerations call for the enactment of such rules, it is far better to leave him with the responsibility upon his own shoulders, which, without such enactments, would rest there. Thus the executive class of public officers would be stimulated to more activity; feeling, in addition to their responsibility to us, the representatives of the people, a direct responsibility to them, our common masters, for the wisdom and fidelity of their action.

I am again opposed to the resolutions, because, as I conceive, they are intended to censure the President of the United States. If any doubt rested upon the mind, upon the mere perusal of the resolutions themselves, that doubt must cease as soon as we listen to the comments of their advocates, and the reasons which urge them to their support. Some of the reasons upon which they are avowedly supported are the evil motives ascribed to the President, in causing the issue of the Treasury order they are designed to repeal. He is, in effect, charged with falsehood; for the Treasury order bears upon its face, doubtlessly under his own authority and direction, the motives which induced him to give it existence; and we are here publicly told that his true motives were of an altogether different kind; thus directly charging him with an attempt to deceive the public, in placing before it false motives for his official action. But this is not all. He is not only charged with falsehood, but at least one of the motives imputed to him is in itself altogether base and dishonorable. We are told that some of the land speculators alluded to in the order were his own particular friends, whose interest he was solicitous to promote; that they have already made large investments in the public lands, and are threatened with loss, or at least a necessity of holding for an inconvenient length of time, should the United States continue to be a competitor with them in unrestricted sales; and that, while the United States is demanding specie, they, by selling for paper, would acquire a preference in the market, and be enabled to command better prices; thus making the President of the United States, in forgetfulness of his high station, and his well-earned honors, to sell the latter for trash to enrich his friends, and prostitute the former to gratify their avarice. Another motive assigned is, that being in heart opposed to the deposit law of the last session, he was desirous of throwing every difficulty in the way of its execution, to verify the evil omens uttered by himself and friends in relation to it, and to render it odious in the eyes of the people. To accomplish all this, the Treasury order was framed, in the hope that the pressure and embarrassments it should produce might be imputed to the deposit act. It may be that the President of the United States was not well inclined to the deposit act, and that in truth it is a mischievous measure, some of the evils of which are now demonstrating themselves; that those are now feeling them who could not in any other way be brought to dream of their existence; that in fact the connection between present difficulties and the deposit act is so intimate as to make it appear that one was got up by previous design to accompany the other. But however all this may be, it is well known the present Chief Magistrate is not a man to accomplish his views by any indirection; that a bold and manly, and, as his enemies think, a rash and reckless policy, is one of his characteristics. Yet gentlemen who advocate these resolutions ascribe to him conduct highly disingenuous, and motives exceedingly dishonorable. It is not my wish, in malice, to impugn the motives of any one; and if I should refer unfavorably to the motives of a party, I hope no gentleman within or without these walls will consider it personal to himself, or springing, in the slightest degree, from individual feeling. We are all men, and are all liable to have our judgment warped, however clear and intuitive originally, by the allurements of persuasion, the fascination of affection, the delusions of prejudice, or the madness of passion, and when I find myself differing with another, I am always willing to suppose, and have it supposed, that either he or myself have fallen under subjection to one of these malign influences.

Message from the President—Isthmus of Darien and of Nicaragua—Proposals for crossing by Ship-canal.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

Immediately after the passage by the Senate, at a former session, of the resolution requesting the President to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by equitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as might undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as ought to be established to compensate the capitalists who might engage in such undertaking, and complete the work, an agent was employed to obtain information in respect to the situation and character of the country through which the line of communication, if established, would necessarily pass, and the state of the projects which were understood to be contemplated for opening such communication by a canal or a railroad. The agent returned to the United States in September last, and although the information collected by him is not as full as could have been desired, yet it is sufficient to show that the probability of an early execution of any of the projects which have been set on foot for the construction of the communication alluded to is not so great as to render it expedient to open a negotiation at present with any foreign Government upon the subject.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1837.

Treasury Circular.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution to rescind the Treasury order of July, 1836, &c., together with the substitute offered therefor by Mr. Rives, in the following words:

"Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether from customs, public lands, taxes, debts, or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes: that is,

Treasury Circular.

from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the first day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be receivable; and from and after the first of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of less denomination than twenty dollars: Provided, however, That no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash."

The question being on the adoption of his substitute,

Mr. RIVES said that, in asking the indulgence of the Senate, it was not his design to abuse their patience by rearguing the questions which had already been so fully and so ably discussed, in relation to the legality or the policy of the Treasury circular. It was his wish only to state, somewhat more at large than he had yet had an opportunity of doing, the views under the influence of which he had offered the proposition which is now pending before the Senate, as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. EWING.) In reference to the most important objects of the Treasury circular, he regarded that measure as having done its office; and the interests of the country are now much more concerned in the provision we shall make for the future, than in any decision we may pronounce upon the past. When I had the honor some days ago, said Mr. R., of addressing a few remarks to the Senate on this subject, I said what I take great pleasure now in repeating, that, in whatever different lights the operation of the Treasury circular may have been viewed, of one thing I was thoroughly persuaded—that the motives which had induced the high functionary at the head of the Government to direct the issuing of it were in perfect consonance with that elevated and patriotic spirit which had so conspicuously marked the whole course of his public life; and that no defect of legality, in my estimation, had been shown in the authority under which it was issued. I added, also, that the measure was properly to be viewed as a temporary one, to continue in operation until the action of Congress on the whole subject could be obtained; and that the President himself, as shown by the evidence of his Message at the commencement of the session, attached no importance to its adoption as a permanent rule of policy.

One of the leading objects of the Treasury circular, at the time it was issued, was to check that tendency to extravagant bank issues and bank credits which has so signally marked the history of the last twelve or eighteen months. But, so far as that object is concerned, the same effect will now be produced in a manner not less certain, though by a process more gradual, and therefore easier and safer to the community, by the operation of the deposit act. No one can doubt, Mr. President, that one of the chief causes of the recent over-action of the banking system in this country is to be found in the immense sums of public moneys left in the deposit banks, and which have been used and traded upon by them, as an addition of so much to their banking capitals. This is a state of things which has been eminently pernicious in all its bearings. The correction of so great an evil formed in my mind one of the strongest considerations for giving the cordial support I did to the deposit act of the last session; a measure which, however much misconceived or misrepresented in regard to its true character, has, in my opinion, conferred upon the country a double benefaction of the highest value: first, in putting out of the way of the Government the temptation, whose powerful influence we were already beginning to feel, to useless, extravagant, and anti-republican expenditure; and, secondly, in taking from the deposit banks that gratuitous and artificial increment of their capitals, which has been a main cause of the unnatural distention of our paper currency, and of that inordinate spirit of speculation which has prevailed through the country. In gradually withdrawing, as we now are doing by the act of the last session, these large amounts of the public treasure from the possession of the deposit banks, and in avoiding, as, I trust, by a wise and provident legislation, we shall do, the accumulation of any idle surplus in future, the Government will take away the stimulus which itself has given to the excessive issues and credits of the banks; and we may then hope that, under the salutary control of the laws of trade, they will return within those safe, proper, and natural limits which the business of the community requires.

While on this branch of the subject, Mr. President, I will make one other observation. However necessary or desirable the contraction of our paper circulation may be, (if it be, indeed, in the large excess which is supposed by many,) it must be borne in mind that there is no operation more delicate than the reduction of the currency of a country. A decreasing circulating medium, it is agreed alike by theoretical writers and by enlightened practical men, is precisely that condition in the moneyed affairs of a community which is the most critical and distressing. It is a transition from high to low prices, from a certain and liberal reward of labor to diminished wages and precarious employment, from active and prospering industry to general languor and depression in all the operations of business. It is a change to which society always adjusts itself slowly and painfully; and, under the most favorable circumstances, must be attended with distress—often with extensive ruin. Great caution, therefore, is necessary, lest it be unduly precipitated in its progress, or harshly aggravated in its effects. We have, in the history of our own country, at a period not too remote for the recollection of most of us, a memorable example of the distressing effects of a rapid reduction of the circulating medium. It is strikingly exhibited, in all its details, in the able report of Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury, on the currency, in 1820. It is there shown that the circulation of the country, in the three years from 1816 to 1819, had been brought down from 110 millions in the former, to 45 millions in the latter; making the enormous reduction of 65 millions within that short period! The scene of wide-spread ruin and distress which ensued is fresh in the memories of all who witnessed it. It inculcates, at least, the necessity of caution in the action of the Government on this subject. It is our duty to withdraw from the banking operations of the country that artificial stimulant which the Government itself has administered; but that being done, a just policy, in general, requires that the concerns of trade should be left to regulate themselves by their own natural and remedial laws.

Regarding, then, the Treasury circular as having mainly done its office, we are now called upon to establish some permanent and equal rule for the collection of the public revenues. It is a duty which we cannot evade if we would. In the joint power which the constitution invests in Congress, to "lay and collect" taxes, our duty is read to us in terms too significant to be mistaken. It is as much a part of the legislative authority to say in what manner and by what rule the collection of the public revenue shall be effected, as to say to what amount and from sources it shall be raised. Important as such a regulation is at all times, it derives, at the present moment, a particular interest from its close connection with the subject of the currency. It is in that connection that all who have participated in this debate, have discussed this question before the Senate; and it is doubtless in that connection that the public attention is turned with most anxiety to our decision upon it. I feel, Mr. President, all the magnitude and all the difficulty of this great question of the currency. There is none that rises higher in importance, or descends more deeply into the interests of society. It "comes home to the business and the bosoms of men." It affects alike the humblest laborer and the wealthiest capitalist; on it depend the security of property, the stability of contracts, the comfort and support of families, and, I will add, in a great degree, the public morals; for nothing, in my opinion, is more calculated to unsettle the moral sense and habits of a community than the dispositions and pursuits fostered by the lottery of a fluctuating currency. In approaching such a subject, I feel all the diffidence which a just sense of its difficulty and importance properly inspires. But, having submitted to the Senate a proposition which, if adopted, would, I flatter myself, exert no small influence on this great interest; and as the friends of the administration (myself among the number) have been accused of entertaining visionary, impracticable, and pernicious notions in regard to a reform of the currency, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate while I state, with as much precision as I may, the views of that reform which I entertain, and which have determined the shape of the proposition now under their consideration.

In discussing the question of a reform of the currency, it is necessary to settle our ideas clearly as to two things: first, the nature and extent of the end to be aimed at; secondly, the means by which it is to be attained. If I am asked, what is the end I propose, whether I am in favor of a specie circulation exclusively, and the total suppression of bank paper, I answer, No. Even if such an object were desirable, it is plainly impracticable. In the present state of commercial progress and refinement throughout the world, it would probably be impracticable anywhere; but in this country, and under our system of government especially, it is obviously wholly unattainable. Whether right or wrong, we find twenty-six independent State Legislatures possessed of the power to create banking corporations. Whatever speculative doubts may exist in the minds of some as to the constitutional validity of this power, the States now actually possess and exercise it, as they have invariably done from the foundation of the Government, and there is not the slightest probability that they will ever be divested of it. In every sober and practical scheme of policy, we must proceed upon the assumption that this independent State power will remain. How, then, can the banking system be suppressed by this Government? Such a notion, if entertained anywhere, would indeed be Utopian and visionary.

My object, then, would be, not the destruction of the banking system and the total suppression of bank paper, but an efficient regulation of it, and its restriction to safe and proper limits; not the exclusive use of specie as a circulating medium, but such a substantial enlargement and general diffusion of it in actual circulation, as would make it the practical currency of common life, the universal medium of ordinary transactions; in short, the money of the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, and the tradesman; while the merchant should be left in the enjoyment of the facilities of a sound and restricted paper currency for his larger operations. Such a reformation in the currency as this would, in my opinion, be productive of the most beneficial results. It would give security to the industrious classes of society for the products of their labor, against the casualties incident to the paper system. The laborer, in returning to the bosom of his family from his weekly toil, would no longer find his slumbers broken by the apprehension that the hard earnings of the week, perhaps the accumulation of long years of honest industry, might be dissipated in a moment by the explosion of a bank, or the bursting of some paper bubble. It would give security, to a great extent, to the whole body of the community against those disastrous fluctuations in the value of property and contracts, which arise from the ebbs and flows of an unrestricted paper currency. It would give security to the banks themselves, by providing them, in the daily internal circulation of the country, an abundant and accessible fund for recruiting their resources, whenever they should be exposed to an extraordinary pressure.

This, sir, is the happy state of things we might promise ourselves from replacing (as it is the aim of the proposition which I have had the honor to submit to do) all bank bills, under the denomination of twenty dollars, with a solid circulation of gold and silver. Is there any thing wild, any thing visionary, any thing pernicious, in such a system of currency as this? It has the sanction, Mr. President, of the profoundest writers on questions of political economy, and has received the practical assent of the wisest nations. I am well aware that it would ill become me to present for the consideration of the Senate any scheme which was not thus tested and approved. Of all the writers who have treated and examined questions of this character, none possess so high an authority as the author of the "Wealth of Nations." It has been well and justly said that Adam Smith had done for the science of political economy what Bacon and Newton had done for physical science, and Sydney and Locke for the science of government and the fundamental principles of civil and political liberty. His work, appearing contemporaneously with the American Revolution, was deeply imbued with the free spirit and the large and vigorous thought which so remarkably distinguished that great era. He came forth as the zealous and powerful champion of free trade, the inflexible opponent of monopoly and restriction, in all their multiplied forms, the ardent advocate of every thing that is liberal, generous, and popular, in the institutions of society and the intercourse of nations. No work has ever exercised so large an influence for good on the policy and destiny of nations; and none, I am sure, considering the stamp of liberty as well as wisdom impressed upon it, is better entitled to the respect of an assembly of American legislators. Adam Smith, by a strange mistake, has been held up, rather opprobriously, as the advocate of a paper system—as the founder, in fact, of the paper school! Sir, there can be no greater mistake than this. While he recognized the utility of a judicious system of banking, in liberating and putting into productive employment capital which would otherwise remain dead and inactive, and the facilities it is calculated to afford to commerce, he yet insists that the general circulation of the country should be gold and silver.

As the general principles he has laid down on the subjects of banking and currency continue still to be appealed to by the enlightened writers who have followed him, as affording the soundest exposition of those subjects, whatever modifications of subordinate points may have been made by subsequent inquirers, I will give to the Senate, and principally in the words of Adam Smith himself, an outline of his system of currency. After speaking of the advantages to be expected from a judicious and properly conducted system of banking, he says expressly, that "the commerce and industry of a country are not so secure when suspended, as it were, on the Dædalian wings of paper money, as when they travel about on the solid ground of gold and silver." He says, therefore, it is the policy of wise Governments "to guard, not only against that excessive multiplication of paper money which ruins the very banks which issue it, but even against that multiplication of it which enables them to fill the greater part of the circulation of the country with it." He then proceeds to show that "the circulation of every country may be considered as divided into two different branches: the circulation of the dealers with one another, and the circulation between the dealers and consumers." His next position is, "that paper money may be so regulated as either to confine itself very much to the circulation between the different dealers, or to extend itself likewise to a great part of that between the dealers and consumers." The regulation is effected by fixing the denomination of the notes permitted to be issued. "It were better," he adds, "that no bank notes were issued in any part of the kingdom for a smaller sum than five pounds. Paper money would then confine itself to the circulation between the different dealers;" and where this is the case, he says, "there is always plenty of gold and silver." "But where it extends itself to a considerable part of the circulation between dealers and consumers, it banishes gold and silver almost entirely from the country." The system of Adam Smith, then, resolves itself into this: that the circulation between dealer and dealer may be of paper, but that the circulation between dealer and consumer should be of the precious metals; that this result ought to be secured by prohibiting the issue of bank notes for a less sum than five pounds, and that, if such a restriction be adopted, there "will always be plenty of gold and silver" in circulation, performing all the offices of exchange in the "ordinary transactions" of society, while the use of paper would be confined to commercial operations of a larger scale. Instead of being the advocate, far less the founder, of an unrestricted paper system, he urges the necessity of confining it to commercial accommodation in the larger transactions between dealer and dealer. He is in favor of the suppression of all bank notes under five pounds; whereby gold and silver will fill the ordinary channels of circulation, and become, in fact, the common practical currency of the country.

But this system does not rest on the authority of Adam Smith alone. Not to mention the illustrious names or the policy of other enlightened nations in support of it, it has received the successive sanction of a long line of the ablest practical statesmen in England. It is a remarkable fact, that the great work of Adam Smith having appeared in 1776, the Parliament of Great Britain, in the very next year, passed a law prohibiting all bankers from issuing notes under the denomination of five pounds. This continued to be the legislative policy of that country till the memorable year of 1797, when, in consequence of the exigencies and embarrassments of that tremendous conflict, growing out of the French revolution, which desolated and convulsed Europe for more than twenty years, the Bank of England, with the sanction of the Government, suspended specie payments; and, at the same time, resorted to an issue of one-pound and two-pound notes. As soon, however, as the war was at an end, and the country was in a situation to admit of the resumption of specie payments by the bank, the enlightened statesmen of England resorted to the prohibition of all notes under the denomination of five pounds. This return to a sound policy, however, was not accomplished, nor has it been maintained, without encountering a strenuous and persevering opposition.

There is something so instructive in the history of this reform of the currency in England, that it deserves to be traced somewhat more in detail. In 1819, a law was passed directing a complete resumption of specie payments by the bank in three years, to wit, in 1822; and at the same time it was enacted that in two years after, to wit, in 1824, all small notes under the denomination of five pounds should be prohibited. The first provision was carried fully into effect at the designated period; but such was the influence of the country bankers, and other associated interests, that, before the appointed time for the suppression of the small notes arrived, the latter provision was repealed, and the final suppression of the small notes was adjourned to 1833, the year of the expiration of the charter of the Bank of England. But the great commercial convulsion of 1825, which swept banks, merchants, farmers, every thing, before it, with the destructive fury of a tornado, soon after occurred, and forcibly admonished British statesmen of the necessity of seeking a remedy—in part, at least—in a more solid constitution of their currency. Accordingly, in the beginning of 1826, Lord Liverpool and Mr. Robinson, the one the first Lord of the Treasury, the other the Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced and carried a bill providing for the prohibition, after April, 1829, of all small notes under the denomination of five pounds. This law was stoutly and zealously opposed at the time of its enactment, and repeated attempts were subsequently made to procure its repeal, before the period fixed for its operation. But these efforts were happily unavailing; and the doctrine of Adam Smith, in regard to the prohibition of all notes under the denomination of five pounds, re-established in 1829, after experiencing the bitter fruits of a temporary departure from it, may now be considered as the final and settled policy of the British Government. It has received the sanction and support of her ablest statesmen—of Liverpool, of Peel, of Canning, of Huskisson, of Brougham, of Wellington—all of whom, upon the fullest experience and consideration, have, from time to time, borne their testimony to the value and importance of this essential restriction upon a paper circulation.

And what has been the result in practice? Why, to give to the people of England virtually a metallic currency; for gold and silver form there the daily habitual medium of all ordinary transactions. A bank note, except on special occasions, is a sort of phenomenon. On this point we have precise information. It appears, from statistical returns referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons, a few years ago, that the amount of gold then in circulation was twenty-two millions of pounds sterling, and of silver eight millions of pounds sterling. I do not speak of gold and silver locked up in the vaults of banks; but of that which passes daily from hand to hand, in the ordinary transactions of business. Mr. Gallatin, in his instructive pamphlet on the currency, published in 1830, states the metallic circulation of England at precisely the same amount. Allowing nothing for any augmentation since, the people of England have, then, an actual circulating medium of gold and silver to the amount of about one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury, (who, doubtless, has access to the most authentic sources of information on the subject,) in his annual report at the commencement of the session, states the whole paper circulation of England, at this time, at one hundred and fifty-two millions of dollars. We may, therefore, conclude that what Mr. Gallatin says, in the pamphlet thus referred to, is substantially correct—that, “by the suppression of all notes of a less denomination than £5 sterling, the amount of the circulating metallic currency in England has become equal to that of bank notes of every description.” One-half of the entire circulation consists of gold and silver, constantly passing from hand to hand, and performing all the offices of exchange in the ordinary business of life, and thus forming, in fact, the practical currency of the country. It is this large infusion of the precious metals which has preserved the currency of England, in the main, in a healthy condition, under a system of banking which her prime minister himself, (Lord Liverpool,) in 1826, pronounced to be, in other respects, “the most insecure, the most rotten, the very worst, which it is possible to conceive.”

It is this abundant supply of the precious metals, filling and saturating the ordinary channels of circulation, which I desire to see brought about in our own country. That is the end to be aimed at. What are the means by which it is to be accomplished? We have seen that in England it has been accomplished by the prohibition of all bank notes of a less denomination than £5. Similar means will, doubtless, accomplish the same end here; and, I must add, nothing else will. It is in vain to expect to bring gold and silver coins into circulation, without a previous suppression of all notes of corresponding denominations. The reason is obvious. If there exist in any country two distinct currencies, both of them answering equally well the purposes of domestic circulation, but one of them possessing only a local value, confined to the country of its emission, while the other has a universal and equal value throughout the world, the latter will necessarily go abroad into the commerce of the world, in quest of the riches and productions of foreign nations, leaving the former at home to perform an office which it does equally as well, though it would be wholly without use or value abroad. The total incompatibility, therefore, of a paper and metallic currency of the same denominations, has grown into an axiom. Edmund Burke, (whose sagacity in questions of this sort is well known,) at the memorable period of the bill brought forward by Mr. Pitt for the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, in 1797, in a letter written during his last illness to Mr. Canning, which the latter gentleman brought most touchingly to the notice of the House of Commons, in a debate of great interest and instruction, on this whole subject, at a much more recent period, (1826,) used these memorable words: "Tell Mr. Pitt that, if he consents to the issue of one-pound notes, he will never see a guinea again." The prophecy, sir, became history. No one saw a guinea in circulation in England while the bank continued the issue of one-pound notes.

In 1828, when a great struggle again took place in the British Parliament, on the final consummation of the effort to restore a metallic currency, there was not a single distinguished man who did not bear his testimony to the truth of Mr. Burke's axiom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, on that occasion, "there was a natural antipathy between the one-pound note and the sovereign. They would not exist together, for the note soon drove the sovereign out of circulation." The Duke of Wellington, who was eminently a practical man, and spoke from the teachings of experience, said "the experience of the last few years had proved the truth of the theory, that one-pound notes and gold sovereigns would not circulate at the same time. If you are to have gold in circulation, you cannot have one-pound notes." Mr. Huskisson, whose familiarity with questions of this sort was the result of profound studies, as well as matured experience, said, still more pointedly, "when the paper is let in, the gold will disappear. They might vote the money, they might coin it, but how could they retain it in the country?" This remark applies most forcibly to our present situation. We have voted the metallic money, we have coined it, but it will not circulate. Since we corrected, by law, the under-valuation of the gold coins, (but little more than two years ago,) the quantity of gold in the country, according to the late annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, has increased fifteen millions. We have coined at our own mint, within that time, according to the same authority, ten millions of gold. But where is it? In the vaults of the banks, or hoarded by individuals! and we shall never see it in circulation until we have opened the way for it by a previous suppression of the small notes. If we mean to do any thing practical and effectual for introducing a more general circulation of specie, we must begin at the right end, by first putting down the small-note circulation.

Mr. KENT presented the credentials of JOHN H. SPENCE, elected by the Legislature of Maryland a Senator from that State, to fill the place vacated by the death of Hon. R. H. GOLDSBOROUGH, till the 4th of March next.

Texas Independence.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table one day, for consideration:

Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against the said State, it is expedient and proper, and in perfect conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States."

THURSDAY, January 12.

Expunging Resolution.

[The resolution and the preamble were the same which had been presented at the previous session, and which it is unnecessary to repeat.]

The resolution and preamble having been read, Mr. BENTON said: Mr. President, it is now near three years since the resolve was adopted by the Senate, which it is my present motion to expunge from the journal. At the moment that this resolve was adopted, I gave notice of my intention to move to expunge it; and then expressed my confident belief that the motion would eventually prevail. That expression of confidence was not an ebullition of vanity, or a presumptuous calculation, intended to accelerate the event it affected to foretell. It was not a vain boast, or an idle assumption, but was the result of a deep conviction of the injustice done President Jackson, and a thorough reliance upon the justice of the American people. I felt that the President had been wronged; and my heart told me that this wrong would be redressed. The event proves that I was not mistaken. The question of expunging this resolution has been carried to the people, and their decision has been had upon it. They decide in favor of the expurgation; and their decision has been both made and manifested, and communicated to us in a great variety of ways. A great number of States have expressly instructed their Senators to vote for this expurgation. A very great majority of the States have elected Senators and Representatives to Congress, upon the express ground of favoring this expurgation. The Bank of the United States, which took the initiative in the accusation against the President, and furnished the material and worked the machinery which was used against him, and which was then so powerful on this floor, has become more and more odious to the public mind, and musters now but a slender phalanx of friends in the two Houses of Congress. The late presidential election furnishes additional evidence of public sentiment. The candidate who was the friend of President Jackson, the supporter of his administration, and the avowed advocate for the expurgation, has received a large majority of the suffrages of the whole Union, and that after an express declaration of his sentiments on this precise point. The evidence of the public will, exhibited in all these forms, is too manifest to be mistaken, too explicit to require illustration, and too imperative to be disregarded. Omitting details and specific enumeration of proofs, I refer to our own files for the instructions to expunge—to the complexion of the two Houses for the temper of the people—to the denationalized condition of the Bank of the United States for the fate of the imperious accuser—and to the issue of the presidential election for the answer of the Union. All these are pregnant proofs of the public will; and the last pre-eminently so—because both the question of the expurgation and the form of the process were directly put in issue upon it. A representative of the people from the State of Kentucky formally interrogated a prominent candidate for the presidency on these points, and required from him a public answer, for the information of the public mind. The answer was given, and published, and read by all the voters before the election; and I deem it right to refer to that answer in this place, not only as evidence of the points put in issue, but also for the purpose of doing more ample justice to President Jackson, by incorporating into the legislative history of this case the high and honorable testimony in his favor of the eminent citizen who has just been exalted to the lofty honors of the American presidency:

“Your last question seeks to know ‘my’ opinion as to the constitutional power of the Senate or House of Representatives to expunge or obliterate from the journals the proceedings of a previous session.

“You will, I am sure, be satisfied, upon further consideration, that there are but few questions of a political character less connected with the duties of the office of President of the United States, or that might not with equal propriety be put by an elector to a candidate for that station, than this. With the journals of neither House of Congress can he properly have any thing to do. But as your question has doubtless been induced by the pendency of Colonel Benton’s resolutions to expunge from the journals of the Senate certain other resolutions touching the official conduct of President Jackson, I prefer to say that I regard the passage of Colonel Benton’s preamble and resolutions to be an act of justice to a faithful and greatly injured public servant, not only constitutional in itself but imperiously demanded by a proper respect for the well-known will of the people.”

I do not propose, sir, to draw violent, unwarranted, or strained inferences. I do not assume to say that the question of this expurgation was a leading or a controlling point in the issue of this election. I do not assume to say, or insinuate, that every individual, and every voter, delivered his suffrage with reference to this question. Doubtless there were many exceptions. Still, the triumphant election of the candidate who had expressed himself in the terms just quoted, and who was, besides, the personal and political friend of President Jackson, and the avowed approver of his administration, must be admitted to a place among the proofs in this case, and ranked among the high concurring evidences of the public sentiment in favor of the motion which I make.

Assuming, then, that we have ascertained the will of the people on this great question, the inquiry presents itself, how far the expression of that will ought to be conclusive of our action here. I hold that it ought to be binding and obligatory upon us; and that, not only upon the principles of representative government, which require obedience to the known will of the people, but also in conformity to the principles upon which the proceeding against President Jackson was conducted, when the sentence against him was adopted. Then, every thing was done with special reference to the will of the people. Their impulsion was assumed to be the sole motive to action, and to them the ultimate verdict was expressly referred. The whole machinery of alarm and pressure, every engine of political and moneyed power, was put in motion, and worked for many months, to excite the people against the President, and to stir up meetings, memorials, petitions, travelling committees, and distress deputations, against him; and each symptom of popular discontent was hailed as an evidence of public will, and quoted here as proof that the people demanded the condemnation of the President. Not only legislative assemblies, and memorials from large assemblies, were then produced here as evidence of public opinion, but the petitions of boys under age, the remonstrances of a few signers, and the results of the most inconsiderable elections, were ostentatiously paraded and magnified as the evidence of the sovereign will of our constituents. Thus, sir, the public voice was every thing, while that voice partially obtained through political and pecuniary inachinations, was adverse to the President. Then, the popular will was the shrine at which all worshipped. Now, when that will is regularly, soberly, repeatedly, and almost universally, expressed through the ballot-boxes, at the various elections, and turns out to be in favor of the President, certainly no one can disregard it, nor otherwise look at it than as the solemn verdict of the competent and ultimate tribunal, upon an issue fairly made up, fully argued, and duly submitted for decision. As such verdict, I receive it. As the deliberate verdict of the sovereign people, I bow to it. I am content. I do not mean to reopen the case, nor to recommence the argument. I leave that work to others, if any others choose to perform it. For myself, I am content; and, dispensing with further argument, I shall call for judgment, and ask to have execution done upon that unhappy journal, which the verdict of millions of freemen finds guilty of bearing on its face an untrue, illegal, and unconstitutional sentence of condemnation against the approved President of the republic.

Expunging Resolution.

But, while declining to reopen the argument of this question, and refusing to tread over again the ground already traversed, there is another and a different task to perform; one which the approaching termination of President Jackson's administration makes peculiarly proper at this time, and which it is my privilege, and perhaps my duty, to execute, as being the suitable conclusion to the arduous contest in which we have been so long engaged: I allude to the general tenor of his administration, and to its effect, for good or for evil, upon the condition of his country. This is the proper time for such a view to be taken. The political existence of this great man now draws to a close. In little more than forty days he ceases to be a public character. In a few brief weeks he ceases to be an object of political hope to any, and should cease to be an object of political hate, or envy, to all. Whatever of motive the servile and time-serving might have found in his exalted station for raising the altar of adulation, and burning the incense of praise before him, that motive can no longer exist. The dispenser of the patronage of an empire—the chief of this great confederacy of States—is soon to be a private individual, stripped of all power to reward or to punish. His own thoughts, as he has shown us in the concluding paragraph of that message which is to be the last of its kind that we shall ever receive from him, are directed to that beloved retirement from which he was drawn by the voice of millions of freemen, and to which he now looks for that interval of repose which age and infirmities require. Under these circumstances, he ceases to be a subject for the ebullition of the passions, and passes into a character for the contemplation of history. Historically, then, shall I view him; and, limiting this view to his civil administration, I demand where is there a chief magistrate of whom so much evil has been predicted, and from whom so much good has come? Never has any man entered upon the chief magistracy of a country under such appalling predictions of ruin and woe! never has any one been so pursued with direful prognostications! Never has any one been so beset and impeded by a powerful combination of political and moneyed confederates! Never has any one in any country, where the administration of justice has risen above the knife or the bow-string, been so lawlessly and shamelessly tried and condemned by rivals and enemies, without hearing, without defence, without the forms of law or justice! History has been ransacked to find examples of tyrants sufficiently odious to illustrate him by comparison. Language has been tortured to find epithets sufficiently strong to paint him in description. Imagination has been exhausted in her efforts to deck him with revolting and inhuman attributes. Tyrant, despot, usurper; destroyer of the liberties of his country; rash, ignorant, imbecile; endangering the public peace with all foreign nations; destroying domestic prosperity at home; ruining all industry, all commerce, all manufactures; annihilating confidence between man and man; delivering up the streets of populous cities to grass and weeds, and the wharves of commercial towns to the encumbrance of decaying vessels, depriving labor of all reward; depriving industry of all employment; destroying the currency; plunging an innocent and happy people from the summit of felicity to the depths of misery, want, and despair. Such is the faint outline, followed up by actual condemnation, of the appalling denunciations daily uttered against this one man, from the moment he became an object of political competition, down to the concluding moment of his political existence.

The sacred voice of inspiration has told us that there is a time for all things. There certainly has been a time for every evil that human nature admits of to be vaticinated of President Jackson's administration; equally certain, the time has now come for all rational and well-disposed people to compare the predictions with the facts, and to ask themselves if these calamitous prognostications have been verified by events? Have we peace, or war, with foreign nations? Certainly, we have peace! peace with all the world! peace with all its benign, and felicitous, and beneficent influences! Are we respected or despised abroad? Certainly the American name never was more honored throughout the four quarters of the globe, than in this very moment. Do we hear of indignity or outrage in any quarter? of merchants robbed in foreign ports? of vessels searched on the high seas? of American citizens impressed into foreign service? of the national flag insulted anywhere? On the contrary, we see former wrongs repaired; no new ones inflicted. France pays twenty-five millions of francs for spoiliations committed thirty years ago; Naples pays two millions one hundred thousand ducats for wrongs of the same date; Denmark pays six hundred and fifty thousand rixdollars for wrongs done a quarter of a century ago; Spain engages to pay twelve millions of reals velon for injuries of fifteen years' date; and Portugal, the last in the list of former aggressors, admits her liability, and only waits the adjustment of details to close her account by adequate indemnity. So far from war, insult, contempt, and spoliation, from abroad, this denounced administration has been the season of peace and good will, and the auspicious era of universal reparation. So far from suffering injury at the hands of foreign powers, our merchants have received indemnities for all former injuries. It has been the day of accounting, of settlement, and of retribution. The long list of arrearages, extending through four successive previous administrations, has been closed and settled up. The wrongs done to commerce for thirty years back, and under so many different Presidents, and indemnities withheld from all, have been repaired and paid over under the beneficent and glorious administration of President Jackson. But one single instance of outrage has occurred, and that at the extremities of the world, and by a piratical horde, amenable to no law but the law of force. The Malays of Sumatra committed a robbery and massacre upon an American vessel. Wretches! they did not then know that Jackson was President of the United States! and that no distance, no time, no idle ceremonial of treating with robbers and assassins, was to hold back the arm of justice. Commodore Downes went out. His cannon and his bayonets struck the outlaws in their den. They paid in terror and in blood for the outrage which was committed; and the great lesson was taught to these distant pirates—to our antipodes themselves—that not even the entire diameter of this globe could protect them! and that the name of American citizen, like that of Roman citizen in the great days of the republic and of the empire, was to be the inviolable passport of all that wore it throughout the whole extent of the habitable world.

At home the most gratifying picture presents itself to the view: the public debt paid off; taxes reduced one-half; the completion of the public defences systematically commenced; the compact with Georgia, uncomplicated since 1802, now carried into effect, and her soil ready to be freed, as her jurisdiction has been delivered from the presence and incumbrance of an Indian population. Mississippi and Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee and North Carolina, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, in a word, all the States incumbered with an Indian population, have been relieved from that incumbrance; and the Indians themselves have been transferred to new and permanent homes, every way better adapted to the enjoyment of their existence, the preservation of their rights, and the improvement of their condition.

The currency is not ruined! On the contrary, seventy-five millions of specie in the country is a spectacle never seen before, and is the barrier of the people against the designs of any banks which may attempt to suspend payments, and to force a dishonored paper currency upon the community. These seventy-five millions are the security of the people against the dangers of a depreciated and inconvertible paper money. Gold, after a disappearance of thirty years, is restored to our country. All Europe beholds with admiration the success of our efforts, in three years, to supply ourselves with the currency which our constitution guarantees, and which the example of France and Holland shows to be so easily attainable, and of such incalculable value to industry, morals, economy, and solid wealth. The success of these efforts is styled, in the best London papers, not merely a reformation, but a revolution, in the currency! a revolution by which our America is now regaining from Europe the gold and silver which she has been sending to them for thirty years past.

Domestic industry is not paralyzed, confidence is not destroyed, factories are not stopped, workmen are not mendicants for bread and employment, credit is not extinguished, prices have not sunk, grass is not growing in the streets of populous cities, the wharves are not lumbered with decaying vessels, columns of curses, rising from the bosoms of a ruined and agonized people, are not ascending to heaven against the destroyer of a nation's felicity and prosperity. On the contrary, the reverse of all this is true! and true to a degree that astonishes and bewilders the senses. I know that all is not gold that glitters; that there is a difference between a specious and a solid prosperity. I know that a part of the present prosperity is apparent only, the effect of an increase of fifty millions of paper money forced into circulation by one thousand banks; but, after making due allowance for this fictitious and delusive excess, the real prosperity of the country is still unprecedentedly and transcendently great. I know that every flow must be followed by its ebb, that every expansion must be followed by its contraction. I know that a revulsion in the paper system is inevitable; but I know, also, that these seventy-five millions of gold and silver is the bulwark of the country, and will enable every honest bank to meet its liabilities, and every prudent citizen to take care of himself.

Turning to some points in the civil administration of President Jackson, and how much do we not find to admire! The great cause of the constitution has been vindicated from an imputation of more than forty years' duration. He has demonstrated, by the fact itself, that a national bank is not "necessary" to the fiscal operations of the Federal Government, and in that demonstration he has upset the argument of General Hamilton, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and all that ever has been said in favor of the constitutionality of a national bank. All this argument and decision rested upon the single assumption of the "necessity" of that institution to the Federal Government. He has shown it is not "necessary;" that the currency of the constitution, and especially a gold currency, is all that the Federal Government wants, and that she can get that whenever she pleases. In this single act he has vindicated the constitution from an unjust imputation, and knocked from under the decision of the Supreme Court the assumed fact on which it rested. He has prepared the way for the reversal of that decision; and it is a question for lawyers to answer, whether the case is not ripe for the application of that writ of most remedial nature, as Lord Coke calls it, and which was invented lest in any case there should be an oppressive defect of justice—the venerable writ of audita querela defendantis—to ascertain the truth of a fact happening since the judgment, and upon the due finding of which the judgment will be vacated. Let the lawyers bring their books, and answer us if there is not a case here presented for the application of that ancient and most remedial writ.

Expunging Resolution.

From President Jackson the country has first learned the true theory and practical intent of the constitution, in giving to the Executive a qualified negative on the legislative power of Congress. Far from being an odious, dangerous, or kingly prerogative, this power, as vested in the President, is nothing but a qualified copy of the famous veto power vested in the tribunes of the people among the Romans, and intended to suspend the passage of a law until the people themselves should have time to consider it. The qualified veto of the President destroys nothing; it only delays the passage of a law, and refers it to the people for their consideration and decision. It is the reference of the law, not to a committee of the House, or of the whole House, but to the committee of the whole Union. It is a recommitment of the bill to the people, for them to examine and consider; and if, upon this examination, they are content to pass it, it will pass at the next session. The delay of a few months is the only effect of a veto in a case where the people shall ultimately approve a law; where they do not approve it, the interposition of the veto is the barrier which saves them the infliction of a law, the repeal of which might afterwards be almost impossible. The qualified negative is, therefore, a beneficent power, intended, as General Hamilton expressly declares in the Federalist, to protect, first, the executive department from the encroachments of the legislative department; and, secondly, to preserve the people from hasty, dangerous, or criminal legislation on the part of their representatives. This is the design and intention of the veto power; and the fear expressed by General Hamilton was, that Presidents, so far from exercising it too often, would not exercise it as often as the safety of the people required; they might lack the moral courage to stake themselves in opposition to a favorite measure of the majority of the two Houses of Congress, and thus deprive the people, in many instances, of their right to pass upon a bill before it becomes a final law. The cases in which President Jackson has exercised the veto power has shown the soundness of these observations. No ordinary President would have staked himself against the Bank of the United States, and the two Houses of Congress, in 1832. It required President Jackson to confront that power—to stem that torrent—to stay the progress of that charter, and to refer it to the people for their decision. His moral courage was equal to the crisis. He arrested the charter until it could go to the people, and they have arrested it forever. Had he not done so, the charter would have become law, and its repeal almost impossible. The people of the whole Union would now have been in the condition of the people of Pennsylvania, bestrode by the monster, in daily conflict with him, and maintaining a doubtful contest for supremacy between the Government of a State and the directory of a moneyed corporation.

To detail specific acts which adorn the administration of President Jackson, and illustrate the intuitive sagacity of his intellect, the firmness of his mind, his disregard of personal popularity, and his entire devotion to the public good, would be inconsistent with this rapid sketch, intended merely to present general views, and not to detail single actions, howsoever worthy they may be of a splendid page in the volume of history. But how can we pass over the great measure of the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States in the autumn of 1833? that wise, heroic, and masterly measure of prevention, which has rescued an empire from the fangs of a merciless, revengeful, greedy, insatiate, implacable, moneyed power! It is a remark for which I am indebted to the philosophic observation of my most esteemed colleague and friend, (pointing to Dr. LINN,) that, while it requires far greater talent to foresee an evil before it happens, and to arrest it by precautionary measures, than it requires to apply an adequate remedy to the same evil after it has happened, yet the applause bestowed by the world is always greatest in the latter case. Of this the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States is an eminent instance. The veto of 1832, which arrested the charter which Congress had granted, immediately received the applause and approbation of a majority of the Union; the removal of the deposits, which prevented the bank from forcing a re-charter, was disapproved by a large majority of the country, and even of his own friends; yet the veto would have been unavailing, and the bank would have inevitably have been rechartered, if the deposits had not been removed. The immense sums of public money since accumulated would have enabled the bank, if she had retained the possession of it, to have coerced a recharter. Nothing but the removal could have prevented her from extorting a recharter from the sufferings and terrors of the people. If it had not been for that measure, the previous veto would have been unavailing; the bank would have been again installed in power, and this entire Federal Government would have been held as an appendage to that bank, and administered according to her directions, and by her nominees. That great measure of prevention, the removal of the deposits, though feebly and faintly supported by friends at first, has expelled the bank from the field, and driven her into abeyance under a State charter. She is not dead, but, holding her capital and stockholders together under a State charter, she has taken a position to watch events, and to profit by them. The royal tiger has gone into the jungle! and, crouched on his belly, he awaits the favorable moment for emerging from his cover, and springing on the body of the unsuspecting traveller!

The Treasury order for excluding paper money from the land offices is another wise measure, originating in an enlightened forecast, and preventing great mischiefs. The President foresaw the evils of suffering a thousand streams of paper money, issuing from a thousand different banks, to discharge themselves on the national domain. He foresaw that, if these currents were allowed to run their course, the public lands would be swept away, the Treasury would be filled with irredeemable paper, a vast number of banks must be broken by their folly, and the cry set up that nothing but a national bank could regulate the currency. He stopped the course of these streams of paper, and, in so doing, has saved the country from a great calamity, and excited anew the machinations of those whose schemes of gain and mischief have been disappointed, and who had counted on a new edition of panic and pressure, and again saluting Congress with the old story of confidence destroyed, currency ruined, prosperity annihilated, and distress produced, by the tyranny of one man. They began their lugubrious song; but ridicule and contempt have proved too strong for money and insolence; and the panic letter of the ex-president of the denationalized bank, after limping about for a few days, has shrunk from the lash of public scorn, and disappeared from the forum of public debate.

The difficulty with France: what an instance it presents of the superior sagacity of President Jackson over all the commonplace politicians who beset and impede his administration at home! That difficulty, inflamed and aggravated by domestic faction, wore, at one time, a portentous aspect; the skill, firmness, elevation of purpose, and manly frankness, of the President, avoided the danger, accomplished the object, commanded the admiration of Europe, and retained the friendship of France. He conducted the delicate affair to a successful and mutually honorable issue. All is amicably and happily terminated, leaving not a wound, nor even a scar, behind—leaving the Frenchman and American on the ground on which they have stood for fifty years, and should forever stand; the ground of friendship, respect, good will, and mutual wishes for the honor, happiness, and prosperity of each other.

But why this specification? So beneficent and so glorious has been the administration of this President, that where to begin, and where to end, in the enumeration of great measures, would be the embarrassment of him who has his eulogy to make. He came into office the first of generals; he goes out the first of statesmen. His civil competitors have shared the fate of his military opponents; and Washington city has been to the American politicians who have assailed him, what New Orleans was to the British generals who attacked his lines. Repulsed! driven back! discomfited! crushed! has been the fate of all assailants, foreign and domestic, civil and military. At home and abroad, the impress of his genius and of his character is felt. He has impressed upon the age in which he lives the stamp of his arms, of his diplomacy, and of his domestic policy. In a word, so transcendent have been the merits of his administration, that they have operated a miracle upon the minds of his most inveterate opponents. He has expunged their objections to military chieftains! He has shown them that they were mistaken; that military men were not the dangerous rulers they had imagined, but safe and prosperous conductors of the vessel of state. He has changed their fear into love. With visible signs they admit their error, and, instead of deprecating, they now invoke the reign of chieftains. They labored hard to procure a military successor to the present incumbent; and if their love goes on increasing at the same rate, the republic may be put to the expense of periodical wars, to breed a perpetual succession of these chieftains to rule over them and their posterity forever.

To drop this irony, which the inconsistency of mad opponents has provoked, and to return to the plain delineations of historical painting, the mind instinctively dwells on the vast and unprecedented popularity of this President. Great is the influence, great the power, greater than any man ever before possessed in our America, which he has acquired over the public mind. And how has he acquired it? Not by the arts of intrigue, or the juggling tricks of diplomacy; not by undermining rivals, or sacrificing public interests for the gratification of classes or individuals. But he has acquired it, first, by the exercise of an intuitive sagacity which, leaving all book learning at an immeasurable distance behind, has always enabled him to adopt the right remedy, at the right time, and to conquer soonest when the men of forms and office thought him most near to ruin and despair. Next, by a moral courage which knew no fear when the public good beckoned him to go on. Last, and chiefest, he has acquired it by an open honesty of purpose, which knew no concealments; by a straight-forwardness of action, which disdained the forms of office and the arts of intrigue; by a disinterestedness of motive, which knew no selfish or sordid calculation; a devotedness of patriotism, which staked every thing personal on the issue of every measure which the public welfare required him to adopt. By these qualities, and these means, he has acquired his prodigious popularity and his transcendent influence over the public mind; and if there are any who envy that influence and popularity, let them envy, also, and emulate, if they can, the qualities and means by which they were acquired.

Great has been the opposition to President Jackson's administration; greater, perhaps, than ever has been exhibited against any Government, short of actual insurrection and forcible resistance. Revolution has been proclaimed! and every thing has been done that could be expected to produce revolution. The country has been alarmed, agitated, convulsed. From the Senate chamber to the village bar-room, from one end of the continent to the other, denunciation, agitation, excitement, has been the order of the day. For eight years the President of this republic has stood upon a volcano, vomiting fire and flames upon him, and threatening the country itself with ruin and desolation, if the people did not expel the usurper, despot, and tyrant, as he was called, from the high place to which the suffrages of millions of freemen had elevated him.

Great is the confidence which he has always reposed in the discernment and equity of the American people. I have been accustomed to see him for many years, and under many discouraging trials; but never saw him doubt, for an instant, the ultimate support of the people. It was my privilege to see him often, and during the most gloomy period of the panic conspiracy, when the whole earth seemed to be in commotion against him, and when many friends were faltering, and stout hearts were quailing before the raging storm which bank machination, and senatorial denunciation, had conjured up to overwhelm him. I saw him in the darkest moments of this gloomy period; and never did I see his confidence in the ultimate support of his fellow-citizens forsake him for an instant. He always said the people would stand by those who stand by them; and nobly have they justified that confidence! That verdict, the voice of millions, which now demands the expurgation of that sentence which the Senate and the bank then pronounced upon him, is the magnificent response of the people's hearts to the implicit confidence which he then reposed in them. But it was not in the people only that he had confidence; there was another, and a far higher Power, to which he constantly looked to save the country, and its defenders, from every danger; and signal events prove that he did not look to that high Power in vain.

Sir, I think it right, in approaching the termination of this great question, to present this faint and rapid sketch of the brilliant, beneficent, and glorious administration of President Jackson. It is not for me to attempt to do it justice; it is not for ordinary men to attempt its history. His military life, resplendent with dazzling events, will demand the pen of a nervous writer; his civil administration, replete with scenes which have called into action so many and such various passions of the human heart, and which has given to native sagacity so many victories over practised politicians, will require the profound, luminous, and philosophical conceptions of a Livy, a Plutarch, or a Sallust. This history is not to be written in our day. The contemporaries of such events are not the hands to describe them. Time must first do its office—must silence the passions, remove the actors, develop consequences, and canonize all that is sacred to honor, patriotism, and glory. In after ages the historic genius of our America shall produce the writers which the subject demands—men far removed from the contests of this day, who will know how to estimate this great epoch, and how to acquire an immortality for their own names by painting, with a master's hand, the immortal events of the patriot President's life.

And now, sir, I finish the task which, three years ago, I imposed on myself. Solitary and alone, and amidst the jeers and taunts of my opponents, I put this ball in motion. The people have taken it up, and rolled it forward, and I am no longer any thing but a unit in the vast mass which now propels it. In the name of that mass I speak. I demand the execution of the edict of the people; I demand the expurgation of that sentence which the voice of a few Senators, and the power of their confederate, the Bank of the United States, has caused to be placed on the journal of the Senate, and which the voice of millions of freemen has ordered to be expunged from it.

FRIDAY, January 13.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of THOMAS CLAYTON, elected a Senator from Delaware, in the place of the Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON, resigned.

Expunging Resolution.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the special order, the expunging resolution of Mr. BENTON.

Mr. DANA addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Having so recently taken a seat in this chamber, and having neither inclination nor skill for public debate, I should most gladly have given a silent vote on this subject; but, sir, the citizens of the State which I, in connection with my colleague, have the honor to represent, take a deep and lively interest in this question, and I should be thought remiss in my duty, and regardless of their feelings, were

I to remain silent upon it. Maine, sir, is at one extremity of the Union, in a high latitude and cold climate; but, sir, she has a fertile soil, immense forests of timber, with her thousand streams to bear it to the ocean; she is a border State, skirted by the dominion of his Britannic Majesty; she has a large territory (if she was permitted to enjoy it) and a boundless seaboard, indented with numberless bays and harbors, filled with ship yards, ships, and commerce; these lead her citizens to an intercourse with the subjects of their royal neighbor, and by them we are told that we have no Government; that our "King is deposed;" that our President has been tried and condemned by our Senate, and that soon we shall come under the dominion of their king. However gratifying this thought may be to some in our Union, it has but few advocates with us. This leads the hardy, industrious, inquisitive citizens of the East to inquire, what has our beloved President done? Is it true that the Senate have condemned him? Can it be that he, who has triumphantly carried us through so many perils, and always been the people's friend, has betrayed us at last? Let us look into it; let us examine the subject! With this inquiring spirit, so peculiar to the people of the North, my constituents will be satisfied with nothing short of a fair and full investigation of this subject, and a just and impartial decision of the same. And that I may the more readily come to the investigation of it, and not wander from it, I ask permission to have the resolution of March 28, 1834, read from the desk.

This resolution (in these words: "Resolved, That the President, in the late proceeding in relation to the revenue, has assumed on himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both") holds up the President to the people as a usurper; as a violator of that constitution which he has sworn to support.

My first inquiry, Mr. President, is, how was this resolution passed? In what capacity did this honorable Senate act when they passed it? This body has a legislative and executive character, and, in one instance, and in one alone, a judicial character, viz: the trying of impeachments. Although the Senate has a legislative character, yet it is presumed that this body would not act in that capacity only on subjects of legislation. And this surely could not be such; there is no matter on which legislative action could be had. If the President was guilty of a violation of the constitution and laws, if he had committed high crimes and misdemeanors, no legislation would reach him; he must be tried by the constitution and the laws, as they existed at the time of his supposed offence. To me it is clear that this honorable body had no legislative jurisdiction on this subject. Did they then act in their executive capacity? No, sir; for their records show no such proceedings in the executive business. He must have been tried, then, by this honorable Senate in their judicial capacity; and this body has the sole power to try all indictments given it by the constitution, and when sitting for that purpose, in their judicial character. The rules of procedure, as adopted December 31, 1804, in this honorable Senate, to be observed in cases of impeachment, require "that at 12 o'clock of the day appointed for the trial of the impeachment, the legislative and executive business shall be suspended," and the Secretary shall then administer the following oath to the President of the Senate: "You solemnly swear (or affirm) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ———, you will do impartial justice, according to the constitution and laws of the United States; and the President shall administer the said oath to each Senator present." This clearly shows, Mr. President, the views which this honorable body had heretofore entertained of their own powers, and at a time, too, when they were cool and dispassionate, and about to exercise their high judicial functions. Here, sir, you find an important fact, that the Senate never did exercise their legislative and judicial functions at the same time; they are distinct in their natures, and have ever been so considered by this honorable body, and so exercised by them until the 28th of March, 1834, when, for some purpose, of which I will not now speak, for the first time, (and God grant that it may be for the last,) the legislative and judicial functions of this body, contrary to their own rules of procedure, and in violation of the constitution, were exercised at one and the same time, and a judicial sentence is clothed in legislative language. If the object was, sir, to bring a bold offender to justice, why not pursue the legal and constitutional course? Why violate both? But if the object was to exhibit the President as a daring usurper, and unworthy of the confidence of the people, this scheme, this project, would seem to have been the most probable to accomplish it. But it has failed, totally failed.

Again, sir, another rule of this body, adopted at the same time as the former, requires that a summons shall be issued to the person accused, which summons shall be signed by their Secretary, sealed with their seal, and served by the Sergeant-at-arms. This rule also shows clearly that this honorable body never contemplated the exercise of their legislative and judicial functions at the same time. Then, sir, if this position is correct, the sentence of condemnation contained in this resolution was a judicial act, and could only have been done by a judicial tribunal.

Again, sir, it is the right of the accused to have the offence with which he is charged clearly and substantially set forth, and to be duly notified of the time and place of trial; to have an opportunity to appear before this august tribunal, hear the allegations and proofs against him, and confront his accusers, face to face, and then to make his defence. Now, Mr. President, let me ask, when the Chief Magistrate of this nation was condemned, in the resolution proposed to be expunged, did this honorable body suspend legislative and executive business? Did they organize themselves as a judicial tribunal? Did the President of the Senate take the above oath, prescribed by the rules of this honorable body? Did he administer the same to each Senator present? Was the accused furnished with a full and clear description of the charges brought against him? Was he notified of the time and place of trial? And was he permitted to face his accusers? If not, then, sir, permit me to ask, has he been tried by the rules presented by this honorable body? No, sir; he has been tried and condemned for a violation of the constitution and laws of his country, which he had sworn to support, contrary to our own rules—rules which this body had adopted for the trial of such offenders as he is accused of being.

Mr. President, having shown that the President was tried and condemned without form, I will now inquire if he has been tried according to the provisions of the constitution and laws of our country. In what cases, let me ask, can this honorable Senate act in their judicial capacity? Let the constitution answer: "The Senate shall have the sole power to lay all impeachments;" and that instrument conveys to this body no authority to try only in cases of impeachment. Here is the extent of our power, and here is our authority limited. Yes, sir, we can try impeachments, and impeachments only; but, sir, can the Senate originate impeachments? No, sir, they cannot. The constitution has declared, in so many words, that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." Have they exercised that power? Have they accused the President of "assuming on himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, and in derogation of both?" Have they impeached him for so doing? Where is the evidence of it? Have they notified the Senate of such impeachment? No, sir, they have not done it. The impeaching power has never acted in this case. They have not accused the President of any offence whatever. Where, then, sir, I ask, is our jurisdiction? We have no power to try, until the House—the accusing power—have impeached; none at all, not the shadow of any jurisdiction. Can it be, sir, that without even the forms prescribed by this honorable body, without an impeachment, without an accusation of any kind, we have assumed jurisdiction, tried, and condemned the President of the United States for a violation of the constitution and laws of his country? And shall this resolution remain on our journals, or shall it be expunged? Can this be done? Has this Senate a right to do it? There is no rule of more general application than this. The power which creates can destroy—the power which can make can unmake—the power which puts up, can put down—and why should not this rule apply as well to records as to all other cases?

unless, sir, it should be a record of vested rights, about which we have recently been so highly entertained; and I cannot perceive that there are any vested rights contained in this resolution. I think the accused will claim none in this case.

I apprehend, sir, that every legislative, executive, and judicial body have a right to alter, strike out, insert, erase, correct, and amend, their records. It is an inherent, co-ordinate power, without which such bodies could not exist, and transact their business. Is there a time limited, within which such alterations and amendments should be made? If so, what is the time? A day? a month? a year? In the history of records, no such limit is fixed. I trust, then, sir, such alterations may be made at the time deemed most proper by the body to which they belong. If, then, sir, such bodies have their records under their own control, why may they not erase, blot out, expunge, at pleasure? Is there any particular form or manner in which this shall be done? None. Then, sir, if there is no particular time limited for doing this, nor any manner prescribed in which it must be done, the time when, and the manner of doing it, are at the pleasure of the bodies to whom the records belong. If, then, sir, we have the power to expunge this resolution, is it expedient so to do?

Mr. PRESTON next arose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Nothing, Mr. President, (said he,) was farther from my intention, than to have said a single word on this subject. Nor do I now propose to discuss it. That has been done so fully and elaborately on both sides, that I shall not enter upon the argument. I thought I should not have said a word, but I feel a sort of impossibility of withholding the expression of my utter repugnance to this proceeding. If we had not arrived at the very issue; if the question were not ready to be taken, I should have retained my seat, for I have long been endeavoring to school and to subdue my heart down to this submission. During the entire course of events which has gradually brought my mind to the conclusion that this resolution would at some time pass, I have endeavored to discipline my feelings, to curb and restrain them, and bring down my mind to the event, so that, when at last the sad moment should arrive, I might meet it with a becoming resignation; and I did suppose that I had succeeded. I had long seen the growing popularity of this measure. I was no stranger to the arts and the industry by which the progress of that popularity had been stimulated and urged on from day to day. I well knew the power and the popularity of the Chief Magistrate. I had heard of his own personal exertions to promote this object. I saw that it was resolved upon as a party measure, and I saw the party which had resolved upon it rapidly and triumphantly succeeding throughout a large part of the Union. These things certainly are sufficient to have forewarned me, and I had hoped, and till this moment believed, that they had forearmed me also. But there was added to all these the still less equivocal evidence arising from the proceedings of several of the State Legislatures. Sir, when first I heard that a State Legislature had instructed her Senators on this floor to vote in favor of this thing, it struck me with inexpressible sorrow and dismay. But when I from time to time beheld various other State Legislatures, acting under the same dictation, or at least misled into the same mistake, sorrow assumed in my bosom the complexion of despair. But there was still one ingredient to be added to this cup, to render the odious draught more intolerably bitter. I could, I will confess it, with some comparative degree of philosophy, have seen certain States of this confederacy one after another giving away, and bringing their successive sacrifices to this altar of executive power. I could have borne to see this and that and the other State prostrating herself and aiding in the general conspiracy to prostrate the Senate. But when at length it came to pass that the ancient and powerful Commonwealth of Virginia was brought to bow her venerable locks before the footstool of power, forgot her past history, forgot who and what she is and what she has been, and associated herself in a combination like this, how shall I describe to you my feelings! As a politician, I might have been mortified at such a spectacle; as a statesman, belonging to the United States, I turned from it with shame; but as a native of Virginia, I deplore, I lament, from the bottom of my heart, that she too has joined the funeral procession of the constitution. Sir, I was proud to remember her in her proud day; to consider her as she once was, and perhaps still is—the mother of great men; to look back to that bright, that immortal period in our history when she recalled her children from these halls of national legislation into her own Legislature, there to vindicate the rights and independence of the State, and to reassert the violated constitution against the usurpations of this Government. Then, indeed, Virginia preserved that illustrious character which had ascended with her from the Revolution. Then she put herself on her State rights, and on the popular doctrines of her free Government; and all who witnessed the animating sight must have concluded that, throughout her existence, she would ever continue to vindicate and to perpetuate the doctrine and the spirit of liberty. Sir, I could have wished that the honorable gentleman who now represents that distinguished State could have found in his own mind reasons for taking a different course from that which he has pursued in this matter. With the powers which he unquestionably possesses, with his liberal education, and large experience, and especially with the good fortune of growing up amidst the very men who laid the foundations of our republic, I had hoped that he would have invoked the ancient spirit of his State, and would have added the suffrage of his voice to save the trembling constitution, about to be immolated at the footstool of executive power. But it was my lot to be disappointed; and I mourn, from the bottom of my heart, the instruction under which he feels himself constrained to vote for this extraordinary resolution. Where are the sedateness, the gravity, the calm and cautious wisdom of Madison? Where the philosophic spirit, the enlarged views, and popular predilections of Jefferson? Where the sturdy republicanism of John Taylor? Where those bright names which make her history? They are gone—gone—and others control her destiny. Sir, I lament, I mourn, that my native State should have lent herself and the remnant of her glory to promote and gloss over this proceeding. I take consolation, however, Mr. President, that there is one State, one free and fearless State, which has kept herself aloof from this combination; whose unbroken spirit, whose pride and honor, demand of me, her representative, to make, as I now do, on behalf of South Carolina, her public and solemn protest against this open and flagrant violation of the constitution.

Mr. RIVES followed, and addressed the Senate at great length in support of the resolution. This speech was never reported.

Mr. MOORE said that the appropriate suggestion with which the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. NILES) had closed his speech, brought to his mind a very important and useful amendment, the propriety of which he had no doubt would be evident and obvious to that Senator, and he would beg leave to recommend its adoption to the friends of this black line resolution, viz: that this record of the Senate's proceedings, made and preserved by the requirements of the constitution, shall be destroyed by fire to be extracted from heaven by means of a sun-glass. For this he believed they might plead something like a precedent from the General Assembly of Georgia. He thought this would complete the farce.

Mr. CALHOUN said: The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) says that the argument in favor of this expunging resolution has not been answered. Sir, there are some questions so plain that they cannot be argued. Nothing can make them more plain; and this is one. No one, not blinded by party zeal, can possibly be insensible that the measure proposed is a violation of the constitution. The constitution requires the Senate to keep a journal; this resolution goes to expunge the journal. If you may expunge a part, you may expunge the whole; and if it is expunged, how is it kept? The constitution says the journal shall be kept; this resolution says it shall be destroyed. It does the very thing which the constitution declares shall not be done. That is the argument, the whole argument. There is none other. Talk of precedents? and precedents drawn from a foreign country? They don't apply. No, sir. This is to be done, not in consequence of argument, but in spite of argument. I understand the case. I know perfectly well the gentlemen have no liberty to vote otherwise. They are coerced by an exterior power. They try, indeed, to comfort their conscience by saying that it is the will of the people, and the voice of the people. It is no such thing. We all know how these legislative returns have been obtained. It is by dictation from the White House. The President himself, with that vast mass of patronage which he wields, and the thousand expectations he is able to hold up, has obtained these votes of the State Legislatures; and this, forsooth, is said to be the voice of the people. The voice of the people! Sir, can we forget the scene which was exhibited in this chamber when that expunging resolution was first introduced here? Have we forgotten the universal giving way of conscience, so that the Senator from Missouri was left alone? I see before me Senators who could not swallow that resolution; and has its nature changed since then? Is it any more constitutional now than it was then? Not at all. But executive power has interposed. Talk to me of the voice of the people! No, sir. It is the combination of patronage and power to coerce this body into a gross and palpable violation of the constitution. Some individuals, I perceive, think to escape through the particular form in which this act is to be perpetrated. They tell us that the resolution on your records is not to be expunged, but is only to be endorsed "Expunged." Really, sir, I do not know how to argue against such contemptible sophistry. The occasion is too solemn for an argument of this sort. You are going to violate the constitution, and you get rid of the infamy by a falsehood. You yourselves say that the resolution is expunged by your order. Yet you say it is not expunged. You put your act in express words. You record it, and then turn round and deny it.

But what is the motive? What is the pretext for this enormity? Why, gentlemen tell us the Senate has two distinct consciences—a legislative conscience, and a judicial conscience. As a legislative body we have decided that the President has violated the constitution. But gentlemen tell us that this is an impeachable offence; and, as we may be called to try it in our judicial capacity, we have no right to express the opinion. I need not show how inconsistent such a position is with the eternal, inprescriptible right of freedom of speech, and how utterly inconsistent it is with precedents drawn from the history of our British ancestors, where the same liberty of speech has for centuries been enjoyed. There is a shorter and more direct argument in reply. Gentlemen who take that position cannot, according to their own showing, vote for this resolution; for if it is unconstitutional for us to record a resolution of condemnation, because we may afterwards be called to try the case in a judicial capacity, then it is equally unconstitutional for us to record a resolution of acquittal. If it is unconstitutional for the Senate to declare before a trial that the President has violated the constitution, it is equally unconstitutional to declare before a trial that he has not violated the constitution. The same principle is involved in both. Yet, in the very face of this principle, gentlemen are here going to condemn their own act.

But why do I waste my breath? I know it is all utterly vain. The day is gone; night approaches, and night is suitable to the dark deed we meditate. There is a sort of destiny in this thing. The act must be performed; and it is an act which will tell on the political history of this country forever. Other preceding violations of the constitution (and they have been many and great) filled my bosom with indignation, but this fills it only with grief. Others were done in the heat of party. Power was, as it were, compelled to support itself by seizing upon new instruments of influence and patronage; and there were ambitious and able men to direct the process. Such was the removal of the deposits, which the President seized upon by a new and unprecedented act of arbitrary power; an act which gave him ample means of rewarding friends and punishing enemies. Something may, perhaps, be pardoned to him in this matter, on the old apology of tyrants—the plea of necessity. But here there can be no such apology. Here no necessity can so much as be pretended. This act originates in pure, unmixed, personal idolatry. It is the melancholy evidence of a broken spirit, ready to bow at the feet of power. The former act was such a one as might have been perpetrated in the days of Pompey or Cæsar; but an act like this could never have been consummated by a Roman Senate until the times of Caligula and Nero.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether the question involved both the preamble and the resolution.

The CHAIR said it embraced the whole subject matter.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14.

The Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers and in limited quantities, as amended by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER said, the great principle contained in the bill now under consideration was to arrest monopolies of the public lands, and limit the sales to settlers or cultivators. The adoption of this measure would have a material influence upon the revenue of the Government and the prosperity of the country. Before investigating the details of the bill, it would be proper to examine the preliminary question, whether the great principle upon which the bill reposes is such as to recommend it to the favorable consideration of the American Senate.

So long as Congress offers for sale hundreds of millions of acres of land, with no limitation upon the extent of the purchase, vast quantities of these lands must pass into the hands of a few capitalists, thus authorized and invited by the Government to make the purchase; and when these capitalists confined their operations to the acquisition of lands unoccupied by any settler, it was clearly erroneous to denounce such speculations during the continuance of the existing system. It was the system that was wrong; and so long as it was continued, any denunciation of those who purchased large bodies of the unoccupied public lands was worse than ridiculous. Such purchases had been made, and would continue to be made, by many respectable citizens, in accordance with the invitation of the Government; and any denunciation of such purchases would only react upon the Congress which adopted the existing system, as well as every succeeding Congress which refuses its repeal or modification. But the question recurs, does this system best promote the prosperity of the American people? and shall we continue to invite and encourage the monopoly of the public lands by a few individuals, or so amend the existing system as to sell the public lands only in limited quantities, sufficient for farms or plantations, and thus reserve for these great and useful purposes this noble public domain? Whether these lands shall thus be reserved for sale only for settlement or cultivation, or whether they shall be permitted to pass into the hands of a few individuals, by townships, counties, and even entire States, in a single year, is the true question which we must determine.

The evils of the existing system were only fully developed during the past year and that which preceded it. By the returns from the Land Office, the sales, exclusive of those at Pontotoc, Mississippi, during the first three quarters of the past year, amounted to $20,063,430, and the number of acres sold to 15,934,430. Thus, upon the same ratio, the sales of the year 1836 amounted to twenty millions of acres, and upwards of twenty-five millions of dollars; and, including the sales at Pontotoc, to more than twenty-one millions of acres, and more than twenty-seven millions of dollars. In a single year, thus, a portion of the public domain has been sold, nearly equal in superficial extent to the great State of Ohio, and exceeding the superficies of five New England States, containing more than two millions of people. In this manner, entire States are swept in a single year into the hands of speculators, who may thus exercise a greater control over the destiny of these States, for half a century to come, than the national and State Legislatures combined. Can any system be devised more destructive of equal rights and republican principles? In vain shall we have struck down the feudal system, with its accompanying relation of lord and vassal, if we create and continue here this worse than feudal vassalage, this system of American landlords, engrossing millions of acres, and regulating the terms of sale or settlement. In vain shall we have abolished the system of primogeniture and entailments, as calculated to create landed monopolies, if we sustain the existing policy, by which a few capitalists may engross in a single year the ownership of States, and control the destiny of millions. An extent of territory equal to five States passing in a single year into the hands of speculators! must not this create here a landed aristocracy, without the title, but more wealthy and powerful than the sinking nobility of England? It will establish a fourth estate, more controlling than the legislative, executive, and judicial power. It will control agriculture and its products, by regulating the price of landed property. It will certainly introduce into the new States the system of landlord and tenant, by which the occupant will not be the owner of the soil he cultivates, but the tributary of some absentee landlord, who will, in the shape of an annual rent, reap nearly all the profits of the labor of the cultivator. It will establish a relation of abject dependence on the one hand, and tyrannical power on the other. It will impoverish the many, and enrich the few. It will create a war of capital against labor, of the producer against the non-producer, of the cultivator against the speculator; a war in which this Government will be arrayed on the side of the speculator, enlarging his dominion, increasing his power, until, in a few years more, he will acquire a complete monopoly, and maintain an undisputed empire, throughout the valley of the West.

There can be no greater injury to any country than the monopoly of its lands by a few individuals; thus keeping those lands out of the hands of settlers and cultivators, and condemning vast regions of fertile lands to remain for years waste and uncultivated. The West, for many years, has been endeavoring to obtain from Congress a reduction of the price of the public lands; but the continuation of the existing system is worse than a refusal to reduce the price; it is equivalent to a law raising the price to settlers and cultivators from one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to a price varying from five to thirty dollars per acre. It is well known that, within the last few years, vast bodies of public lands have been purchased by speculators at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and resold to settlers or cultivators at prices varying from five to thirty dollars per acre. And what must soon be the inevitable result of continuing the existing system? At the rate of twenty-one millions of acres per annum, speculators in a very few years must own nearly every acre of good land in the present new States and organized Territories of the Union. When this monopoly shall be complete, and no good land remains the property of the Government, will not a still higher price be demanded for those lands by those who hold them? If we abolish the system of sales to speculators, these millions of acres of good land, now owned by the Government, will pass, from time to time, at the minimum price, into the hands of settlers or cultivators, which otherwise would be purchased by speculators, and resold by them at from five to thirty dollars per acre. Every Senator who votes against this bill votes for continuing a system by which this vast enhancement to settlers and cultivators, of the price of the public lands, must soon take place. There can be no greater curse to any country, no more serious impediment to its prosperity, than the high price of its unoccupied lands. It prevents or postpones the settlement of those lands, and decreases the wealth, products, and population of a State. It is equivalent to a decree of man, condemning to remain waste and uncultivated vast regions created by nature inexhaustibly fertile, and inviting the hand of improvement. What Senator from any new State has not seen whole townships of land remaining in the hands of speculators, waste and unoccupied, where otherwise purchases by settlers or cultivators would have been made at the minimum price of the Government, and where would now be smiling farms and prosperous villages?

Such are the great principles of the bill, and the details are designed to promote the great object. Sales of the public lands at public auction, though not entirely abolished, are confined to those who purchase for settlement or cultivation. The speculator is excluded from the public sales, as he is from private entries. This is indispensable; for when the speculator is excluded only from private entries, but permitted to purchase at public auction, he would engross nearly all the lands offered at any future land sales. And what has the Government gained by the sales of its lands at public auction? Nothing deserving an estimate. Upon comparing the official records, the total number of acres sold, and the total price received, the following have been the results of the auction system: From the 1st of July, 1820, to the present period, we have received, from sales of the public lands, an average of three cents per acre over the minimum price; from 1796 to 1st July, 1820, nearly three cents per acre over the minimum price; from 1796 to the present period, three cents per acre over the minimum price; for the year 1835, one cent and a half per acre over the minimum price; for the year 1836, less than one cent per acre over the minimum price. Hence it is obvious that nothing is gained by the Government by continuing the auction system.

Mr. W. here proceeded to explain to the Senate the details of the bill; the clause confining the sales to settlers or cultivators; the limitation to two sections; the authority to parents to purchase for their children, with a view to the establishment of farms; the pre-emption section; the privilege of purchasing in forty-acre lots; and, finally, the taxing power conceded to the States, by which they might raise a revenue from unoccupied lands, whether held by their own or non-resident speculators, and thus, to a certain extent, repress speculation. And Mr. W. concluded by returning his thanks to the Senate for the very general and indulgent attention with which they had received his remarks.

MONDAY, January 16.

Expunging Resolution.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, which was Mr. BENTON's resolution to expunge from the journal of the Senate the resolution of the 28th March, 1834, censuring the President for having removed the deposits from the Bank of the United States.

Mr. CLAY rose and said that, considering that he was the mover of the resolution of March, 1834, and the consequent relation in which he stood to the majority of the Senate by whose vote it was adopted, he had felt it to be his duty to say something on this expunging resolution; and he had always intended to do so when he should be persuaded that there existed a settled purpose of pressing it to a final decision. But it had been so taken up and put down at the last session—taken up one day, when a speech was prepared for delivery, and put down when it was pronounced—that he had really doubted whether there existed any serious intentions of ever putting it to the vote. At the very close of the last session, it will be recollected that the resolution came up, and in several quarters of the Senate a disposition was manifested to come to a definitive decision. On that occasion he had offered to waive his right to address the Senate, and silently to vote upon the resolution; but it was again laid upon the table, and laid there forever, as the country supposed, and as he believed. It is, however, now revived; and, sundry changes having taken place in the members of this body, it would seem that the present design is to bring the resolution to an absolute conclusion.

I have not risen, (continued Mr. C.,) to repeat, at full length, the argument by which the friends of the resolution of March, 1834, sustained it. That argument is before the world, was unanswered at the time, and is unanswerable. And I here, in my place, in the presence of my country and of my God, after the fullest consideration and deliberation of which my mind is capable, reassert my solemn conviction of the truth of every proposition contained in that resolution. But, whilst it is not my intention to commit such an infliction upon the Senate as that would be of retracing the whole ground of argument formerly occupied, I desire to lay before it, at this time, a brief and true state of the case. Before the fatal step is taken of giving to the expunging resolution the sanction of the American Senate, I wish, by presenting a faithful outline of the real questions involved in the resolution of 1834, to make a last, even if it is to be an ineffectual, appeal to the sober judgments of Senators. I begin by reasserting the truth of that resolution.

Our British ancestors understood perfectly well the immense importance of the money power in a representative Government. It is the great lever by which the crown is touched, and made to conform its administration to the interests of the kingdom and the will of the people. Deprive Parliament of the power of freely granting or withholding supplies, and surrender to the King the purse of the nation, he instantly becomes an absolute monarch. Whatever may be the form of government, elective or hereditary, democratic or despotic, that person who commands the force of the nation, and at the same time has uncontrolled possession of the purse of the nation, has absolute power, whatever may be the official name by which he is called.

Our immediate ancestors, profiting by the lessons on civil liberty which had been taught in the country from which we sprung, endeavored to encircle around the public purse, in the hands of Congress, every possible security against the intrusion of the Executive. With this view, Congress alone is invested by the constitution, with the power to lay and collect the taxes. When collected, not a cent is to be drawn from the public Treasury but in virtue of an act of Congress. And among the first acts of this Government was the passage of a law establishing the Treasury Department, for the safe keeping and the legal and regular disbursement of the money so collected. By that act a Secretary of the Treasury is placed at the head of the Department; and, varying in this respect from all the other Departments, he is to report, not to the President, but directly to Congress, and is liable to be called to give information in person before Congress. It is impossible to examine dispassionately that act, without coming to the conclusion that he is emphatically the agent of Congress, in performing the duties assigned by the constitution to Congress. The act further provides that a Treasurer shall be appointed, to receive and keep the public money; and none can be drawn from his custody but under the authority of a law, and in virtue of a warrant drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register. Only when such a warrant is presented can the Treasurer lawfully pay one dollar from the public purse. Why was the concurrence of these four officers required in disbursements of the public money? Was it not for greater security? Was it not intended that each, exercising a separate and independent will, should be a check upon every other? Was it not the purpose of the law to consider each of these four officers, acting in his proper sphere, not as a mere automaton, but as an intellectual, intelligent, and responsible person, bound to observe the law, and to stop the warrant, or stop the money, if the authority of the law were wanting?

Thus stood the Treasury from 1789 to 1816. During that long time no President had ever attempted to interfere with the custody of the public purse. It remained where the law placed it, undisturbed, and every Chief Magistrate, including the Father of his Country, respected the law.

In 1816 an act passed to establish the late Bank of the United States for the term of twenty years, and, by the 16th section of the act, it is enacted "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Thus it is perfectly manifest, from the express words of the law, that the power to make any order or direction for the removal of the public deposits is confided to the Secretary alone, to the absolute exclusion of the President, and all the world besides. And the law, proceeding upon the established principle that the Secretary of the Treasury, in all that concerns the public purse, acts as the direct agent of Congress, requires, in the event of his ordering or directing a removal of the deposits, that he shall immediately lay his reasons therefor before whom? The President? No; before Congress.

So stood the public Treasury and the public deposits from the year 1816 to September, 1833. In all that period of seventeen years, running through or into four several administrations of the Government, the law had its uninterrupted operation, no Chief Magistrate having assumed upon himself the power of diverting the public purse from its lawful custody, or of substituting his will to that of the officer to whose care it was exclusively intrusted.

In the session of Congress of 1832-'3 an inquiry had been instituted by the House of Representatives into the condition of the Bank of the United States. It resulted in a conviction of its entire safety, and a declaration by the House, made only a short time before the adjournment of Congress, on the 4th of March, 1833, that the public deposits were perfectly secure. This declaration was probably made in consequence of suspicions then afloat of a design on the part of the Executive to remove the deposits. These suspicions were denied by the press friendly to the administration. Nevertheless, the members had scarcely reached their respective homes before measures were commenced by the Executive to effect a removal of the deposits from that very place of safety which it was among the last acts of the House to declare existed in the Bank of the United States. *

In prosecution of this design, Mr. McLane, the Secretary of the Treasury, who was decidedly opposed to such a measure, was promoted to the Department of State, and Mr. Duane was appointed to succeed him. But Mr. Duane was equally convinced with his predecessor that he was forbidden by every consideration of duty to execute the power with which the law had intrusted the Secretary of the Treasury, and refused to remove the deposits; whereupon he was dismissed from office, a new Secretary of the Treasury was appointed, and, in September, 1833, by the command of the President, the measure was finally accomplished. That it was the President's act was never denied, but proclaimed, boasted, defended. It fell upon the country like a thunderbolt, agitating the Union from one extremity to the other. The stoutest adherents of the administration were alarmed; and all thinking men, not blinded by party prejudice, beheld in the act a bold and dangerous exercise of power; and no human sagacity can now foresee the tremendous consequences which will ensue. The measure was adopted not long before the approaching session of Congress; and, as the concurrence of both branches might be necessary to compel a restoration of the deposits, the object was to take the chance of a possible division between them, and thereby defeat the restoration.

And where did the President find the power for this most extraordinary act? It has been seen that the constitution, jealous of all executive interference with the Treasury of the nation, has confided it to the exclusive care of Congress, by every precautionary guard, from the first imposition of the taxes to the final disbursement of the public money.

It has been seen that the language of the 16th section of the law of 1816 is express and free from all ambiguity, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is the sole and exclusive depository of the authority which it confers.

Those who maintain the power of the President have to support it against the positive language of the constitution, against the explicit words of the statute, and against the genius and theory of all our institutions.

And how do they surmount these insuperable obstacles? By a series of far-fetched implications, which, if every one of them were as true as they are believed to be incorrect or perverted, would stop far short of maintaining the power which was exercised.

The first of these implied powers is, that of dismissal, which is claimed for the President. Of all the questioned powers ever exercised by this Government, this is the most questionable. From the first Congress down to the present administration, it had never been examined. It was carried then, in the Senate, by the casting vote of the Vice President. And those who, at that day, argued in behalf of the power, contended for it upon conditions which have been utterly disregarded by the present Chief Magistrate. The power of dismissal is nowhere in the constitution granted, in express terms, to the President. It is not a necessary incident to any granted power; and the friends of the power have never been able to agree among themselves as to the precise part of the constitution from which it springs.

But if the power of dismissal was as incontestable as it is justly controvertible, we utterly deny the consequences deduced from it. The argument is, that the President has, by implication, the power of dismissal. From this first implication another is drawn; and that is, that the President has the power to control the officer, whom he may dismiss, in the discharge of his duties, in all cases whatever; and that this power of control is so comprehensive as to include even the case of a specific duty expressly assigned by law to the designated officer.

Now, we deny these results from the dismissing power. That power, if it exists, can draw after it only a right of general superintendence. It cannot authorize the President to substitute his will to the will of the officer charged with the performance of official duties. Above all, it cannot justify such a substitution in a case where the law, as in the present instance, assigns to a designated officer exclusively the performance of a particular duty, and commands him to report, not to the President, but to Congress, in a case regarding the public purse of the nation, committed to the exclusive control of Congress.

Such a consequence as that which I am contesting would concentrate in the hands of one man the entire executive power of the nation, uncontrolled and unchecked.

It would be utterly destructive of all official responsibility. Instead of each officer being responsible, in his own separate sphere, for his official acts, he would shelter himself behind the orders of the President. And what tribunal, in heaven above or on earth below, could render judgment against any officer for an act, however atrocious, performed by the express command of the President, which, according to the argument, he was absolutely bound to obey?

Whilst all official responsibility would be utterly annihilated in subordinate officers, there would be no practical or available responsibility in the President himself.

But the case has been supposed, of a necessity for the removal of the deposits, and a refusal of the Secretary of the Treasury to remove them; and it is triumphantly asked if, in such a case, the President may not remove him, and command the deed to be done. That is an extreme case, which may be met by another. Suppose the President, without any necessity, orders the removal from a place of safety to a place of hazard? If there be danger that a Secretary may neglect his duty, there is equal danger that a President may abuse his authority. Infallibility is not a human attribute. And there is more security for the public in holding the Secretary of the Treasury to the strict performance of an official duty, specially assigned to him, under all his official responsibility, than to allow the President to wrest the work from his hands, annihilate his responsibility, and stand himself practically irresponsible. It is far better that millions should be lost by the neglect of a Secretary of the Treasury, than to establish the monstrous principle that all the checks and balances of the Executive Government shall be broken down, the whole power absorbed by one man, and his will become the supreme rule. The argument which I am combating places the whole Treasury of the nation at the mercy of the Executive. It is in vain to talk of appropriations by law, and the formalities of warrants upon the Treasury. Assuming the argument to be correct, what is to prevent the execution of an order from the President to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a warrant, without the sanction of a previous legal appropriation, to the Comptroller to countersign it, to the Register to register it, and to the Treasurer to pay it? What becomes of that quadruple security which the precaution of the law provided? Instead of four substantive and independent wills, acting under legal obligations, all are merged in the executive vortex.

But there was, in point of fact, no cause, none whatever, for the measure. Every fiscal consideration (and no other had the Secretary or the President a right to entertain) required the deposits to be left undisturbed in the place of perfect safety where by law they were. We told you so at the time. We asserted that the charges of insecurity and insolvency of the bank were without the slightest foundation. And time, that great arbiter of human controversies, has confirmed all that we said. The bank, from documents submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present session, appears to be able not only to return every dollar of the stock held in its capital by the public, but an addition of eleven per cent. beyond it.

Those who defend the executive act have to maintain not only that the President may assume upon himself the discharge of a duty specially assigned to the Secretary of the Treasury; but that he may remove that officer, arbitrarily, and without any cause, because he refused to remove the public deposits without cause.

My mind conducts me to a totally different conclusion. I think, I solemnly believe, that the President "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," in the language of the resolution. I believed then in the truth of the resolution; and I now, in my place, and under all my responsibility, reavow my unshaken conviction of it. But it has been contended on this occasion, as it was in the debate which preceded the adoption of the resolution of 1834, that the Senate has no right to express the truth on any question which, by possibility, may become a subject of impeachment. It is manifest that if it may, there is no more usual or appropriate form in which it may be done than that of resolutions, joint or separate, orders, or bills. In no other mode can the collective sense of the body be expressed. But Senators maintain that no matter what may be the executive encroachment upon the joint powers of the two Houses, or the separate authority of the Senate, it is bound to stand mute, and not breathe one word of complaint or remonstrance. According to the argument, the greater the violation of the constitution or the law, the greater the incompetency of the Senate to express any opinion upon it! Further, that this incompetency is not confined to the acts of the President only, but extends to those of every officer who is liable to impeachment under the constitution. Is this possible? Can it be true? Contrary to all the laws of nature, is the Senate the only being which has no power of self-preservation—no right to complain or to remonstrate against attacks upon its very existence?

The argument is, that the Senate, being the constitutional tribunal to try all impeachments, is thereby precluded from the exercise of the right to express any opinion upon any official malfeasance, except when acting in its judicial character.

If this disqualification exist, it applies to all impeachable officers, and ought to have protected the late Postmaster General against the resolution, unanimously adopted by the Senate, declaring that he had borrowed money contrary to law. And it would disable the Senate from considering that Treasury order which has formed such a prominent subject of its deliberations during the present session.

And how do Senators maintain this obligation of the Senate to remain silent and behold itself stript, one by one, of all its constitutional powers, without resistance, and without murmur? Is it imposed by the language of the constitution? Has any part of that instrument been pointed to which expressly enjoins it? No, no, not a syllable. But it is attempted to be deduced by another far-fetched implication. Because the Senate is the body which is to try impeachments, therefore it is inferred the Senate can express no opinion on any matter which may form the subject of impeachment. The constitution does not say so. That is undeniable; but Senators think so.

The Senate acts in three characters—legislative, executive, and judicial—and their importance is in the order enumerated. By far the most important of the three is its legislative. In that, almost every day that it has been in session from 1789 to the present time, some legislative business has been transacted; whilst, in its judicial character, it has not sat more than three or four times in that whole period.

Expunging Resolution.

Why should the judicial function limit and restrain the legislative function of the Senate, more than the legislative should the judicial? If the degree of importance of the two should decide which ought to impose the restraint, in case of conflict between them, none can doubt which it should be.

But if the argument is sound, how is it possible for the Senate to perform its legislative duties? An act in violation of the constitution or laws is committed by the President, or a subordinate executive officer, and it becomes necessary to correct it by the passage of a law. The very act of the President in question was under a law to which the Senate had given its concurrence. According to the argument, the correcting law cannot originate in the Senate, because it would have to pass in judgment upon that act. Nay, more: it cannot originate in the House and be sent to the Senate, for the same reason of incompetency in the Senate to pass upon it. Suppose the bill contained a preamble reciting the unconstitutional or illegal act, to which the legislative corrective is applied: according to the argument, the Senate must not think of passing it. Pushed to its legitimate consequence, the argument requires the House of Representatives itself cautiously to abstain from the expression of any opinion upon an executive act, except when it is acting as the grand inquest of the nation, and considering articles of impeachment.

Assuming that the argument is well founded, the Senate is equally restrained from expressing any opinion which would imply the innocence or the guilt of an impeachable officer, unless it be maintained that it is lawful to express praise and approbation, but not censure or difference of opinion. Instances have occurred in our past history, (the case of the British minister, Jackson, was a memorable one,) and many others may arise in our future progress, when, in reference to foreign powers, it may be important for Congress to approve what has been done by the Executive, to present a firm and united front, and to pledge the country to stand by and support him. May it not do that? If the Senate dare not entertain and express any opinion upon an executive measure, how do those who support this expunging resolution justify the acquittal of the President which it proclaims?

No Senator believed, in 1834, that, whether the President merited impeachment or not, he ever would be impeached. In point of fact he has not been, and we have every reason to suppose that he never will be, impeached. Was the majority of the Senate, in a case where it believed the constitution and laws to have been violated, and the liberties of the people to be endangered, to remain silent, and to refrain from proclaiming the truth, because, against all human probability, the President might be impeached by a majority of his political friends in the House of Representatives?

If an impeachment had been actually voted by the House of Representatives, there is nothing in the constitution which enjoins silence on the part of the Senate. In such a case, it would have been a matter of propriety, for the consideration of each Senator, to avoid the expression of any opinion on a matter upon which, as a sworn judge, he would be called to act.

Hitherto, I have considered the question on the supposition that the resolution of March, 1834, implied such guilt in the President that he would have been liable to conviction on a trial by impeachment before the Senate of the United States. But the resolution, in fact, imported no such guilt. It simply affirmed that he had "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." It imputed no criminal motives. It did not profess to penetrate into the heart of the President. According to the phraseology of the resolution, the exceptionable act might have been performed with the purest and most patriotic intention. The resolution neither affirmed his innocence, nor pronounced his guilt. It amounts, then, says his friends on this floor, to nothing. Not so. If the constitution be trampled upon, and the laws be violated, the injury may be equally great, whether it has been done with good or bad intentions. There may be a difference to the officer, none to the country. The country, as all experience demonstrates, has most reason to apprehend those encroachments which take place on plausible pretexts, and with good intentions.

I put it, Mr. President, to the calm and deliberate consideration of the majority of the Senate, are you ready to pronounce, in the face of this enlightened community, for all time to come, and whoever may happen to be the President, that the Senate dare not, in language the most inoffensive and respectful, remonstrate against any executive usurpation, whatever may be its degree or danger?

For one, I will not, I cannot. I believe the resolution of March, 1834, to have been true; and that it was competent to the Senate to proclaim the truth. And I solemnly believe that the Senate would have been culpably neglectful of its duty to itself, to the constitution, and to the country, if it had not announced the truth.

But let me suppose that in all this I am mistaken; that the act of the President, to which exception was made, was in conformity with the spirit of our free institutions and the language of our constitution and laws; and that, whether it was or not, the Senate of 1834 had no authority to pass judgment upon it: what right has the Senate of 1837, a component part of another Congress, to pronounce judgment upon its predecessor? How can you, who venture to impute to those who have gone before you an unconstitutional proceeding, escape a similar imputation? What part of the constitution communicates to you any authority to arraign and try your predecessors? In what article is contained your power to expunge what they have done? And may not the precedent lead to a perpetual code of defacement and restoration of the transactions of the Senate, as consigned to the public records?

Are you not only destitute of all authority, but positively forbidden, to do what the expunging resolution proposes? The injunction of the constitution to keep a journal of our proceedings is clear, express, and emphatic. It is free from all ambiguity; no sophistry can pervert the explicit language of the instrument, no artful device can elude the force of the obligation which it imposes. If it were possible to make more manifest the duty which it requires to be performed, that was done by the able and eloquent speeches, at the last session, of the Senators from Virginia and Louisiana, (Messrs. LEIGH and PORTER,) and at this of my colleague. I shall not repeat the argument. But, I would ask, if there were no constitutional requirement to keep a journal, what constitutional right has the Senate of this Congress to pass in judgment upon the Senate of another Congress, and to expunge from its journal a deliberate act there recorded? Can an unconstitutional act of that Senate, supposing it to be so, justify you in performing another unconstitutional act?

But in lieu of any argument upon the point from me, I beg leave to cite for the consideration of the Senate two precedents: one drawn from the reign of the most despotic monarch in modern Europe, under the most despotic minister that ever bore sway over any people, and the other from the purest fountain of democracy in this country. I quote from the interesting life of the Cardinal Richelieu, written by that most admirable and popular author, Mr. James. The Duke of Orleans, the brother of Louis XIII., had been goaded into rebellion by the wary Richelieu. The king issued a decree declaring all the supporters of the duke guilty of high treason, and a copy of it was despatched to the Parliament of Paris, with an order to register it at once. The parliament demurred, and proceeded to what was called in arrêt de partage. "Richelieu, however, could bear no contradiction in the course which he had laid down for himself;" [How strong a resemblance does that feature of his character bear to one of an illustrious individual whom I will not further describe!] "and hurrying back to Paris with the King, he sent, in the monarch's name, a command for the members of the Parliament to present themselves at the Louvre, in a body and on foot. He was obeyed immediately; and the King receiving them with great haughtiness, the Keeper of the Seals made them a speech in which he declared that they had no authority to deliberate upon affairs of state; that the business of private individuals they might discuss, but that the will of the monarch in other matters they were alone called upon to register. The King then tore with his own hands the page of the register on which the arrêt de partage had been inscribed, and punished with suspension from their functions several of the members of the various courts composing the parliament of Paris." How repeated acts of the exercise of arbitrary power are likely to subdue the spirit of liberty, and to render callous the public sensibility and the fate which awaits us, if we had not been recently unhappily taught in this country, we may learn from the same author. "The finances of the State were exhausted, new impositions were devised, and a number of new offices created and sold. Against the last-named abuse the Parliament ventured to remonstrate; but the Government of the Cardinal had for its first principle despotism, and the refractory members were punished, some with exile, some with suspension of their functions. All were forced to comply with his will; and the Parliament, unable to resist, yielded, step by step, to his exactions."

The other precedent is supplied by the archives of the democracy of Pennsylvania in 1816, when it was genuine and unmixed with any other ingredient.

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of Pennsylvania, in regard to the obligation to keep a journal, are substantially the same. That of the United States requires that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, except such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal." And that of Pennsylvania is, "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them weekly, except such parts as require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journals." Whatever inviolability, therefore, is attached to a journal, kept in conformity with the one constitution, must be equally stamped on that kept under the other. On the 10th February, 1816, in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, "the Speaker informed the House that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journal, he was desirous of having the opinion of the House on that decision, viz: that a majority can expunge from the journal any proceedings in which the yeas and nays have not been called." Whereupon Mr. Holgate and Mr. Smith appealed from said decision; and on the question, Is the Speaker right in his decision? the members present voted as follows: yeas three, nays seventy-eight. Among the latter are to be found the two Senators now representing in this body the State of Pennsylvania. On the same day a motion was made by one of them (Mr. BUCHANAN) and Mr. Kelly, and read, as follows: "Resolved, That in the opinion of this House no part of the journals of the House can be expunged, even by unanimous consent."

Expunging Resolution.

The Senate observes that the question arose in a case where the yeas and nays had not been called. Even in such a case there were but four members out of eighty-two that thought it was competent to the House to expunge. Had the yeas and nays been called and recorded, as they were on the resolution of March, 1834, there would not have been a solitary vote in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania in support of the power of expunging. And if you can expunge the resolution, why may you not expunge also the recorded yeas and nays attached to it?

But if the matter of expunction be contrary to the truth of the case, reproachful for its base subserviency, derogatory from the just and necessary powers of the Senate, and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, the manner in which it is proposed to accomplish this dark deed is also highly exceptionable. The expunging resolution, which is to blot out or enshroud the four or five lines in which the resolution of 1834 stands recorded, or rather the recitals by which it is preceded, are spun out into a thread of enormous length. It runs, whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, &c., into a formidable array of nine several whereases. One who should have the courage to begin to read them, unaware of what was to be their determination, would think that at the end of such a tremendous display he must find the very devil. It is like a kite or a comet, except that the order of nature is inverted, and the tail, instead of being behind, is before the body to which it is appended.

I shall not trespass on the Senate by inquiring into the truth of all the assertions of fact and of principle contained in these recitals. It would not be difficult to expose them all, and to show that not one of them has more than a colorable foundation. It is asserted by one of them that the President was put upon his trial, and condemned, unheard, by the Senate, in 1834. Was that true? Was it a trial? Can the majority now assert, upon their oaths, and in their consciences, that there was any trial or condemnation? During the warmth of debate, Senators might endeavor to persuade themselves and the public that the proceeding of 1834 was, in its effects and consequences, a trial, and would be a condemnation of the President; but now, after the lapse of near three years, when the excitement arising from an animated discussion has passed away, it is marvellous that any one should be prepared to assert that an expression of the opinion of the Senate upon the character of an executive act was an arraignment, trial, and conviction, of the President of the United States!

Another fact, asserted in one of these recitals, is, that the resolution of 1834, in either of the forms in which it was originally presented or subsequently modified, prior to the final shape which it assumed when adopted, would have been rejected by a majority of the Senate. What evidence is there in support of this assertion? None. It is, I verily believe, directly contrary to the fact. In either of the modifications of the resolution I have not a doubt that it would have passed! They were all made in that spirit of accommodation by which the mover of the resolution has ever regulated his conduct as a member of a deliberative body. In not one single instance did he understand from any Senator at whose request he made the modification that without it he would vote against the resolution. How, then, can even the Senators who were of the minority of 1834 undertake to make the assertion in question? How can the new Senators, who have come here since, pledge themselves to the fact asserted in the recital of which they could not have had any consance? But all the members of the majority—the veterans and the raw recruits—the six years' men and the six weeks' men—are required to concur in this most unfounded assertion, as I believe it to be. I submit it to one of the latter (looking towards Mr. DANA, from Maine, here by a temporary appointment from the Executive) whether, instead of inundating the Senate with a torrent of fulsome and revolting adulation poured on the President, it would not be wiser and more patriotic to illustrate the brief period of his senatorial existence by some great measure fraught with general benefit to the whole Union? Or, if he will not or cannot elevate himself to a view of the interests of the entire country, whether he had not better dedicate his time to an investigation into the causes of an alien jurisdiction being still exercised over a large part of the territory of the State which he represents? And why the American carrying trade to the British colonies, in which his State was so deeply interested, has been lost by a most improvident and bungling arrangement?

Mr. President, what patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? What new honor or fresh laurels will it win for our common country? Is the power of the Senate so vast that it ought be circumscribed, and that of the President so restricted that it ought to be extended? What power has the Senate? None, separately. It can only act jointly with the other House, or jointly with the Executive. And although the theory of the constitution supposes, when consulted by him, it may freely give an affirmative or negative response, according to the practice, as it now exists, it has lost the faculty of pronouncing the negative monosyllable. When the Senate expresses its deliberate judgment, in the form of resolution, that resolution has no compulsory force, but appeals only to the dispassionate intelligence, the calm reason, and the sober judgment, of the community. The Senate has no army, no navy, no patronage, no lucrative offices, nor glittering honors, to bestow. Around us there is no swarm of greedy expectants, rendering us homage, anticipating our wishes, and ready to execute our commands.

How is it with the President? Is he powerless? He is felt from one extremity to the other of this vast republic. By means of principles which he has introduced, and innovations which he has made in our institutions, alas! but too much countenanced by Congress and a confiding people, he exercises uncontrolled the power of the State. In one hand he holds the purse, and in the other brandishes the sword of the country. Myriads of dependants and partisans, scattered over the land, are ever ready to sing hosannas to him, and to laud to the skies whatever he does. He has swept over the Government, during the last eight years, like a tropical tornado. Every department exhibits traces of the ravages of the storm. Take as one example the Bank of the United States. No institution could have been more popular with the people, with Congress, and with State Legislatures. None ever better fulfilled the great purposes of its establishment. But it unfortunately incurred the displeasure of the President; he spoke, and the bank lies prostrate. And those who were loudest in its praise are now loudest in its condemnation. What object of his ambition is unsatisfied? When disabled from age any longer to hold the sceptre of power, he designates his successor, and transmits it to his favorite! What more does he want? Must we blot, deface, and mutilate the records of the country, to punish the presumptuousness of expressing an opinion contrary to his own?

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Can you make that not to be which has been? Can you eradicate from memory and from history the fact that in March, 1834, a majority of the Senate of the United States passed the resolution which excites your enmity? Is it your vain and wicked object to arrogate to yourselves that power of annihilating the past which has been denied to Omnipotence itself? Do you intend to thrust your hands into our hearts, and to pluck out the deeply rooted convictions which are there? Or is it your design merely to stigmatize us? You cannot stigmatize us.

Ne'er yet did base dishonor blur our name.

Standing securely upon our conscious rectitude, and bearing aloft the shield of the constitution of our country, your puny efforts are impotent; and we defy all your power. Put the majority of 1834 in one scale, and that by which this expunging resolution is to be carried in the other, and let truth and justice, in heaven above and on earth below, and liberty and patriotism, decide the preponderance.

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Is it to appease the wrath and to heal the wounded pride of the Chief Magistrate? If he be really the hero that his friends represent him, he must despise all mean condescension, all grovelling sycophancy, all self-degradation and self-abasement. He would reject, with scorn and contempt, as unworthy of his fame, your black scratches and your baby lines in the fair records of his country. Black lines! Black lines! Sir, I hope the Secretary of the Senate will preserve the pen with which he may inscribe them, and present it to that Senator of the majority whom he may select, as a proud trophy, to be transmitted to his descendants. And hereafter, when we shall lose the forms of our free institutions, all that now remain to us, some future American monarch, in gratitude to those by whose means he has been enabled, upon the ruins of civil liberty, to erect a throne, and to commemorate especially this expunging resolution, may institute a new order of knighthood, and confer on it the appropriate name of the Knight of the Black Lines.

But why should I detain the Senate, or needlessly waste my breath in fruitless exertions. The decree has gone forth. It is one of urgency, too. The deed is to be done—that foul deed which, like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out. Proceed, then, to the noble work which lies before you, and, like other skilful executioners, do it quickly. And when you have perpetrated it, go home to the people, and tell them what glorious honors you have achieved for our common country. Tell them that you have extinguished one of the brightest and purest lights that ever burnt at the altar of civil liberty. Tell them that you have silenced one of the noblest batteries that ever thundered in defence of the constitution, and bravely spiked the cannon. Tell them that, henceforward, no matter what daring or outrageous act any President may perform, you have forever hermetically sealed the mouth of the Senate. Tell them that he may fearlessly assume what powers he pleases, snatch from its lawful custody the public purse, command a military detachment to enter the halls of the Capitol, overawe Congress, trample down the constitution, and raze every bulwark of freedom; but that the Senate must stand mute, in silent submission, and not dare to raise its opposing voice. That it must wait until a House of Representatives, humbled and subdued like itself, and a majority of it composed of the partisans of the President, shall prefer articles of impeachment. Tell them, finally, that you have restored the glorious doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. And, if the people do not pour out their indignation and imprecations, I have yet to learn the character of American freemen.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. President: after the able and eloquent display of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) who has just resumed his seat, after having so long enchained the attention of his audience, it might be the dictate of prudence for me to remain silent. But I feel too deeply my responsibility as an American Senator, not to make the attempt to place before the Senate and the country the reasons which, in my opinion, will justify the vote which I intend to give this day.

Expunging Resolution.

A more grave and solemn question has rarely, if ever, been submitted to the Senate of the United States, than the one now under discussion. This Senate is now called upon to review its own decision, to rejudge its own justice, and to annihilate its own sentence, deliberately pronounced against the co-ordinate executive branch of this Government. On the 28th of March, 1834, the American Senate, in the face of the American people, in the face of the whole world, by a solemn resolution, pronounced the President of the United States to be a violator of the constitution of his country—of that constitution which he had solemnly sworn to “preserve, protect, and defend.” Whether we consider the exalted character of the tribunal which pronounced this condemnation, or the illustrious object against which it was directed, we ought to feel deeply impressed with the high and lasting importance of the present proceeding. It is in fact, if not in form, the trial of the Senate for having unjustly and unconstitutionally tried and condemned the President; and their accusers are the American people. In this cause I am one of the judges. In some respects, it is a painful position for me to occupy. It is vain, however, to express unavailing regrets. I must, and shall, firmly and sternly, do my duty, although in the performance of it I may wound the feelings of gentlemen whom I respect and esteem. I shall proceed no further than the occasion demands, and will, therefore, justify.

Who was the President of the United States against whom this sentence has been pronounced? Andrew Jackson—a name which every American mother, after the party strife which agitates us for the present moment shall have passed away, will, during all the generations which this republic is destined to endure, teach her infant to lisped with that of the venerated name of Washington. The one was the founder, the other the preserver, of the liberties of his country.

If President Jackson has been guilty of violating the Constitution of the United States, let impartial justice take its course. I admit that it is no justification for such a crime that his long life has been more distinguished by acts of disinterested patriotism than that of any American citizen now living. It is no justification that the honesty of his heart and the purity of his intentions have become proverbial, even amongst his political enemies. It is no justification that in the hour of danger; and in the day of battle, he has been his country's shield. If he has been guilty, let his name be “damned to everlasting fame,” with those of Cæsar and of Napoleon.

If, on the other hand, he is pure and immaculate from the charge, let us be swift to do him justice, and to blot out the foul stigma which the Senate have placed upon his character. If we are not, he may go down to the grave in doubt as to what may be the final judgment of his country. In any event, he must soon retire to the shades of private life. Shall we, then, suffer his official term to expire without first doing him justice? It may be said of me, as it has already been said of other Senators, that I am one of the gross adulators of the President. But, sir, I have never said thus much of him whilst he was in the meridian of his power. Now that his political sun is nearly set, I feel myself at liberty to pour forth my grateful feelings, as an American citizen, to a man who has done so much for his country. I have never, for myself, either directly or indirectly, solicited office at his hands; and my character must greatly change, if I should ever do so from any of his successors. If I should bestow upon him the meed of my poor praise, it springs from an impulse far different from that which has been attributed to the majority on this floor. I speak as an independent freeman and American Senator; and I feel proud now to have the opportunity of raising my voice in his defence.

On the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate of the United States resolved “that the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.”

In discussing this subject, I shall undertake to prove, first, that this resolution is unjust; secondly, that it is unconstitutional; and in the last place, that it ought to be expunged from our journals, in the manner proposed by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.)

First, then, it is unjust. On this branch of the subject, I had intended to confine myself to a bare expression of my own decided opinion. This point has been so often and so ably discussed, that it is impossible for me to cast any new light upon it. But as it is my intention to follow the footsteps of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) wherever they may lead, I must again tread the ground which has been so often trodden. As the Senator, however, has confined himself to a mere passing reference to the topics which this head presents, I shall, in this particular, follow his example.

Although the resolution condemning the President is vague and general in its terms, yet we all know that it was founded upon his removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. The Senator from Kentucky has contended that this act was a violation of law. And why? Because, says he, it is well known that the public money was secure in that institution; and by its charter the public deposits could not be removed from it, unless under a just apprehension that they were in danger. Now, sir, I admit that if the President had no right to remove these deposits, except for the sole reason that their safety was in danger, the Senator has established his position. But what is the fact? Was the Government thus restricted by the terms of the bank charter? I answer, no. Such a limitation is nowhere to be found in it. Let me read the sixteenth section, which is the only one relating to the subject. It enacts, "that the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Is not the authority thus conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury as broad and as ample as the English language will admit? Where is the limitation, where the restriction? One might have supposed, from the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, that the charter had restricted the Secretary of the Treasury from removing the deposits, unless he believed them to be insecure in the Bank of the United States; but the language of the law itself completely refutes his argument. They were to remain in the Bank of the United States, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct."

The sole limitation upon the discretion of that officer was his immediate and direct responsibility to Congress. To us he was bound to render his reasons for removing the deposits. We, and we alone, are constituted the judges as to the sufficiency of these reasons.

It would be an easy task to prove that the authors of the bank charter acted wisely in not limiting the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury over the deposits to the single case of their apprehended insecurity. We may imagine many other reasons which would have rendered their removal both wise and expedient. But I forbear, especially as the case now before the Senate presents as striking an illustration of this proposition as I could possibly imagine. Upon what principle, then, do I justify the removal of the deposits?

The Bank of the United States had determined to apply for a recharter at the session of Congress immediately preceding the last presidential election. Preparatory to this application, and whilst it was pending, in the short space of sixteen months, it had increased its loans more than $28,000,000. They rose from forty-two millions to seventy millions between the last of December, 1830, and the 1st of May, 1832. Whilst this boasted regulator of the currency was thus expanding its discounts, all the local banks followed the example. The impulse of self-interest urged them to pursue this course. A delusive prosperity was thus spread over the land. Money, everywhere, became plenty. The bank was regarded as the beneficent parent, who was pouring her money out into the laps of her children. She thought herself wise and provident in thus rendering herself popular. The recharter passed both Houses of Congress by triumphant majorities. But then came "the frost, the killing frost." It was not so easy to propitiate "the Old Roman." Although he well knew the power and influence which the bank could exert against him at the then approaching presidential election, he cast such considerations to the winds. He vetoed the bill, and, in the most solemn manner, placed himself for trial upon this question before the American people.

From that moment the faith of many of his former friends began to grow cold. The bank openly took the field against his re-election. It expended large sums in subsidizing editors, and in circulating pamphlets, and papers, and speeches, throughout the Union, calculated to inflame the public mind against the President. I merely glance at these things.

Let us pause, for a single moment, to consider the consequences of such conduct. What right had the bank, as a corporation, to enter the arena of politics, for the purpose of defending itself, and attacking the President. Whilst I freely admit that each individual stockholder possessed the same rights, in this respect, as every other American citizen, I pray you to consider what a dangerous precedent the bank has thus established. Our banks now number nearly a thousand, and our other chartered institutions are almost innumerable. If all these corporations are to be justified in using their corporate funds for the purpose of influencing elections, of elevating their political friends, and crushing their political foes, our condition is truly deplorable. We shall thus introduce into the State a new, a dangerous, and an alarming power, the effects of which no man can anticipate. Watchful jealousy is the price which a free people must ever pay for their liberties; and this jealousy should be argus-eyed in watching the political movements of corporations.

After the bank had been defeated in the presidential election, it adopted a new course of policy. What it had been unable to accomplish by making money plenty, it determined it would wrest from the sufferings of the people by making money scarce. Pressure and panic then became its weapons; and with these it was determined, if possible, to extort a recharter from the American people. It commenced this warfare upon the interests of the country about the 1st of August, 1833. In two short months it decreased its loans more than four millions of dollars, whilst the deposits of the Government with it had increased, during the same period, two millions and a quarter. I speak in round numbers. It was then in the act of reducing its discounts at the rate of two millions of dollars per month.

The State banks had expanded their loans with the former expansion of the Bank of the United States. It now became necessary to contract them. The severest pressure began to be felt everywhere. Had the Bank of the United States been permitted a short time longer to proceed in this course, fortified as it was with the millions of the Government which it held on deposit, a scene of almost universal bankruptcy and insolvency must have been presented in our commercial cities. It thus became absolutely necessary for the President either to deprive the bank of the public deposits, as the only means of protecting the State banks, and, through them, the people, from these impending evils, or calmly to look on and see it spreading ruin throughout the land. It was necessary for him to adopt this policy for the purpose of preventing a universal derangement of the currency, a general sacrifice of property, and, as an inevitable consequence, the recharter of this institution.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

By the removal of the deposits, he struck a blow against the bank from which it has never since recovered. This was the club of Hercules with which he slew the Hydra. This was the master-stroke by which he prostrated what a large majority of the American people believe to have been a corrupt and a corrupting institution. For this he is not only justified, but deserves the eternal gratitude of his country. For this the Senate have condemned him; but the people of the United States have hailed him as a deliverer.

It has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, that the President, by removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States, united in his own person the power of the purse of the nation with that of the sword. I think it is not difficult to answer this argument. What was to become of the public money, in case it had been removed from the Bank of the United States, under its charter, for the cause which the Senator himself deems justifiable? Why, sir, it would then have been immediately remitted to the guardianship of those laws under which it had been protected before the Bank of the United States was called into existence. Such was the present case. In regard to this point, no matter whether the cause of removal were sufficient or not, the moment the deposits were actually removed, they became subject to the pre-existing laws, and not to the arbitrary will of the President.

The Senator from Kentucky has contended that the President violated the constitution and the laws by dismissing Mr. Duane from office because he would not remove the deposits, and by appointing Mr. Taney to accomplish this purpose. I shall not discuss at any length the power of removal. It is now too late in the day to question it. That the Executive possesses this power was decided by the first Congress. It has often since been discussed and decided in the same manner, and it has been exercised by every President of the United States. The President is bound by the constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." If he cannot remove his executive officers, it is impossible that he can perform this duty. Every inferior officer might set up for himself; might violate the laws of the country, and put him at defiance, whilst he would remain perfectly powerless. He could not arrest their career. A foreign minister might be betraying and disgracing the nation abroad, without any power to recall him until the next meeting of the Senate. This construction of the constitution involves so many dangers, and so many absurdities, that it could not be maintained for a moment, even if there had not been a constant practice against it of almost half a century.

But it is contended by the Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury is a sort of independent power in the State, and is released from the control of the Executive. And why? Simply because he is directed by law to make his annual report to Congress, and not to the President. If this position be correct, then it necessarily follows that the Executive is released from the obligation of taking care that the numerous and important acts of Congress regulating the fiscal concerns of the country shall be faithfully executed. The Secretary of the Treasury is thus made independent of his control. What would be the position of this officer under such a construction of the constitution and laws, it would be very difficult to decide. And this wonderful transformation of his character has arisen from the mere circumstance that Congress have by law directed him to make an annual report to them! No, sir; the Executive is responsible to Congress for the faithful execution of the laws; and if the present or any other President should prove faithless to his high trust, the present Senate, notwithstanding all which has been said, would be as ready as their predecessors to inflict condign punishment upon him, in the mode pointed out by the constitution.

I have now arrived at the great question of the constitutional power of the Senate to adopt the resolution of March, 1834. It is my firm conviction that the Senate possesses no such power; and it is now my purpose to establish this position. The decision on this point must depend upon a true answer to the question, does this resolution contain any impeachable charge against the President? If it does, I trust I shall demonstrate that the Senate violated its constitutional duty in proceeding to condemn him in this manner. I shall again read the resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

This language is brief and comprehensive. It comes at once to the point. It bears a striking impress of the character of the Senator from Kentucky. Does it charge an impeachable offence against the President?

The fourth section of the second article of the constitution declares that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

It has been contended that this condemnatory resolution contains no impeachable offence, because it charges no criminal intention against the President; and I admit that it does not attribute to him any corrupt motive in express words. Is this sufficient to convince the judgment of any impartial man that none such was intended? Let us, for a few moments, examine this proposition. If it be well founded, the Senate may forever hereafter usurp the power of trying, condemning, and destroying, any officer of the Government, without affording him the slightest opportunity of being heard in his defence. They may thus abuse their power, and prostrate any object of their vengeance. It seems we have now made the discovery that the Senate are authorized to exert this tremendous power; that they may thus assume to themselves the office both of accusers and of judge, provided the indictment contains no express allegation of a criminal intention. The President, or any officer of the Government, may be denounced by the Senate as a violator of the constitution of his country, as derelict in the performance of his public duties, provided there be no express imputation of an improper motive. The characters of men whose reputation is dearer to them than their lives may thus be destroyed. They may be held up to public execration by the omission of a few formal words. The condemnation of the Senate carries with it such a moral power, that perhaps there is no man in the United States, except Andrew Jackson, who could have resisted its force. No, sir; such an argument can never command conviction. That which we have no power to do directly, we can never accomplish by indirect means. We cannot by resolution convict a man of an impeachable offence, merely because we may omit the formal words of an impeachment. We must regard the substance of things, and not the mere form.

But again: Although a criminal intention be not charged in so many words, by this resolution, yet its language, even without the attendant circumstances, clearly conveys this meaning. The President is charged with having "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." "Assumed upon himself!" What is the plain, palpable meaning of this phrase, connected with what precedes and follows? Is it not "to arrogate," "to claim or seize unjustly?" These are two of the first meanings of the word assume, according to the lexicographers. To assume upon one's self, is a mode of expression which is rarely taken in a good sense. As it is used here, I ask if any man of plain, common understanding, after reading this resolution, would ever arrive at the conclusion that any Senator voted for it under the impression that the President was innocent of any improper intention, and that he violated the constitution from mere mistake, and from pure motives? The common sense of mankind revolts at the idea. How can it be contended, for a single moment, that you can denounce the President as a man who had "assumed upon himself" the power of violating the laws and the constitution of his country, and in the same breath declare that you had not the least intention to criminate him, and that your language was altogether inoffensive? The two propositions are manifestly inconsistent.

But I go one step further. If we were sitting as a court of impeachment, and the bare proposition were established to our satisfaction, that the President had, in violation of the constitution and laws, withdrawn the public revenue of the country from the depository to whose charge Congress had committed it, and assumed the control over it himself, we would be bound to convict him of a high official misdemeanor. Under such circumstances, we should be bound to infer a criminal intention from this illegal and unconstitutional act. Criminal justice could never be administered, society could not exist, if the tribunals of the country should not attribute evil motives to illegal and unconstitutional conduct. Omniscience alone can examine the heart. When poor, frail man is placed in the judgment seat, he must infer the intentions of the accused from his actions. That "the tree is known by its fruits," is an axiom which we have derived from the fountain of all truth. Does a poor, naked, hungry wretch, at this inclement season of the year, take from my pocket a single dollar, the law infers a criminal intent, and he must be convicted and punished as a thief, though he may have been actuated by no other motive than that of saving his wife and children from starvation. And shall a different rule be applied to the President of the United States? Shall it be said of a man elevated to the highest station on earth, for his wisdom, his integrity, and his virtues, with all his constitutional advisers around him, when he violates the constitution of his country, and usurps the control over its entire revenue, that he may successfully defend himself by declaring that he had done this deed without any criminal intention? No, sir; in such a case, above all others, the criminal intention must be inferred from the unconstitutional exercise of high and dangerous powers. The safety of the republic demands that the President of the United States should never shield himself behind such flimsy pretexts. This resolution, therefore, although it may not have assumed the form of an article of impeachment, possesses all the substance.

It was my fate some years ago to have assisted as a manager, in behalf of the House of Representatives, in the trial of an impeachment before this body. It then became my duty to examine all the precedents in such cases which had occurred under our Government since the adoption of the federal constitution. On that occasion I found one which has a strong bearing upon this question. I refer to the case of Judge Pickering. He was tried and condemned by the Senate upon all the four articles exhibited against him, although the three first contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law, in a cause involving a mere question of property, and then refusing to grant the party injured an appeal from his decision, to which he was entitled. From the clear violation of the law, in this case, the Senate must have inferred an impure and improper motive.

Expunging Resolution.

If any thing further were wanting to prove that the resolution of the Senate contained a criminal and impeachable charge against the President, it might be demonstrated from all the circumstances attending the transaction. Whilst this resolution was in progress through the Senate, the Bank of the United States was employed in producing panic and pressure throughout the land. Much actual suffering was experienced by the people; and where that did not exist, they dreaded unknown and awful calamities. Confidence between man and man was at an end. There was a fearful pause in the business of the country. We were then engaged in the most violent party conflict recorded in our annals. To use the language of the Senator from Kentucky, we were in the midst of a revolution. On the one side it was contended that the power over the purse of the nation had been usurped by the President; that in his own person he had united this power with that of the sword, and that the liberties of the people were gone, unless he could be arrested in his mad career. On the other hand, the friends of the President maintained that the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States was an act of stern justice to the people; that it was strictly legal and constitutional; that he was impelled to it by the highest and purest principles of patriotism; and that it was the only means of prostrating an institution which threatened the destruction of our dearest rights and liberties. During this terrific conflict, public indignation was aroused to such a degree, that the President received a great number of anonymous letters, threatening him with assassination, unless he should restore the deposits.

It was during the pendency of this conflict throughout the country, that the Senator from Kentucky thought proper, on the 26th of December, 1833, to present his condemnatory resolution to the Senate. And here, sir, permit me to say, that I do not believe there was any corrupt connection between any Senator upon this floor and the Bank of the United States. But it was at this inauspicious moment that the resolution was introduced. How was it supported by the Senator from Kentucky? He told us that a revolution had already commenced. He told us that by the 3d of March, 1837, if the progress of innovation should continue, there would be scarcely a vestige remaining of the Government and policy, as they had existed prior to the 3d of March, 1829. That in a term of years, a little more than that which was required to establish our liberties, the Government would be transformed into an elective monarchy—the worst of all forms of government. He compared the measure adopted by General Jackson with the conduct of the usurping Cæsar, who, after he had overrun Italy in sixty days, and conquered the liberties of his native country, terrified the tribune Metellus, who guarded the Treasury of the Roman people, and seized it by open force. He declared that the President had perpetrated an open, palpable, and daring usurpation. He concluded by asserting that the premonitory symptoms of despotism were upon us; and if Congress did not apply an instantaneous and effective remedy, the fatal collapse would soon come on, and we should die—ignobly die—base, mean, and abject slaves, the scorn and contempt of mankind, unpitied, unwept, and unmourned. What a spectacle was then presented in this chamber! We are told, in the reports of the day, that, when he took his seat, there was repeated and loud applause in the galleries. This, it will be remembered, was the introductory speech of the Senator. In my opinion, it was one of the ablest and most eloquent of all his able and eloquent speeches. He was then riding upon the whirlwind and directing the storm. At the time I read it, for I was not then in the Senate, it reminded me of the able, the vindictive, and the eloquent appeal of Mr. Burke before the House of Lords, on the impeachment of Warren Hastings, in which he denounced that Governor General as the ravager and oppressor of India, and the scourge of the millions who had been placed under his authority.

And yet, we are now told that this resolution did not intend to impute any criminal motive to the President; that he was a good old man, though not a good constitutional lawyer; and that he knew better how to wield the sword than to construe the constitution.

[Mr. CLAY here rose to explain. He said, "I never have said, and never will say, that personally I acquitted the President of any improper intention. I lament that I cannot say it. But what I did say was, that the act of the Senate of 1834 is free from the imputation of any criminal motives."]

Sir, said Mr. B., this avowal is in character with the frank and manly nature of the Senator from Kentucky. It is no more than what I expected from him. The imputation of any improper motive to the President has been again and again disclaimed by other Senators upon this floor. The Senator from Kentucky has now boldly come out in his true colors, and avows the principles which he held at the time. He acknowledges that he did not acquit the President from improper intentions, when charging him with a violation of the constitution of his country.

This trial of the President before the Senate continued for three months. During this whole period, instead of the evidence which a judicial tribunal ought to receive, exciting memorials, signed by vast numbers of the people, and well calculated to inflame the passions of his judges, were poured in upon the Senate. He was denounced upon this floor by every odious epithet which belongs to tyrants. Finally, the obnoxious resolution was adopted by the vote of the Senate, on the 28th day of March, 1834.

After the exposition which I have made, can any impartial mind doubt but that this resolution intended to charge against the President a wilful and daring violation of the constitution and the laws? I think not.

The Senator from Kentucky has argued, with his usual power, that the functions of the Senate, acting in a legislative capacity, are not to be restricted, because it is possible that the same question, in another form, may come before us judicially. I concur in the truth and justice of this position. We must perform our legislative duties; and if, in the investigation of facts, having legislation distinctly in view, we should incidentally be led to the investigation of criminal charges, it is a necessity imposed upon us by our condition, from which we cannot escape. It results from the varying nature of our duties, and not from our own will. I admit that it would be difficult to mark the precise line which separates our legislative from our judicial functions. I shall not attempt it. In many cases, from necessity, they are in some degree intermingled. The present resolution, however, stands far in advance of this line. It is placed in bold relief, and is clear of all such difficulties. It is a mere naked resolution of censure. It refers solely to the past conduct of the President, and condemns it in the strongest terms, without even proposing any act of legislation by which the evil may be remedied hereafter. It was judgment upon the past alone; not prevention for the future. Nay, more: the resolution is so vague and general in its terms, that it is impossible to ascertain from its face the cause of the President's condemnation. The Senate have resolved that the Executive "has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." What is the specification under this charge? Why, that he has acted thus, "in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue." What executive proceedings? The resolution leaves us entirely in the dark upon this subject. How could any legislation spring from such a resolution? It is impossible. None such was ever attempted.

If the resolution had preserved its original phraseology; if it had condemned the President for dismissing one Secretary of the Treasury because he would not remove the deposits, and for appointing his successor to effect this purpose, the Senator might then have contended that the evil was distinctly pointed out; and, although no legislation was proposed, the remedy might be applied hereafter. But he has deprived himself even of this feeble argument. He has left us upon an ocean of uncertainty, without chart or compass. "The late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue" is a phrase of the most general and indefinite character. Every Senator who voted in favor of this resolution may have acted upon different principles. To procure its passage, nothing more was necessary than that a majority should unite in the conclusion that the President had violated the constitution and the laws in some one or other of his numerous acts in relation to the public revenue. The views of Senators constituting the majority may have varied from each other to any conceivable extent; and yet they may have united in the final vote. That this was the fact to a considerable extent, I have always understood. It is utterly impossible either that such a proceeding could ever have been intended to become the basis of legislation, or that legislative action could have ever sprung from such a source.

I flatter myself, then, I have succeeded in proving that this resolution charged the President with a high official misdemeanor, wholly disconnected from legislation, which, if true, ought to have subjected him to impeachment.

This brings me directly to the question, had the Senate any power, under the constitution, to adopt such a resolution? In other words, can the Senate condemn a public officer by a simple resolution, for an offence which would subject him to an impeachment? To state the proposition, is to answer this question in the negative. Dreadful would be the consequences, if we possess and should exercise such a power.

This body is invested with high and responsible powers, of a legislative, and executive, and a judicial character. No person can enter it until he has attained a mature age. Our term of service is longer than that of any other elective functionary. If Senators will have it so, it is the most aristocratic branch of our Government. For what purpose did the framers of the constitution confer upon it these varied and important powers, and this long tenure of office? The answer is plain. It was placed in this secure and elevated position that it might be above the storms of faction which so often inflame the passions of men. It never was intended to be an arena for political gladiators. Until the second session of the third Congress, the Senate always sat with closed doors, except in the single instance when the eligibility of Mr. Gallatin to a seat in the body was the subject under discussion. Of this particular practice, however, I cannot approve. I merely state it to show the intention of those who formed the constitution. I was informed by one of the most eminent statesmen and

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Senators which this country has ever produced, now no more, (the late Mr. King) that for some years after the Federal Government commenced its operation, the debates of the Senate resembled conversations rather than speeches, and that it originated but few legislative measures. Senators were then critics rather than authors in legislation. Whether its gain in eloquence, since it has become a popular assembly, and since the sound of thundering applause has been heard in our galleries at the denunciation of the President, has been an equivalent for its loss in true dignity, may well be doubted. To give this body its just influence with the people, it ought to preserve itself as free as possible from angry political discussions. In the performance of our executive duties—in the ratification of treaties and in the confirmation of nominations—the constitution has connected us with the Executive. The efficient and successful administration of the Government, therefore, requires that we should move on together in as much harmony as may be consistent with the independent exercise of our respective functions.

But, above all, we should be the most cautious in guarding our judicial character from suspicion. We constitute the high court of impeachment of this nation, before which every officer of the Government may be arraigned. To this tribunal is committed the character of men, whose character is far dearer to them than their lives. We should be the rock, standing in the midst of the ocean, for the purpose of affording a shelter to the faithful officer from unjust persecution, against which the billows might dash themselves in vain. Whilst we are a terror to evil-doers, we should be a praise to those who do well. We should never voluntarily perform any act which might prejudice our judgment, or render us suspected as a judicial tribunal. More especially, when the President of the United States is arraigned at the bar of public opinion, for offences which might subject him to an impeachment, we should remain, not only chaste, but unsuspected. Better, infinitely better, would it be for us not to manifest our feeling, even in a case in which we were morally certain the House of Representatives would not prefer before us articles of impeachment, than to reach the object of our disapprobation by a usurpation of their rights. It is true that, when the Senate passed the resolution condemning the President, a majority in the House were of a different opinion. But the next elections might have changed that majority into a minority. The House might then have voted articles of impeachment against the President. Under such circumstances, I pray you to consider in what a condition the Senate would have been placed. They had already prejudged the case. They had already convicted the President, and denounced him to the world as a violator of the constitution. In criminal prosecutions, even against the greatest malefactor, if a juror has prejudged the cause, he cannot enter the jury-box. The Senate had rendered itself wholly incompetent, in this case, to perform its highest judicial functions. The trial of the President, had articles of impeachment been preferred against him, would have been but a solemn mockery of justice.

The Constitution of the United States has carefully provided against such an enormous evil, by declaring that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." Until the accused is brought before us by the House, it is a manifest violation of our solemn duty to condemn him by a resolution.

If a court of criminal jurisdiction, without any indictment having been found by a grand jury, without having given the defendant notice to appear, without having afforded him an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses against him, and making his defence, should resolve that he was guilty of a high crime, and place this conviction upon their records, all mankind would exclaim against the injustice and unconstitutionality of the act. Wherein consists the difference between this case and the condemnation of the President? In nothing, except that such a conviction by the Senate, on account of its exalted character, would fall with tenfold force upon its object. I have often been astonished, notwithstanding the extended and well-deserved popularity of General Jackson, that the moral influence of this condemnation by the Senate had not crushed him. With what tremendous effect might this assumed power of the Senate be used to blast the reputation of any man who might fall under its displeasure. The precedent is extremely dangerous, and the American people have wisely determined to blot it out forever.

It is painful to reflect what might have been the condition of the country, if, at the inauspicious moment of the passage of the resolution against the President, its interests and its honor had rendered it necessary to engage in a foreign war. The fearful consequences of such a condition, at such a moment, must strike every mind. Would the Senate then have confided to the President the necessary power to defend the country? Where could the sinews of war have been found? In what condition was this body at that moment to act upon an important treaty negotiated by the President, or upon any of his nominations? But I forbear to enlarge upon this topic.

I have now arrived at the last point in this discussion. Do the Senate possess the power, under the constitution, of expunging the resolution of March, 1834, from their journals, in the manner proposed by the Senator from Missouri? (Mr. BENTON.) I cheerfully admit that we must show that this is not contrary to the constitution; for we can never redress one violation of that instrument by committing another. Before I proceed to this branch of the subject, I shall put myself right by a brief historical reminiscence. I entered the Senate in December, 1834, fresh from the ranks of the people, without the slightest feeling of hostility against any Senator on this floor. I then thought that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri was too severe in proposing to expunge. Although I was anxious to record, in strong terms, my entire disapprobation of the resolution of March, 1834, yet I was willing to accomplish this object without doing more violence to the feelings of my associates on this floor than was absolutely necessary to justify the President. Actuated by these friendly motives, I exerted all my little influence with the Senator from Missouri, to induce him to abandon the word expunge, and substitute some others in its place. I knew that this word was exceedingly obnoxious to the Senators who had voted for the former resolution. Other friends of his also exerted their influence; and at length his kindly feeling prevailed, and he consented to abandon that word, although it was peculiarly dear to him. I speak from my own knowledge. "All which I saw, and part of which I was."

The resolution of the Senator from Missouri came before the Senate on the 3d of March, 1835. Under it the resolution of March, 1834, was "ordered to be expunged from the journal," for reasons appearing on its face, which I need not enumerate. The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) moved to amend the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, by striking out the order to expunge with the reasons for it, and inserting in their stead the words "rescinded, reversed, repealed, and declared to be null and void." Some difference of opinion then arose among the friends of the administration as to the words which should be substituted in place of the order to expunge. For the purpose of leaving this question perfectly open, you, sir, (Mr. KING, of Alabama, was in the chair,) then moved to amend the original motion of Mr. BENTON, by striking out the words "ordered to be expunged from the journal of the Senate." This motion prevailed, on the ayes and noes, by a vote 39 to 7; and amongst the ayes the name of the Senator from Missouri is recorded. The resolution was thus left a blank, in its most essential feature, ready to be filled up as the Senate might direct. The era of good feeling in regard to this subject had commenced. It was nipped in the bud, however, by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) Whilst the resolution was still in blank, he rose in his place, and proclaimed the triumph of the constitution by the vote to strike out the word expunge, and then moved to lay the resolution on the table, declaring that he would neither withdraw his motion for friend nor foe. This motion precluded all amendment and all debate. It prevailed by a party vote; and thus we were left with our resolution a blank. Such was the manner in which the Senators in opposition received our advances of courtesy and kindness, in the moment of their strength and our weakness. Had the Senator from Massachusetts suffered us to proceed but for five minutes, we should have filled up the blank in the resolution. It would then have assumed a distinct form, and they would never afterwards have heard of the word expunge. We should have been content with the words "rescinded, reversed, repealed, and declared to be null and void." But the conduct of the Senator from Massachusetts on that occasion, and that of the party with which he acted, roused the indignation of every friend of the administration on this floor. We then determined that the word expunge should never again be surrendered.

The Senator from Kentucky has introduced a precedent from the proceedings of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of proving that we have no right to adopt this resolution. To this I can have no possible objection. But I can tell the Senator, if I were convinced that I had voted wrong when comparatively a boy, more than twenty years ago, the fear of being termed inconsistent would not now deter me from voting right upon the same question. I do not, however, repent of my vote upon that occasion. I would now vote in the same manner, under similar circumstances. I should not vote to expunge, under any circumstances, any proceeding from the journals, by obliterating the record. If I do not prove, before I take my seat, that the case in the Legislature of Pennsylvania was essentially different from that now before the Senate, I shall agree to be proclaimed inconsistent and time-serving.

It was my settled conviction, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, that the Senate had no power to obliterate their journal. This was shaken, but not removed, by the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. PORTER,) who confessedly made the ablest speech on the other side of the question. The constitution declares that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy." What was the position which that Senator then attempted to maintain? In order to prove that we had no power to obliterate or destroy our journals, he thought it necessary to contend that the word "keep," as used in the constitution, means both to record and to preserve. This appeared to me to be a mere begging of the question.

I shall attempt no definition of the word "keep." At least since the days of Plato, we know that definitions have been dangerous. Yet I think that the meaning of this word, as applied to the subject-matter, is so plain, that he who runs may read. If I direct my agent to keep a journal of his proceedings, and publish the same, my palpable meaning is, that he shall write these proceedings down from day to day, and publish what he has written, for general information. After he has obeyed my commands, after he has kept his journal, and published it to the world, he has executed the essential part of the trust confided to him. What may become of this original manuscript journal afterwards, is a matter of total indifference. So in regard to the manuscript journals of either House of Congress; after more than a thousand copies have been printed and published, and distributed over the Union, it is matter of not the least importance what disposition may be made of them. They have answered their purpose, and, in any practical view, become useless. If they were burnt, or otherwise destroyed, it would not be an event of the slightest public consequence. Such indifference has prevailed upon this subject, that these journals have been considered, in the House of Representatives, as so much waste paper, and, during a period of thirty-four years after the organization of the Government, they were actually destroyed. From this circumstance, no public or private inconvenience has been or ever can be sustained; because our printed journals are received in evidence in all courts of justice, in the same manner as if the originals were produced.

The Senator from Louisiana has discovered that to "keep" means both "to record" and "to preserve." But can you give this, or any other word in the English language, two distinct and independent meanings at the same time, as applied to the same subject? I think not. From the imperfection of human language, from the impossibility of having appropriate words to express every idea, the same word, as applied to different subjects, has a variety of significations. As applied to any one subject, it cannot, at the same time, convey two distinct meanings. In the constitution it must mean either "to write down," or "to preserve." It cannot have both significations. Let Senators, then, take their choice. If it signifies "to write down," as it unquestionably does, what becomes of the constitutional injunction to preserve? The truth is, that the constitution has not provided what shall be done with the manuscript journal, after it has served the purposes for which it was called into existence. When it has been published to the people of the United States, for whose use it was ordered to be kept, after it has thus been perpetuated, and they have been furnished with the means of judging of the public conduct of their public servants, it ceases to be an object of the least importance. Whether it be thrown into the garret of the Capitol, with other useless lumber, or be destroyed, is a matter of no public interest. It has probably never once been referred to in the history of our Government. If it should ever be determined to be a violation of the constitution to obliterate or destroy this manuscript journal, it must be upon different principles from those which have been urged in this debate. My own impression is, that, as the framers of the constitution have directed us to keep a journal, a constructive duty may be implied from this command, which would forbid us to obliterate or destroy it. Under this impression, I should vote, as I did twenty years ago, in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, against any proposition actually to expunge any part of the journal. But, waiving this unprofitable discussion, let us proceed to the real point in controversy.

Is any such proceeding as that of actually expunging the journal proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Missouri? I answer, no such thing. If the constitution had, in express terms, directed us to record and to preserve a journal of our proceedings, there is nothing in the resolution now before us, which would be inconsistent with such a provision.

Is the drawing of a black line around the resolution of the Senate of March, 1834, to obliterate or to deface it? On the contrary, is it not to render it more conspicuous—to place it in bold relief—to give it a prominence in the public view beyond any other proceeding of this body in past, and, I trust, in all future time? If the argument of Senators were, not that we have no power to obliterate, but that the Senate possessed no power to render one portion of the journal more conspicuous than another, it would have had much greater force.

Why, sir, by means of this very proceeding, that portion of our journal upon which it operates will be rescued from a slumber which would otherwise have been eternal, and facsimiles of the original resolution, without a word or a letter defaced, will be circulated over the whole Union.

But, sir, this resolution also directs that across the face of the condemnatory resolution there shall be written by the Secretary, "Expunged by order of the Senate, this—day of—, in the year of our Lord 1837."

Will this obliterate any part of the original resolution? If it does, the duty of the Secretary will be performed in a very bungling manner. No such thing is intended. It would be easy to remove every scruple from every mind upon this subject, by amending the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, so as to direct the Secretary to perform his duty in such a manner as not to obliterate any part of the condemnatory resolution. Such a direction, however, appears to me to be wholly unnecessary. The nature of the whole proceeding is very plain. We now adopt a resolution expressing our strong reprobation of the original resolution; and for this purpose we use the word "expunged," as the strongest term which we can apply. We then direct our Secretary to draw black lines around it, and place such a reference to our proceedings of this day upon its face, that in all time to come, whoever may inspect this portion of our journal, will be pointed at once to the record of its condemnation. What lawyer has not observed upon the margin of the judgment docket, if the original judgment has been removed to a superior court, and there reversed, a minute of such reversal? In our editions of the statutes, have we not all noted the repeal of any of them which may have taken place at a subsequent period? Who ever heard in the one case or in the other, that this was obliterating or destroying the record or the book? So, in this case, we make a mere reference to our future proceeding upon the face of the resolution, instead of the margin. Suppose we should only repeal the obnoxious resolution, and direct such a reference to be made upon its face: would any Senator contend that this would be an obliteration of the journal?

But it has been contended that the word expunge is not the appropriate word; and we have wrested it from its true signification, in applying it to the present case. Even if this allegation were correct, the answer would be at hand. You might then convict us of bad taste, but not of a violation of the constitution. On the face of the resolution we have stated distinctly what we mean. We have directed the Secretary in what manner he shall understand it, and we have excluded the idea that it is our intention to obliterate or to destroy the journal.

But I shall contend that the word expunge is the appropriate word, and that there is not another in the English language so precisely adapted to convey our meaning. I shall show from the highest literary and parliamentary authorities, that this word has acquired a signification entirely distinct from that of actual obliteration. Let me proceed immediately to this task. After citing my authorities, I shall proceed with the argument. First, then, for those of a literary character. I read from Crabbe's Synonymes, page 140; and every Senator will admit that this is a work of established reputation. In speaking of the use of the word "expunge," the author says: "When the contents of a book are in part rejected, they are aptly described as being expunged; in this manner the free-thinking sects expunge every thing from the Bible which does not suit their purpose, or they expunge from their creed what does not humor their passions." The idea that an actual obliteration was intended in these cases would be manifestly absurd. In the same page there is a quotation from Mr. Burke, to illustrate the meaning of this word. "I believe," says he, "that any person who was of age to take a part in public concerns forty years ago (if the intermediate space were expunged from his memory) could hardly credit his senses when he should hear that an army of two hundred thousand men was kept up in this island." I shall now cite Mr. Jefferson as a literary authority. He has often been referred to on this floor as a standard in politics. For this high authority, I am indebted to my friend from Louisiana, (Mr. NICOLAS.) In the original draught of the declaration of independence he uses the word "expunge" in the following manner: "Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of Government." Although the word "alter" was afterwards substituted for expunge, I presume upon the ground that this was too strong a term, yet the change does not detract from the literary authority of the precedent.—Jefferson's Correspondence, &c. 1st vol., page 17.

I presume that I have shown that the word "expunge" has acquired a distinct metaphorical meaning in our literature, which excludes the idea of actual obliteration. If I should proceed one step further, and prove that, in legislative proceedings, it has acquired the very same signification, I shall then have fully established my position. For this purpose I cite, first, "the Secret Proceedings and Debates of the Federal Convention." In page 118 we find the following entries: "On motion to expunge the clause of the qualification as to age, it was carried—ten States against one." Again: "On the clause respecting the ineligibility to any other office, it was moved that the words 'by any particular State' be expunged—four States for, five against, and two divided." So, page 119: "The last blank was filled up with one year, and carried—eight ayes, two noes, one divided."

"Mr. Pinckney moved to expunge the clause—agreed to, nem. con." Again: "Mr. Butler moved to expunge the clause of the stipends—lost; seven against, three for, one divided." Again, in page 157: "Mr. Pinckney moved that that part of the clause which disqualifies a person from holding an office in the State be expunged, because the first and best characters in a State may thereby be deprived of a seat in the national council."

"Question put to strike out the words moved for, and carried—eight ayes, three noes."

It will thus be perceived that in the proceedings of the very convention which formed the constitution under which we are now governed, the word "expunge" was often used in its figurative sense. It will certainly not be asserted, or even intimated, by any Senator here, that when these motions to expunge prevailed, the words of the original draught of the constitution were actually obliterated or defaced. The meaning is palpable. These provisions were merely rejected; not actually blotted out. But I shall now produce a precedent precisely in point. It presents itself in the proceedings of the Senate of Massachusetts, and refers to the famous resolution of that body adopted on the 15th day of June, 1813, in relation to the capture of the British vessel Peacock; denouncing the late war, and declaring that it was not becoming in a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits which were not immediately connected with the defence of our seacoast. Some ten years afterwards, a succeeding Senate of Massachusetts adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the aforesaid resolve of the fifteenth day of June, A. D. 1813, and the preamble thereof, &c, and the same are hereby, expunged from the journals of the Senate."

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

It is self-evident that, in this case, not the least intention existed of defacing the old manuscript journal. The word "expunge" was used in its figurative signification, just as it is in the case before us, to express the strongest reprobation of the former proceeding. That proceeding was to be expunged solely by force of the subsequent resolution, and not by any actual obliteration. There never was any actual obliteration of the journal.

Judging, then, from the highest English authorities, from the works of celebrated authors and statesmen, and from the proceedings of legislative bodies, is it not evident that the word "expunge" has acquired a distinct meaning, altogether inconsistent with any actual obliteration?

All that we have heard about defacing and destroying the journal are mere phantoms, which have been conjured up to terrify the timid. We intend no such thing. We only mean, most strongly, to express our conviction that the condemnatory resolution ought never to have found a place on the journal. If more authorities were wanted, I might refer to the Legislature of Virginia. The present expunging resolution is in exact conformity with their instructions to their Senators. As a matter of taste, I cannot say that I much admire their plan, though I entertain no doubt that it is perfectly constitutional. That State is highly literary; and I think I have established that their Legislature, when they used the word "expunge," without intending thereby to effect an actual obliteration of the journal, justly appreciated the meaning of the language which they employed.

The word "expunge" is, in my opinion, the only one which we could have used, clearly and forcibly to accomplish our purpose. Even if it had not been sanctioned by practice as a parliamentary word, we ought ourselves to have first established the precedent. It suits the case precisely. If you rescind, reverse, or repeal, a resolution, you thereby admit that it once had some constitutional or legal authority. If you declare it to have been null and void from the beginning, this is but the expression of your own opinion that such was the fact. This word "expunge" acts upon the resolution itself. It at once goes to its origin, and destroys its legal existence, as if it had never been. It does not merely kill, but it annihilates.

Parliamentary practice has changed the meaning of several other words from their primitive signification, in a similar manner with that of the word "expunge." The original signification of the word "rescind" is "to cut off." Usage has made it mean, in reference to a law or resolution, to abrogate or repeal it. We every day hear motions "to strike out." What is the literal meaning of this expression? The question may be best answered by asking another. If I were to request you to strike out a line from your letter, and you were willing to comply with my request, what would be your conduct? You would run your pen through it immediately. You would literally strike it out. Yet, what use do we make of this phrase every day in our legislative proceedings? If I make a motion to strike out a section from a bill, and it prevails, the Secretary encloses the printed copy of it in black lines, and makes a note on the margin that it has been stricken out. The original he never touches. Why, then, should not the word "expunge," without obliterating the proceeding to which it is directed, signify to destroy, as if it never had existed?

After all that has been said, I think I need scarcely again recur to the Pennsylvania precedent. It is evident, from the whole of that proceeding, that an actual expunging of the journal was intended, if it had not already been executed. I have no recollection whatever of the circumstances, but I am under a perfect conviction, from the face of the journal, that such was the nature of the case. I should vote now as I did then, after a period of more than twenty years. Both my vote, and the motion which I subsequently made upon that occasion, evidently proceeded upon this principle. The question arose in this manner, as it appears from the journal: On the 10th of February, 1816, "The Speaker informed the House that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journal, he was desirous of having the opinion of the House on that decision," viz: "that a majority can expunge from the journal proceedings in which the yeas and nays have not been called." Now, as no trace whatever appears upon the journal of the preceding day of the motion to which the Speaker refers, it is highly probable, nay, it is almost certain, that the proceedings had been actually expunged before he asked the advice of the House.

No man feels with more sensibility the necessity which compels him to perform an unkind act towards his brother Senators than myself; but we have now arrived at that point when imperious duty demands that we should either adopt this expunging resolution or abandon it forever. Already much precious time has been employed in its discussion. The moment has arrived when we must act. Senators in the opposition console themselves with the belief that posterity will do them justice, should it be denied to them by the present generation. They place their own names in the one scale, and ours in the other, and flatter themselves with the hope that, before that tribunal, at least, their weight will preponderate. For my own part, I am willing to abide the issue. I am willing to be judged for the vote which I shall give to-day, not only by the present, but by future generations, should my obscure name ever be mentioned in after times. After the passions and prejudices of the present moment shall have subsided, and the impartial historian shall record the proceeding of this day, he will say that the distinguished men who passed the resolution condemning the President were urged on to the act by a desire to occupy the high places in the Government; that an ambition, noble in itself, but not wisely regulated, had obscured their judgment, and impelled them to the adoption of a measure unjust, illegal, and unconstitutional; that, in order to vindicate both the constitution and the President, we were justified in passing this expunging resolution, and thus stamping the former proceeding with our strongest disapprobation.

I rejoice in the belief that this promises to be one of the last highly exciting questions of the present day. During the period of General Jackson's civil administration, what has he not done for the American people? During this period, he has had more difficult and dangerous questions to settle, both at home and abroad—questions which aroused more intensely the passions of men—than any of his predecessors. They are now all happily ended, except the one which we shall this day bring to a close—

“And all the clouds that lowered upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.”

The country now enjoys abundant prosperity at home, whilst it is respected and admired by foreign nations. Although the waves may yet be in some agitation from the effect of the storms through which we have passed, yet I think I can perceive the rainbow of peace extending itself across the firmament of heaven.

Should the next administration pursue the same course of policy with the present; should it dispense equal justice to all portions and to all interests of the Union, without sacrificing any; should it be conducted with prudence and with firmness, and I doubt not but that this will be the case, we shall hereafter enjoy comparative peace and quiet in our day. This will be the precious fruit of the energy, the toils, and the wisdom of the pilot who has conducted us in safety through the storms of his tempestuous administration.

I am now prepared for the question. I shall vote for this resolution, but not cheerfully. I regret the necessity which exists for passing it; but I believe that imperious duty demands its adoption. If I know my own heart, I can truly say that I am not actuated by any desire to obtain a miserable, petty, personal triumph, either for myself, or for the President of the United States, over my associates upon this floor.

I am now ready to record my vote, and thus, in the opprobrious language of Senators in the opposition, to become one of the executioners of the condemnatory resolution.

When Mr. BUCHANAN had taken his seat,

Mr. BAYARD rose and said that, notwithstanding he had not before had an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the subject now under discussion, yet he should have been unwilling at this late hour to have trespassed on the time and attention of the Senate, had he not felt it to be a duty which he owed to himself and to his immediate constituents to contend and protest against a measure which he believed to be a violation of the constitution. I say, sir, constituents, for, in my theory of this Government, we are all the representatives of the people, though chosen after a different manner. Every infraction of the constitution, however unimportant it may appear in its immediate consequences, tends to diminish the general confidence in the stability of our Government, and the general attachment to it; and as the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent are devotedly attached to that instrument, and feel that their political existence is incorporated with it, that in it they live, and move, and have their being as a political community, I say, sir, it is a duty which I owe to them to contend to the uttermost of my ability against whatever thus incidentally affects them. It is a duty, too, which I owe to myself, as I have a personal interest in whatever affects the character and honor of this body, of which I am a humble member.

What is it, sir, we are called upon to do? A man may do wrong unwittingly, and we must take care to have a clear and precise idea of the act to be done. In words, sir, we are called upon to expunge from the journal a certain resolution, but in fact and in truth, to falsify a record. The same mind which might contemplate the one proposition with indifference, would regard the other with horror. To a mind reckless of consequences, which has no future, which looks only to the present, and views every act as an insulated event, having no relation to what has preceded, and no influence on what is to follow, to expunge from a journal may seem a very harmless act. But, sir, even such a mind might be brought to revolt with disgust from the same measure, when it imported the suppression of the truth, or the assertion of a falsehood. The approaches of crime are stealthy and mysterious; the assassin wears his mask; vice pays to virtue the homage of assuming her form; the knave puts on the cloak of religion; the demagogue becomes the friend of the people. It becomes, then, my purpose to show that to expunge from the journal is to falsify a record.

Let me now draw the attention of the Senate to the terms of the resolution. It professes to set forth the act to be done, and the reasons for doing it. And first, sir, as to the act itself. It is described in these terms:

“Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the journal, and for that purpose that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session of 1833-'4 into the Senate, and in the presence of the Senate draw black lines around the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: Expunged by order of the Senate, this _____ day of _____, in the year of our Lord 1836.”

Nothing can be more explicit in its terms. The act to be done is to expunge. The first member of the sentence conveys the whole idea; and if the resolution had stopped there, with the simple assertion that an expunction should take place, there cannot be a doubt that the Secretary would have been authorized to blot out or erase from the journal the objectionable passage. The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) has gone into a critical examination of the meaning of the term expunge, and has given us various instances of its use in a metaphorical sense, and concludes that, because the word may be used metaphorically, it is in this instance a harmless metaphor. In all its uses, whether literal or metaphorical, it imports destruction; and the beauty and force of the metaphor in every instance depends on the precise meaning of its literal acceptance. The term expunge means literally to wipe out, which imports destruction; or, in other words, it imports that something which has an existence shall cease to exist. Whether the term is at any time used literally or metaphorically, will depend on the subject matter to which it is applied. Thus, in some of the instances given by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as in the one "to expunge our sins," no doubt the word is used metaphorically; but does not the whole force and value of the expression depend on its literal meaning, and import that those sins shall cease to have a moral existence as reasons for the Divine vengeance? And when used as applicable to a section of a bill, which is another instance given by the Senator, does it not mean that such section shall cease to have existence? The Senator asks whether, if a resolution passed that a section of a bill should be expunged, the Secretary would proceed to obliterate it? I answer, that from the method of our proceedings it is not necessary for him to erase every word, because the purpose is effectually answered by drawing his black lines across it, or simply writing upon its face the word "expunged," for in effect it becomes so, by ceasing to have any legal existence; and if such bill were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, the section thus expunged would be omitted in the engrossment, as if it had never existed. But the authority conferred upon him by such a resolution is literally to erase every word of the section. Such, also, is the case when the word is used in relation to a part of the journal, and becomes his duty to blot out or obliterate from its face the passage ordered to be expunged. But it is said that the present resolution does not contemplate an actual expunction or obliteration of the passage, but merely a typical one. And Senators seek to reconcile themselves to this measure by such a play upon words. A typical expunction! To get rid of the sophistry at once, let me ask whether a journal is not the evidence of a fact, as, for instance, the passage of a particular resolution, and whether to expunge from the journal that resolution is not to destroy the evidence of the fact that such a resolution had been adopted? If, then, you have the right to expunge, and do actually declare that a passage shall be expunged, does it not for all legal purposes suppress the evidence of the fact, no matter what the manner of expunction may be, whether by erasing, by blotting out, or by writing the word "expunged" over its face? Could the Secretary certify, after the adoption of the expunging resolution, that such a passage existed on the journal? If he were called upon to publish a new edition of the journal, would he have a right to insert the passage expunged? It is in vain that the assertion is made that the printed volumes would be evidence of the fact. The printed volumes are only prima facie evidence, and admitted for convenience, but could never stand against a sworn copy of the journal. There is, then, for all the purposes for which a journal is kept, namely, as evidence of a particular transaction, no difference between an actual and a typical expunction. That in the present instance no grave and immediate consequences affecting individual rights is to follow, does not alter the case. The principle asserted in the resolution is, that the right to expunge exists, the mode of doing it is of no consequence; and I will show presently that the exercise of such a power is not only unconstitutional, but may be attended with the most important and direct influence on the personal rights of individuals. The natural import and the necessary legal effect of the phrase "expunge from the journal," is to destroy the evidence of the fact expunged, whether it be used literally or metaphorically.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Having thus ascertained the meaning of the word "expunge" and the effect of any mode of expunction, the question arises whether the Senate possesses any such power over its journal. Has it the right to destroy the evidence of any particular transaction, for the journal is not only the highest evidence, but the only evidence, of the fact? A journal is a daily record, as contradistinguished from a temporary memorandum. But it is contended that, though a record, it is not a permanent one, being of value only until it is published; after which, it becomes mere waste paper. Is this proposition true? For if it be, then, so far as this particular case is concerned, there is an end of the question. The language of the constitution is, "that each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same." Resort has been had to the meaning of the word "keep," as importing preservation, to show that the constitution contemplated a permanent, and not a temporary, record. But I admit that the word "keep" does not necessarily imply permanent preservation; it may mean preservation for a temporary purpose. The word "keep," like every other word in the language, must depend for its meaning on the manner in which it is used, on the subject matter to which it is applied. Words are but signs of ideas; and it is one of the imperfections of language, that it often expresses too much or too little, while felicity in its use consists in the choice of those terms which convey either the simple or complex idea with precision. A word, too, may stand for a whole sentence, for a class of ideas, as in the familiar use of this very one. Thus, to keep a horse may not merely mean that he is fed, and curried, and stabled, but that he is rode; as, where the conversation being about the personal habit of any one in relation to exercise, it should be remarked of him he keeps a horse, the term imports both preservation and use. So in the phrase "keep a cow," the use for which she is kept is implied, as if a housekeeper were asked "Do you buy your milk?" and should reply, "No, I keep a cow," it imports not only that she is fed and taken care of, but that she is milked, and her milk consumed by the family. So, "keep a carriage" does not merely mean that a carriage is locked up in the house, but that it is used. "Keep house" imports the burden of household duties; as "keep tavern" imports the duty of receiving and attending to guests. There cannot be a doubt that the phrase "keep a journal" means to make and preserve one. But still the question arises as to the length of that preservation; and it is contended that the subsequent injunction to publish indicates at once the purpose and length of preservation. Is this true? The words are, "keep and publish," not "keep in order to publish." But, waiving all verbal criticism, let me remark that a constitution is merely a collection of principles; and in order to ascertain the force and meaning of any term, it is necessary to attend to the object of the provision, and the principle connected with it. What, then, sir, are the purposes for which a journal is to be kept? I do not pretend to give them all, but some of them, as drawn from the constitution itself; and it will then be seen whether such purposes are of a temporary or of a permanent character, and, by consequence, whether the journal is intended to be a permanent or temporary record. In the first place, it is intended to record the day on which a bill has been presented to the President for his approbation, and the day on which Congress adjourned; for on these two facts may depend the validity of a law. Thus, in the seventh section of the first article of the constitution, it is provided:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it originated, &c. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sunday excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case, it shall not be a law."

Here is one permanent purpose, as enduring as the law itself.

In the second place, it is intended to record the fact of membership in this body, the Senate being the judge, and settling the question of membership in cases of contested election, by the express provision of the fifth section of the first article of the constitution. And this was done in the case of the venerable and distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, (Mr. ROBBINS.) Has not he, and has not his State, a permanent interest in that decision, and in the evidence by which it is established? And is not the journal the highest and the only evidence of that fact? Suppose, sir, it should become expedient at any time to expunge such a decision, what would become of the rights of the Senator from Rhode Island, if a competitor were to present himself here for his seat, with fresh credentials from his State.

In the third place, it is intended to record the presence of a quorum at the opening of each session of Congress, as well as to ascertain the fact that Congress did assemble on the constitutional day for its meeting. The journal always opens with a statement of the names of those who assembled, when it is once ascertained that a quorum is present; it is afterwards taken for granted that they perform their duty, and are always present, unless the contrary is made to appear. But if it so happened that no quorum was present, or that Congress had assembled before it had a legal right to do so, the laws passed under such circumstances would be merely void. This, certainly, is a matter of permanent importance.

In the fourth place, it is intended to record the action of this body on the conduct of its members, as in the instance of the punishment of any of them for disorderly behavior. Suppose the case of the expulsion of a member: will not the right of the State from which he comes to send a successor depend on the fact of expulsion? And could you, by expunging the resolution of expulsion, restore him to his seat? And yet, if you destroy the evidence of the expulsion, is there any thing to invalidate his rights as established by his credentials when he first took his seat? Suppose he was elected for six years, and you expel him at the expiration of the second, and then expunge the resolution of expulsion, how would it be possible to contest his right to a seat for the remaining four years?

In the fifth place, it is intended to ascertain the fact of your organization as a court of impeachment, and the judgment passed on the offender. That judgment may extend to a removal from office, and a disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, which in its nature is perpetual, and is excepted out of the pardoning power which is given to the President in all other cases.

In the sixth and last place which I mean to advert to, it is intended to record the votes of members on matters of moment, that they may be held to their responsibility for pernicious measures. And hence it is expressly provided, in the fifth section of the first article, "that the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." Has not every individual a personal and permanent interest in the record, for good or for evil? This last purpose has reference to the great principle on which republican government is founded—the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. From a consideration, then, of the purposes for which a journal is to be kept, it is apparent that it is intended to be a permanent, and not a temporary, record. None of those purposes would be effectually answered by the mere publication of the journal. They are matters of fact, of which the journal, I mean the manuscript journal, is the highest evidence, and the only evidence where recourse is had to it, for any legal purpose. To expunge this record is to destroy the evidence of a fact; to falsify history, and verify the remark of the satirical Frenchman, that history is nothing but conventional fables. Let me add, in relation to this matter, that the suppressio veri differs nothing in point of morality from the allegatio falsi, and that it would be as hard to maintain that you have a right to suppress the evidence of a fact which had occurred in your proceedings, as to maintain that you have the right to assert a fact upon your journal which never had any existence. But it has been contended by some, that, because we have the custody of the journal, we have the right to do with it what we please. And does custody import the right of destruction? Will it be contended that the Secretary of State, who has the custody of your laws and treaties, and even of the constitution itself, has, from that circumstance, the right to blot out sections from your laws, articles from your treaties, and paragraphs from your constitution; that he has the right to mutilate and destroy the records of the nation? In considering his right of expunction, the question is not whether the substance of the resolution proposed to be expunged is true, but whether such a resolution was adopted; that is the point of history. The existence on the journal of the resolution is no evidence of the truth of its allegation, but simply of its adoption; and the future historian, looking to the whole transactions of the time, would decide upon the truth or error of its allegation, without giving to it any greater weight than is due to the mere expression of an opinion. Every Senator who voted for the original resolution has a personal interest in the record.

Expunging Resolution.

If it is true that to pass such a resolution was illegal and unconstitutional, and a flagrant wrong done to the President of the United States, then his friends should not desire to have it expunged, but, on the contrary, to preserve it as a monument of reproach to those who participated in the measure. In this view of the subject, it should be preserved as a matter of satisfaction on the part of his friends, and of disgrace and shame on the part of his adversaries. And, on the other hand, if the right existed to pass the resolution, and its allegation was true in point of fact, those who sustained it by their vote have an interest in the evidence of their opinion, while those who thought otherwise have the benefit and satisfaction of being able to establish their dissent. In neither view of the case have the friends of the President any fair reason to desire that the evidence of the proceeding should be destroyed. The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) may glory in the vote he gave on the occasion; the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) may do the same; neither has the right to deprive the other of the evidence of his course in relation to it. Those who voted for the resolution alone hazard any thing in preserving that evidence. If they were wrong, then it is for their shame; if they were right, it is the mere expression of an opinion from which others might rightfully and sincerely differ. If the allegations of the friends of the President are true, that the adoption of that resolution was a breach of the constitution, and a most flagrant wrong to him, would it not be more natural that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) should come here to ask us to expunge it, that he might conceal his participation in the matter? Is it not extraordinary that the Senator from Missouri, who takes great credit to himself for resisting the measure, should seek not only to conceal his own glory in opposing it, but the shame of his adversaries in supporting it? What is the purpose to be answered by expunging the resolution? The fact that such a resolution was adopted cannot now be concealed from the eye of history. The journal is only evidence of that fact, and not of the truth of the allegation contained in it. What valuable end, then, is to be accomplished by the expunction? I fear, sir, that the future historian, looking over the whole ground of the controversy, will say, from the nature of the act, that it was a sacrifice, a peace-offering at the altar of executive power. In this view, we have all an interest in the record of the proceedings of this day, for good or for evil report.

But, sir, I come now to consider the reasons which are offered for the adoption of this expunging resolution. They are set forth in the preamble, and I presume they are the best that can be offered. They have been well weighed and considered, and no doubt the ability of the Senator from Missouri has been taxed to the uttermost to present the case in the strongest possible point of view. His reasons are eight in number, and the first of them is in these words:

"And whereas the said resolve was irregularly, illegally, and unconstitutionally adopted by the Senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice: because President Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him as a violator of his oath of office and of the laws and constitution, which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial or the means of defence."

Is this true in point of fact? The proceeding of which this reason professes to be descriptive was this: On the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate, in its usual course of business, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Is this first reason, then, a true description of the subject to which it refers? If the Senate had organized itself into a court of impeachment, called in the Chief Justice to preside, as required by the constitution, and then proceeded to try the President without hearing him, and to pronounce judgment upon him of removal from office, more could not have been said; no stronger language would be required to describe so wanton a violation of constitutional law. Is there no difference between the cases? Can a stronger case of the perversion and abuse of language be put than this, which would represent a simple resolution of a deliberative assembly, expressing merely an opinion, which has no legal effect whatever on the rights of the individual, as the judgment of a court which acts directly and immediately upon those rights? The proceeding referred to has neither the form nor substance of a judgment. Nor is the slightest guilt imputed in the opinion as expressed by the resolution. It states a fact, "that the President has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution;" but is silent as to the motives and intention with which that fact was accompanied, the corrupt and wilful character of which alone could give to the proceeding the attribute of guilt. But suppose, for a moment, that the Senate had, losing sight of the principles of law and justice, formed itself into a court of impeachment, and proceeded, without a hearing, to pass judgment on the individual: would that be a reason for expunging the record, for suppressing the evidence of so monstrous a proceeding? On the contrary, sir, it should stand as a monument of disgrace and dishonor to the men who participated in it. Its legal effect would be nothing; its moral influence would recoil on their own heads, and they should be held to that responsibility to public opinion, to secure which it was provided that the yeas and nays should be entered on the journal. In this view of the subject, the hollowness and fallacy of the reason assigned is manifested by the fact that those who seek to suppress the evidence are not those who advocated, but those who opposed the resolution. But, sir, it is the fate of a false position to embody the principles of its own destruction. If this reason be a true description of the resolution of 28th March, 1834, and sufficient for its expunction, is it not perceived that this very expunging resolution and its preamble is open to the same objection, as pronouncing judgment on those Senators who supported the former, as guilty of an impeachable offence, and violators of their oaths of office, without the benefit of a trial? It should, then, in its turn, be expunged; and if I were called upon to draw up a preamble upon the strength of this precedent, I should use the same language, as being as fair and legitimate a description of the present resolution and its preamble as this reason is descriptive of the resolution of March, 28, 1834. It is absolutely suicidal.

The second reason is as follows:

"And whereas the said resolve, in all its shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and, therefore, unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unconstitutional; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the removing of the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then or can now be specified under the vague and ambiguous term of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people."

The substance of this reason is, that the resolution was erroneous in point of fact. Is that a reason for expunging it? It might form a very good reason for a counter-resolution. The subject is one on which a difference of opinion might fairly exist, and that difference was expressed at the time, both in debate and on the journal; but surely that difference of opinion is no reason for destroying the evidence that such an opinion was expressed.

The third reason is; that

"The said resolve, as adopted, is uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, without specifying," &c.

This reason conflicts with both the others, implying that, if the resolve were detailed and specific, it ought not to be expunged. If all these are reasons for the same act, they should not be antagonist to each other, but should harmoniously tend to the same conclusion. But want of detail can be no reason for suppressing the evidence that such a resolution was adopted.

The fourth reason is merely an amplification of the third.

The fifth reason is as follows:

"And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and constitution, the adoption of the said resolve before any impeachment preferred by the House, was a breach of the privilege of the House; a violation of the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate, and a disqualification

Expunging Resolution.

of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence."

The same answer may be given to this reason as is given to the first, that it is not a fair and true description of the case. It treats the resolution of 1834 as if it were a judgment of the Senate in its judicial capacity as a court of impeachment, when, in truth, it is nothing more than the expression of an opinion in its character of a deliberative assembly. It is no breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives, since it neither anticipates nor precludes an impeachment. It is no prejudication of any question which might come before the Senate as a court of impeachment, since such question must be one of guilt; and nothing of the kind is imputed in the resolution. But again: if all this were true, it would be no reason for expunging, or, in other words, destroying the evidence of the fact that such a resolution was adopted.

But, sir, we come now to the sixth reason, which is perhaps the true motive, though not a justification for this extraordinary proceeding, and a gleam of light is thrown upon the subject, which gives it color and complexion. The substance of this reason is, that the President's protest was rejected, and not permitted to be entered upon the journal, while memorials and petitions against him were duly and honorably received. Here is another instance of that conflict with other reasons, which was remarked upon in adverting to the third. It implies that, if the protest had been received, then the resolve should not be expunged. But with that confusion of ideas which seems to characterize the whole preamble, it places the protest of the President on the same footing with petitions from the people. The President demanded that his protest should be spread upon the journal, which he had no right to do. But, supposing for a moment that he had, is the refusal a reason for expunging the resolution to which the protest has reference. The people have an undoubted right to express their opinions and wishes, in the form of petitions and memorials; but the President, as such, has no right to notice the proceedings of any other branch of the Government in the form of a protest. It is no part of the functions or privileges of executive power to review and rebuke the proceedings of the legislative or judicial branches of the Government. The aspect which the whole subject assumes, in contemplating this reason, is that of retaliation. It looks like offering an indignity to this body, by way of compensating the slight of executive power.

The seventh and eight reasons may be classed together, and resolve themselves into the general allegation that the said resolve was inopportune, of evil example, and dangerous precedent; all of which, being a mere matter of opinion, about which a fair difference might arise, could furnish no reason for expunging the resolve, however it might be urged as a reason for passing a counter-resolution." We have thus, sir, gone through them all, and do not find one which justifies the conclusion that the resolution should be expunged. And if they do not singly support that conclusion, they cannot do it collectively. A thousand bad reasons have no more force than one. We may say, then, of this preamble, what was said of Gratiano's reasoning: "Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing; more than any man in all Venice; his reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them, they are not worth the search."

But it is said the Senate had no right to pass such a resolution; that it cannot be justified as the fair exercise of any one of its powers. Still, it may be answered, it is a fact that such a resolution was adopted, and the objection involves a mere difference of opinion, which cannot be a reason for destroying the evidence of the fact. But as to the right itself, I think there can be no doubt of its existence, when the subject is fully understood. The Senate, under the constitution, has various powers—legislative, judicial, and executive. The error lies in attempting to discover and explain the right to pass such a resolution in the exercise of any of these powers.

The object of all these powers is the modification of some social or political right. But the Senate is a deliberative body, and, as such, must have opinions, and express them. It is the inherent right and property of every deliberative assembly to have and express opinions, which only can be done by resolution. A resolution of thanks cannot be traced to any one of these powers; neither can a resolution of condolence; and yet no one ever doubted the right to pass either the one or the other. If it were necessary to resort to the constitution for any express or implied authority, it might be found in the seventh section of the fourth article, which, in its last paragraph, supposes that there are other resolutions than legislative acts, or such as require the concurrence of both Houses. But the very institution of a deliberative assembly, in the nature of things, supposes and involves the existence of opinions and the right of expressing them. The powers of such an assembly, or, in other words, the control which it may exercise over the social or political rights of others, is a very different matter, and depends on the provisions of the constitution which gives it existence. But is it not somewhat remarkable that those who make the objection, do not perceive that this very expunging resolution which they advocate, presupposes the right? If the Senate has no right to pass any resolution but such as can be traced to one of those powers, what right has it to pass this expunging resolution? Into such absurdities, sir, will men fall when they seek to sustain, by reasoning, a false position. The right, then, to pass such a resolution I take to be unquestionable, and the exercise of it may be, at times, highly expedient, as a check or caution to the wantonness or heedlessness of executive power, and as a measure short of impeachment. But, sir, what is impeachment? A farce, a nullity! It is, like the case of the electoral colleges, an abortion. There is little danger to be apprehended but from a popular President; and the very fact of his being such, under the party organization of this country, supposes the fact that he is sustained and supported by a majority of the body in whom the impeaching power resides. I might here, sir, conclude what I wished to say in relation to the matter now depending before the Senate, having, as I think, established two propositions, which cover the whole ground: first, that the Senate, as a deliberative assembly, had the right to pass the resolution of March 28, 1834; and, secondly, that, whether true or not in point of fact, we have no right to expunge it, because the journal is, by the constitution, a permanent record. I will further incidentally remark that, if the right of expunction exists, and is to be established by this precedent, then a subsequent Senate may expunge this expunging resolution; and so, in all time to come, these successive expunctions may serve to indicate the triumph or defeat of the respective political parties of the country. But an attempt has been made to sustain this measure by a resort to precedents. Sir, precedents are of no authority when opposed to a clear, ascertained, settled principle. They are resorted to in doubtful cases, and often to avoid the force of principle. It is easier, at all times, to follow precedents than to reason. But, sir, above all things, precedents drawn from a period of revolution, such as that referred to by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) are of no weight in a time of profound tranquillity, when security and leisure give opportunity for reflection. It may be very expedient, in a moment of unsettled government and of violence, to suppress the evidence of a particular proceeding; but one could scarcely rely upon such authority for a warrant to corrupt a constitutional record in moments of security and regular government. And yet such is the character of the Senator's domestic precedent. As to his English precedents, they are of no value on a question like this, which does not depend on general parliamentary practice, but on the express provisions of a written constitution, which has directed the keeping of a journal, and contemplates that journal as a permanent record.

When Mr. BAYARD had concluded,

Mr. HENDRICKS rose and said that, at this late hour of the day, it would be out of place to attempt an argument or a speech to the Senate; and such was not his purpose, in the few words he had at present to say. It had been his intention, some time ago, to have troubled the Senate with his views somewhat at large on the subject; but he would content himself now with saying a very few words; and this was perhaps necessary, owing to the peculiar position he occupied in relation to the proposition before the Senate. It would be recollected that he had voted against the resolution of 1834, so much complained of—the resolution which it was now proposed to expunge from the journals of the Senate. He did so for many of the reasons contained in the preamble to the resolution now on our tables. In some of the reasons, however, contained in that preamble, he did not concur, and of course could not vote for it. For some of the reasons contained in it he could most cheerfully vote. No member of the Senate more than himself (said Mr. H.) regretted the passage of that resolution. No one could have been more opposed to it. He viewed it as an apple of discord set in motion; a firebrand thrown into the community, calculated to do more harm than any other measure proposed at that eventful session; and he now believed that it had done more harm in exciting party spirit to its present dangerous height than any other measure which could have been proposed. The danger apprehended to the constitution by this act of expunging (said Mr. H.) is a natural consequence of the measure of 1834; as much so as that one act of violence should succeed another. A party in power to-day, and who shall use that power indiscreetly, will be sure to meet with retaliation, as soon as the opposite party shall triumph. Hence, violent measures of this kind are as sure to succeed each other, in the mutations of party power, as effect is to follow cause.

Much, however, as he was opposed to the resolution of 1834, he could not vote to expunge it from the journals. That was a question, in his opinion, having nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the original proposition. The question before the Senate was one of power to expunge the journal, no matter what journal it might be. He thought no such power existed in the Senate, nor anywhere else; and his oath to support the Constitution of the United States was imperative, and prohibited him from giving any such vote, whatever may have been his opinion of the resolution proposed to be expunged. It was, in his view of the constitution, as much a duty to keep and preserve the journals of unconstitutional proceedings, if such there be, as of any other. Our constituents have as much right to know our bad acts as our good ones; because it is for these they will call us to account; and it would be strange doctrine, that we could shield ourselves from responsibility by expunging the journals. The argument, then, of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the resolution of 1834 was unconstitutional, and therefore ought to be expunged, did not in the least relieve his mind. He understood, too, that this was the basis of the votes of other members of the Senate in favor of expunging. Much as he disapproved of the resolution of 1834, he believed that it was constitutional, and that it was such a proposition as the Senate might entertain and adopt. He saw nothing unconstitutional about it. It might, or it might not, be considered an abstract proposition. It had, indeed, remained as a mere declaratory expression of the Senate, but it might have been the basis of legislation. Whether it be true or false is a matter of opinion. Those who voted for it unquestionably believed its affirmations to be true. They believed that the President had, in relation to the revenue, exercised authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both. He, who voted against it, believed that the authority and power exercised by the President was not in derogation of the constitution and laws; and, however much he dissented on the ground of expediency from that which had been done, he never doubted the constitutional and legal power of the President to do what he did.

It had been said (continued Mr. H.) that the resolution of 1834 contains impeachable matter against the President, and that, on this account, it is not entitled to a place on the journals. He did not think, however, that it contained any impeachable matter. It charged no evil or corrupt intention, which was the essential ingredient of impeachable matter. He referred to the case of Peck's trial before the Senate, and stated that the absence of proof of corrupt intention was the basis of his acquittal by the Senate. This had been the reason of his own vote of acquittal; and his, he had good reason to believe, was the basis of votes of acquittal generally.

In voting against expunging, he did not vote to affirm the truth of the resolution of 1834. He had already stated the reverse. He believed that the President had the power, whatever he might think of its exercise, under the circumstances of that case. But his opinion that the resolution proposed to be expunged was and is untrue, had nothing to do with his duty in the present case, and could not, in any degree, influence his vote. The Senate had no power to expunge the journals. He could, without the least difficulty, vote upon the journals of the present session a resolution to rescind that of 1834, or to affirm a contrary proposition. This, while it would clearly assert the opinion of the Senate in relation to the proceedings of 1834, would not obliterate the journals of that day, and would have all the effect of the mode proposed.

MR. STRANGE said: I am not unconscious of the disadvantages under which I labor, in addressing the Senate at this late period; but it has been properly remarked, in the course of this debate, that we are engaged in no ephemeral transaction; that this night's work is not to pass away with the occasion; it is not to be consigned at once "to the tomb of the Capulets" with things unworthy of remembrance. All connected with the matter under consideration are doomed to immortality, for good or for evil; and as it is my destiny and my purpose to appropriate an humble leaf from this fadeless wreath, to rescue from oblivion a name which would otherwise be forgotten when the individual who bears it shall cease to breathe, I wish to say a few words in explanation of my course, not with the vain hope of their being as immortal as the act they accompany, but merely for the temporary satisfaction of my personal acquaintances. I am aware that this subject has been treated with singular ability on both sides of this hall, and may, perhaps, be thought exhausted; but as, in some respects, my views differ considerably from any I have heretofore heard advanced, I take the liberty of offering them. It is the more proper I should do so, as, in a motion I shall take occasion to make before I sit down, I might otherwise subject myself to the misapprehension both of friends and foes, (without meaning, however, to use the latter term in its most offensive sense.)

The Senator from South Carolina, who discoursed so eloquently upon this subject the other day, was pleased to say, facetiously, that those who vote for this expunging resolution will be placed on "a bad eminence," damned to a fame like that of Eratosthratus, who destroyed by fire one of the seven wonders of the world, the Ephesian temple of Diana; and doubtless the same wild fancy which led him to this conclusion, has pictured for himself and his associates a classic reputation like that of the celebrated Roman conspirators, who slew a Caesar in the Capitol. Happily, however, the latter parallel fails in most important particulars; for the ancients actually wrought the physical death of a usurper, while the moderns have only attempted the moral death of a patriot.

I regret that those who framed the preamble affixed to this resolution have thought proper to make it so long, not on account of its having furnished a subject of wit to the Senator from Kentucky, but because it has already thrown difficulties in the way of some, and is still likely to throw difficulties in the way of myself, and others friendly to the resolution itself. That delicate machine, the human mind, formed by an invisible hand, is exceedingly subtle in its operations, and, like the watches which occupied the attention of that great monarch, Charles V. of Germany, after his retirement from the cares of empire, no two will operate precisely alike. Many minds may come to a similar conclusion; but, in the processes by which they arrive at it, will probably all vary in a greater or less degree. This is found to be the case in the most simple and familiar matters, and still more so in those of complication and rare occurrence. I wish some reference could have been had, in framing this preamble, to the advice of a celebrated statesman, to a judge then recently appointed to one of the British provinces. "Decide," said he, "according to your judgment of what is right, but give no reasons for your decision. Thousands may approve the one, who will not concur with you in the other." Regardless of this prudent counsel, many reasons are offered in this preamble for the ultimate conclusion that it is right to expunge from the journal of the Senate the obnoxious resolution of March, 1834; and among them it is stated that the said resolution was unconstitutional. In this reason I cannot concur, because I do not unite in the opinion that it is founded in fact. I cannot, therefore, conscientiously put it forth in this formal manner, as constituting a portion of the basis of an important action in which I am desirous to unite. An act, according to my understanding, is unconstitutional, which is prohibited, in express terms, by the constitution, or which is done in substantial omission of something commanded by it. Now, I do not find in the constitution any prohibition upon the Senate from uttering an opinion, collectively or individually, upon any subject whatsoever. I agree that the constitution only expressly authorizes them to perform certain legislative, executive, and judicial functions, and prescribes the mode, to a certain extent, in which they shall perform them, and that a performance of these acts in any substantial disregard of this prescription would be unconstitutional, while all acts done, not mentioned or distinctly referred to in the constitution, are done without its warrant. But, then, the constitution has not taken away, so far as the matter under consideration is concerned, that right which, in a state of nature, all men derived from the God who made them, to utter their thoughts, as individuals or collectively, however assembled, upon things in general. Restrictions upon this privilege are certainly to be found in the Divine law itself, and in the many maxims of propriety which society has, from time to time, and in various ways, laid down for the government of its members. But I deny that the Constitution of the United States has laid down any restriction applicable to the present case, and would in vain ask for its production. I know that, in disputing the soundness of this reason set forth in the preamble, I encounter the opinions of many wise men, for whom I have the profoundest respect. But, while this furnishes me with a strong and only reason for doubting the soundness of my own view, it will not justify me in asserting that as a truth of which I am not convinced; and still less that to which my own faculties altogether refuse their assent. When a man undertakes to assert any thing deliberately, he must do so upon his own conviction, and not upon the mere opinions of others. Those who insist upon the unconstitutionality of the resolution of 1834, treat it as an actual impeachment of the President, without having waited for the accusation constitutionally preferred by the House of Representatives. If I could admit or perceive the fact that the resolution of 1834 was an impeachment of the President, in the technical sense of that word, I should have no difficulty in uniting in the conclusion that it was a palpable violation of the constitution. But impeachment, as used in the constitution, is a technical term, and all that enters into the technical ideas embraced in the term must exist to make it applicable. A number of unauthorized persons may pronounce a man guilty of an offence, but no one for that reason would say that he had been tried. If a judge goes into court, and, without the finding of an indictment, or any other formal accusation against a person, directs an entry to be made upon the record that he is guilty of a certain offence, it could not be said that he had been tried. The substantial part of an impeachment or trial is the punishment consequent upon being found guilty; and no matter by what name a proceeding may be called, it does not meet the idea embraced in these expressions, either in laws or constitutions, if conviction upon it does not involve punishment as a regular consequence. In the proceeding referred to in the Senate, there was condemnation, but it was not a condemnation which drew after it punishment, or in pursuance of which punishment could have been inflicted. In matters of this sort, names are things; and whenever we suffer ourselves to be drawn away from their accepted significations, we cast ourselves upon a wide ocean of uncertainty, and our minds, like a vessel, however richly freighted, without compass or polar star, can never calculate on ultimately reaching any place of security. To say that the Senate impeached the President in the resolution of 1834, is, in my judgment, a pure assumption; and if the resolution was not an impeachment, no one contends, I believe, that it was a literal violation of the constitution. But it is insisted that, if not a literal violation of the constitution, the resolution of 1834 was a violation of its spirit. I belong, Mr. President, to a class of politicians, and I am proud to say so, who deny that the constitution has any spirit. Like Shylock's bond, we hold that whatever is not found in it, cannot be claimed under it; its grants and its prohibitions are such, as that he who reads may perceive them, and no artful constructionist is at liberty to stretch it to his purposes, or to hammer it out, like gold leaf, until it covers the universe. Believing, then, that the Senate was exercising no constitutional function in their vote of censure upon the President; and that in all other matters the constitution leaves to them, unimpaired, all their natural rights of expressing their opinions, in whatever way assembled, and upon any subject, I cannot concur in the reason assigned for expunging the resolution of 1834, that it was an unconstitutional act. But in thus differing with my friends, and making this concession to the opposition, I think I am very far from weakening the cause of the former, and am presenting the latter with a Trojan horse; in admitting that their act was not unconstitutional, I sweep away at a breath the make the law by which the person charged is to be tried. What volume contains a recital of the acts for which the President of the United States, or any other public officer, is subject to impeachment? There is no such volume. Any misdemeanor in office will warrant impeachment and conviction; and what is such misdemeanor is left to the mere discretion of the Senate, and they promulge the law at the very moment that they pronounce the guilt of its infraction? It is only necessary for the House of Representatives to charge the offence, and the Senate have then the uncontrollable right to decide the two questions, whether the facts exist; and if so, whether they are the subjects of punishment. Surely, a tribunal so constituted ought, of all others, to keep its faculties uninfluenced by rashly expressed opinions. But the worst feature of impropriety yet remains to be considered. It is a general principle, that no man can be a judge in a cause where he has an interest; but some tribunals are so constituted that this wholesome principle cannot always be applied. In such a case, it would seem that a judge so situated would, above all others, feel most powerfully restrained from allowing himself any indulgence in previous expressions of opinions which might prejudice the person charged, or from prematurely evincing the strength of his own bias. And yet the Senate of the United States, the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President for unconstitutional acts, prejudices him in a matter in which individual Senators have a personal interest. I do not mean to say that their personal interest was enlisted by golden bribes, received in the shape of fees, or otherwise, from the United States Bank; although such things have been said, I, for one, do not believe them. I do not think that such was the interest they felt in the question. No; a nobler passion blinded them to the impropriety of the act they were committing; a passion which has been called the vice of great minds; a passion planted in the human breast for the wisest purposes; but one of the most dangerous and desolating, where it gains unhallowed mastery. A great political strife had been waging for years, and talent and wealth, and every other engine of human power, had been employed in its progress. No machine had been so powerful as the United States Bank in conducing to the spread of opinions, upon whose success the party to which these Senators belonged, believed its own triumph, and the welfare of the nation, to depend. To these opinions Senators had subscribed in the most decided and public manner, and upon them had staked their hopes of renown and wordly distinction. They were opposed by the administration, and a stern, unyielding front presented by it to their advance. For this the President had been strongly denounced, and Senators themselves had not been backward in breathing upon the waves of opposition, and stirring them into rage; and, finally, in the tumult of this excitement, forgetful of the high, honorable, and delicate propriety which, as men and individuals, has ever characterized them, and their elevated standing as the constitutional triers of the President, they commanded his guilt to be recorded before any legal accuser had come forward, and indignantly refused to hear his defence. Am I not warranted, under these circumstances, in pronouncing the act one of gross and flagrant impropriety?

But I have said it is an act dangerous in its tendency as a precedent, and for that reason ought to be expunged. The constitution has pointed out the mode in which the different branches of the Government are mutually to check and balance each other, and nowhere is this informal mode of expressing disapprobation adverted to as one of them. Crimination invariably leads to recrimination. The beginning of strife has been aptly compared in the scriptures to the letting out of waters; the natural result is, that every thing valuable within its reach is carried away in its desolating sweep. "One word," in homely adage, "brings on another;" and whether the strife of tongues begins between two old wives at the fish market, or the President and Senate, anger quickly subdues all the nobler faculties of the mind, and unnatural and cruel warfare is the probable result. A practical illustration of this idea is furnished in the civil wars of England, already alluded to by the Senator from Connecticut. A strife, in which all the ties of family and kindred were dissolved, and the nearest and the dearest brought to quench a savage thirst in each other's blood, originated in an undignified war of words between the King and the Parliament. If the principle be established that it is proper for one branch of the Government, assembled as such, (but in a manner so informal as to leave it a matter of contest whether it is an official act or not,) to condemn the acts of another, the most fearful consequences must be apprehended. If the Senate may informally condemn the President, so it may the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives the Senate. Scenes must then originate which, if carried out far into practice, would degrade the nation in the eyes of strangers, and add much to the uncertainty of the tenure by which domestic quiet is retained. The principle is therefore dangerous in the extreme, and ought to be most promptly discontinued.

I urge, as a third reason for expunging the resolution of 1834, that it is unjust. It is true the then President of the United States still retains his office, and no removal can take place in consequence of the condemnation therein expressed; yet its obvious and designed tendency must have been to degrade the Chief Magistrate in the eyes of the country. Want of principle, or want of capacity, is the alternative left to him in the estimation of all who believe this accusation to be true. They must either pronounce him a sacrilegious violator of the constitution of his country, or a very incompetent judge of its provisions. "Surely," it would be said by all whose knowledge of affairs did not induce them to look beyond the mere surface of this transaction, "the Senate would not have thus harshly condemned the President for some slight oversight, for some small misapprehension of duty, into which any man might have fallen. No! no! it is some grave matter, in which the constitution has been so grossly violated that none but a rash, headstrong, unprincipled man, who heeded not, or an ignoramus, too dull to perceive, could have been the actor." This is the natural conclusion; and what a dilemma for one to be reduced to in this land, where popular opinion is to a public man the breath of his nostrils! That the Senate, availing itself of its usually just title to public confidence, should denounce a man, uncited and unheard, as a violator of the constitution of his country, whom the popular voice had pronounced most worthy, among the millions of American citizens, to fill the most dignified and responsible trust, is, to my apprehension, the grossest insult to the public sense of justice I have ever witnessed. Very few, but the very individual against whom it was directed, who would not have sunk beneath it.

But this objection to the resolution of 1834 depends altogether for support upon another, which I come now to consider, embracing, in fact, the pith of this controversy; and that is, as I have said, its falsehood. And here, again, I must apologize for the harshness of the term used, from the necessity I am under to speak plainly, not meaning for a moment to apply it to the individual veracity of those who voted for that resolution. There may be falsehood in a legal conclusion, however sincere the man who arrives at it; and whenever one comes to the conclusion that certain acts are unconstitutional, all who differ with him must believe his conclusion false, whatever terms they may adopt to express their dissent. About the acts done by the President, in reference to which this resolution was adopted, there is no controversy; but that those acts were unconstitutional is, in my judgment, most falsely asserted by the resolution; the position is so false, so gross a perversion of the constitution, that it ought never to have been taken; such a dangerous misrepresentation of that sacred instrument, that it ought, as far as possible, to be annihilated, and treated as though it had never been. It is so palpably erroneous, that I cannot persuade myself that any man of common sense or common honesty, whose mind was perfectly free from previous bias, could for a moment countenance it. But when, as I believe, under the impulse of excited feelings, and in the blindness of party strife, it has received the sanction of the Senate, I am unwilling it should remain, to shed its deceptive light upon future ages, and mislead others to their ruin. At the time this resolution was adopted, I had not the honor of a seat in this body; but I was a lover of my country, and felt a deep solicitude for everything connected with its interests. I then believed, and do still believe, its Senate a body surpassed by none on earth in dignity, and my eye was turned anxiously upon its movements. Rumor had given out that this resolution was to be brought forward; I was not ignorant of the obscuring effects of passion upon the clearest intellect; and yet I did think the constitutionality of the President's action so obvious that it was impossible to blink it. I confess, when I first heard the removal of the deposits announced, I was startled by the boldness of the measure, but I did not for a moment doubt the constitutionality of the act. I was apprehensive that the President had so far outrun public opinion, it would never overtake him; and his administration, deprived of that essential support, would no longer be useful to the country. This was the extent of my alarm. Contrary to my expectation, however, the Senate has pronounced the act unconstitutional, and it is not sufficient for us to make a mere negation, without reasoning the matter a little. I am well aware, sir, that the idea of the unity of the Executive has not been opposed only, but has been actually turned into ridicule. But the day has gone by when ridicule was the acknowledged test of truth; it has been found to level its shafts with equal success against subjects the lightest and the gravest—against the phantoms of falsehood, and the most solemn realities. Of the unity of the executive branch of the Government of the United States we need look no farther for evidence than the constitution itself, which declares “the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.” He is in fact the only executive officer created by the constitution, all others owing their existence to the legislative power of Congress.

Expunging Resolution.

In 1800, but a few years after this constitution was formed, and its original plan and design was fresh in the memory of all, the unity of the Executive is distinctly recognized, in a paper drawn up with great care and deliberation, for the express purpose of staying the waves of federal power. I mean Mr. Madison's celebrated report, in which it is stated, “According to the particular organization of the constitution, its legislative powers are vested in the Congress; its Executive powers in the President, and its judicial powers in a supreme and inferior tribunals. The union of any two of these powers,” it proceeds, “and still more, of all three, in any one of these departments, must consequently subvert the constitutional organization of them.” The other officers provided by law are mere agents, through whom he is to fulfil the great trust confided to him by the constitution; and whenever the duties prescribed for them from time to time are not, according to his judgment, so performed as best to promote the public good, it is not only his right, but his duty, to change them. His right of removal being thus unquestionable, no charge of unconstitutionality can rest upon him for the mere exercise of a discretion confided to him by the constitution. But it is not denied by the President or his friends, that the removal of the deposits was, in fact, his own act; and, for whatever of unconstitutionality or illegality may be in it, he is responsible. It is true the charter of the United States Bank declares that bank to be the place of deposit for the public moneys, and that they shall only be removed from thence at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever, therefore, that will is expressed, the condition is performed, and the right of the bank to retain the moneys under their charter, viewing it as a contract, expires, and the law of the land regulating the disposal of the public treasure is fulfilled. It is not denied that Mr. Duane, the then Secretary of the Treasury, did not choose so to exercise his will, and refused to order the removal of the deposits; but he was himself removed, and another, quite as wise and as honest, appointed in his stead, who, without hesitation, dissolved the spell by which the bank retained the public moneys, and ordered them to be removed. It is contended that this condition was imposed upon the bank in the retention of the public deposits, altogether in reference to their security, and it was a violation of the compact to remove them for any other reason than insecurity. But are those the terms of the condition? Is any reference made in that condition to the motives upon which the Secretary should exercise the power intrusted to him of putting an end to the depository character of the bank? No such reference, no such intimation, is to be found. Had the bank applied to him for his reasons, he might and ought to have treated the application as an impertinent demand. But reasons he was bound to give to Congress, and he did give them. These reasons could not have been asked for in reference to the rights of the bank, for, so far as she is concerned, a naked trust has been exercised, and there is an end of the matter; but simply to enable Congress, as the guardian of the public treasure, to exercise that supervision over what had been done, its management during the recess, which it ought of right to do. A disingenuous clamor has been raised for the purpose of throwing the true questions in this investigation into obscurity, that the act of removal produced a union of the purse and the sword; but did Congress believe that such would be the consequence, when it expressly authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make the removal whenever, in his judgment, it should be expedient? And the matter has been treated as if the President had with his own hand made the removal of the deposits. If such were the fact, where was the necessity of removing one Secretary, and putting in another? If the President's purpose was, by actual and lawless force, to seize the money in the Treasury, he might as well have passed by one Secretary as another. But the truth is, as is well known to every intelligent and candid man, the money in the Treasury was just as inaccessible to the personal contact of the President after the removal as it was before; all the fiscal machinery provided by law for preserving the personal honesty of all having any thing to do with the public money operated in the same way, and precisely the same process was necessary to place a single dollar in the actual grasp of any person whatsoever. But it has been urged, in reference to the public as well as the bank, that the only ground upon which removal was proper was the security of the public money. To this I reply, as before, nothing of the kind is mentioned in the condition of the clause which forms the only restriction in connection with this subject upon the general executive power and duty to act in all things for the promotion of the great purposes of the Federal Government. If, then, the President perceived that for any reason the public good required that the public money should no longer remain in the vaults of the United States Bank, it was not only his privilege but his duty to direct the proper officer to remove it. Should he turn out to be mistaken in his notions of expediency, however reprehensible for want of ability in the discharge of his high functions, there could be no pretence for the charge of unconstitutionality. And here, perhaps, I have said all that is necessary for the maintenance of my position, that the resolution of 1834 was false in asserting the act of the President to be unconstitutional. But I assume for the President still higher ground, and insist that his act was not only legal and constitutional, but that it was in the highest degree expedient; that it was a stroke of generalship which causes the laurels of New Orleans to look pale and withered. We have already had occasion to glance slightly at the history of the times connected with the transaction under consideration. At the close of the war of 1812-'15, the nation was deeply involved in debt, and the national coffers were empty; ingenuity and patriotism were taxed to contrive expedients for meeting the difficult exigency; our recent foes abroad, and malcontents at home, were mocking at our distress, and the political party whose firmness and genius, aided by the valor of our army and navy, had brought to a glorious termination a most unequal war, saw bankruptcy and disgrace ready to overwhelm them. Under these circumstances, as the plank in the shipwreck, the expedient of a United States Bank was seized upon, and some, as I am informed, who doubted its constitutionality, and some even who believed it unconstitutional, were driven by the apparent necessity of the case to give the measure their support. The bank was chartered, performed its functions, and the term of its existence was drawing to a close. Application was made for a renewal of its charter, and having made many friends with "the mammon of unrighteousness," a willing ear was lent to its application. Some believed the question of unconstitutionality put to rest by precedent and adjudication, and no longer open as an available cause of opposition. For various reasons, however, its prayer for a continuance of its existence was granted by the Senate and House of Representatives. But the concurrence of another branch of the Government was necessary to the completion of its hopes, and its application there was answered by a veto which waked up, as by a trumpet-call sound, republican doctrines long since supposed to have sunk into a slumber from which they would never awake. With a force and clearness which astounded the legions of federalism, and infused new vigor into the republican ranks, the unconstitutionality and inexpediency of rechartering the United States Bank was demonstrated. From that hour, every political engine was set to work to prostrate the only man who could withstand the might of this mammoth institution, and all who entertained like opinions. Presses were subsidized—in various ways the talents of the nation were enlisted in its behalf—and by violent and sudden expansions and contractions, now the hopes and now the fears of the populace were appealed to. Here was a new feature of inexpediency for the recharter of the United States Bank presented to the startled consideration of every lover of his country. In our land, where the popular voice controls and directs every thing, nothing is so important as that that voice should itself be directed by the hearts of the pure and the free. The power and the willingness of this institution to corrupt was alarmingly demonstrated; and it was seen that, under whatever pretences, it would, if rechartered, get possession of the public mind, and wield it to its own purposes, either for good or for evil. From the commanding elevation held by the President, he surveyed the field of combat—he beheld the nature of the strife going on—he perceived that it was a vital one to his beloved country—he found that the monster's power of mischief lay in the deposits, and he determined to remove them. Like a skilful surgeon, he saw that the bank, like a vast cancer, was striking its fibres in every direction, until it would finally become so incorporated with the system, that it could only be removed at the expense of the patient's life. Anticipating this horrible event, he determined with a bold hand to cut it off, while the bystanders looked on in amazement. Yes, sir, it was a master stroke, and the bank and its partisans felt that it was mortal to her, that her vitals were wounded beyond recovery. Among the many caricatures to which a spirit I am by no means disposed to commend has given rise in modern times, one illustrative of this idea struck me as being the best. The bank is represented as a huge old woman, extended upon a bed, in the throes of an emetic operation; beside the bed are various vessels, labelled with the names of the several deposit banks, into which are falling the ejected contents of her stomach, consisting of various gold and silver coins. At her head, in a kindly effort to sustain it, is seated the president of that institution, to whom in her agony she exclaims: "Oh! dear Nick, I am very sick." He promptly replies, "It is all the effect of that last prescription of Dr. Jackson." Yes, sir, that last prescription was fatal to the bank, or at least as nearly so as any thing has yet been; and for that cause mainly has he who framed it been so strongly denounced in the resolution of 1834. But it was a measure adopted in strict accordance with all the forms of law and constitution, and not in derogation of either; a measure for which, through all time, the patriot who reviews his country's history, will revere the memory of him who saved by it the perishing constitution; while, with the men of the present generation, he can hardly determine which most challenges his admiration, the wisdom that planned or the firmness that executed it. Having thus, as I think, shown that this resolution was grossly improper, dangerous in its tendency, unjust in its operation, and untrue in its assertion, I come next to consider the motives upon which we are called to expunge it. The fancy of gentlemen has represented us as ignobly bending at the footstool of power, and licking the dust beneath the monarch's tread—as smoothing the rough mane of the lion, and endeavoring to quiet his frightful roar. Even the car of Juggernaut has been made to roll through this hall, and our garments have been sprinkled with the blood, and our ears stunned with the cries, of the victims crushed beneath its wheels. But these are mere pictures of the fancy, and fancy may paint what she pleases; she does not confine her sketches to the copies of even things that might be, and still less to things that are. Sober reason must perceive that we have nothing to expect from the throne, as it has been called, or from him who fills it; that if the mane of the lion is rough, or his roar is angry, it is not against us that his fury is directed---that reasons enough are found for the expunction of the resolution of 1834, in the opinions we have expressed concerning it. But some of us have a strong and urgent reason to perform this act, in a desire to obey those whom we serve. The voice of the people has commanded it to be done, and that is a voice which public men in our country dare not disregard. Even those who least regard it in practice, dare not openly proclaim their contempt. They may speak of it slightly in the private circle, and in their hearts despise it, and endeavor to explain away its unpleasant requirements; but when forced to encounter its unequivocal declarations, they must tremble and obey; they dare not disregard it. That voice has spoken in general terms throughout the nation; but it has spoken to some of us as it were by name, and through the appropriate medium, and commanded us to act. It has not spoken to me personally, but it has spoken to my predecessor; and, standing in the position I now occupy, I hear the sound still ringing in my ears. It is a command which but seconds my own wishes. I came here anticipating the most cheerful compliance; and I yet hope to yield it, if my own friends do not throw obstacles in the way of my obedience. Yet I will not deny that there is some personal reference to the present Chief Magistrate himself in the act we desire to perform. The period is at hand when he who rescued your daughters from the ruffian pollution of a foreign soldiery, and your soil from the foot of the invader, will be deaf to the strains of gratitude, pressed by the earth he once defended. That he whose voice was loudest in the battles of his country shall be hushed into silence; that he who now holds the sceptre of command will have passed away not only from office, but from life itself, and have joined the spirits of men that have been. Is not the fame of her sons dear to a nation? Has she no pleasure in the glory of her best and her bravest? Has she no interest in preventing the mantle of infamy from wrapping the remains of him who should sleep in the robe of honor? In this view of the subject, I had fondly hoped that the gentlemen of the opposition would have united with us in this act of retribution. That in contemplation of this interesting crisis, the party crust which has heretofore encircled their hearts would have given way, and a flood of tenderness spontaneously gushed forth. That with one generous impulse they would have been the first to rush forward, and pluck off the disgraceful stigma their own hands had affixed, in an hour of passionate excitement. But in this we have been disappointed, and are left alone, in behalf of our country, to make this tardy retribution, to wipe out this new argument for the ingratitude of republics.

Mr. EWING addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Since the first presentation of this resolution, it has always been my purpose to say something upon it, before it should be brought to a final decision; but I was aware, from indications not to be mistaken, both at the time it was first presented, and at each subsequent session when it was brought forward, that the mover did not design to bring it then to the issue. Indeed, I well knew that it was deemed necessary, as a pending measure, to agitate and excite the country. Every movement with reference to it showed that such was its purpose; and hence, after several months' discussion last year, when there was a clear administration majority in the Senate, and when the long session gave ample time for deliberation and decision, it was permitted to expire on the table, though a vote upon it was challenged by its opponents. But now, now at this moment, its power being expended—every thing being effected by it which can be expected or hoped from it—now it must come, and at once, to a final vote. And gentlemen upon this side of the House, who have been called upon to discuss it—who, because they would not, heretofore, when they saw that it was but a farce, discuss it—are denied a single day—nay, they are not allowed one hour, of which it is in the power of a fixed and determined majority to deprive them. No courtesy to individuals, which has been usual with this body, or, rather, a part of its very constitution and nature, can procure the slightest relaxation of the iron rule, which seems to be laid down for us; the small favor of a day to deliberate or a night to rest is denied; if we ask for an adjournment, even at this late hour, when all occupation should be suspended, and all labor cease, we hear the cry of "No, no," and "the yeas and nays, the yeas and nays," coming from a quarter which, however it may be respected, is never disobeyed. Gentlemen have their reasons, doubtless. I leave them to weigh the importance of those reasons, and to estimate the propriety of their course. And, subject to all the disadvantages under which I labor—the extreme lateness of the hour, great bodily fatigue, and a want of time to arrange my thoughts and cast them into form, and give them coherence, I proceed, rather than sit by in silence—I proceed to the discussion of this deeply exciting question.

I will not enter again fully into a consideration of the reasons that sustain the resolution of the Senate of the 28th day of March, 1834, which it is now proposed to expunge from the journals of the Senate. At the time when those resolutions were under discussion, I gave reasons, so far as my action was concerned, fully, and in detail. I have re-examined those reasons since, when any excitement to which the occasion may be supposed to have given rise, had subsided, and I find nothing to retract, nothing to alter; time has made no change in my convictions, unless it be to strengthen and confirm them. It would, therefore, be unnecessary for me to touch again that branch of the subject, were it not that the arguments upon the other side have, year after year, been reiterated and re-enforced; the subject which had been thus considered, discussed, decided, and laid aside, is thus revived from time to time and the arguments upon the one side, with a perseverance worthy of a better cause, are again and again shown up before the public, while those which sustained that resolution, having once been triumphant, are since permitted to sleep. I feel the impolicy of our course in this, for hence impressions have taken root, and opinions have grown up in society, which constant vigilance and constant effort, and constantly uniting at all times, and pressing the contest, would have kept down; but it was a natural course; it arose from the repugnance which we all feel to turn to a subject on which the mind has exerted its powers, and retrace the path which we have already trodden, after it is divested of the charm of novelty and the freshness of original thought. But let gentlemen be assured, once for all, and let the country be assured, that we abandon no ground which we have assumed and heretofore sustained. Yet, though I will not go fully into the subject now, I will attempt a brief analysis of the arguments which, on a former occasion, I presented at large to the Senate.

It is perhaps necessary, in the first place, to say something of the character of the resolution of 1834, and to define as nearly as possible what we understood it to import. Gentlemen say that, in its terms, it conveyed censure of the act of the President, and pains are taken to show that its words imported censure. Now, sir, this argument was wholly unnecessary; this declaration useless; a simple inquiry would have settled the fact; for, so far as I was concerned in this matter, and in this I believe I differed but little from those with whom I acted, I intended no praise—no laudation of the President or his executive act; that was not my object in voting for the resolution. I thought the President, in that act, had broken the laws and violated the constitution of our country; and I intended to say so: I meant to speak the language of an American Senator, and a free American citizen; and the same language which I uttered then I now reiterate, and would on a like occasion again embody it in the form of a resolution. It has also been said that this resolution attributes evil motives to the President, in the performance of this act; and that the act charged, as against the constitution, joined with the motive imputed, forms the subject of impeachment. This is wholly unfounded in fact. The resolution attributes no motive whatever. It speaks in the decorous, and, at the same time, dignified language in which one of the legislative branches of our Government may properly speak of the Executive, or of the co-ordinate branch. We believed that the legislative rights and powers of the Senate had been encroached upon by the President; and that we, who exercised those powers for the time being, as trustees of the people, were called upon to defend, or at least to assert them. This body could speak in that matter only by resolution; and by that means, and in that way, we did assert its rights under the constitution, and we declared that those rights had been violated; but we charged no motive. Gentlemen insist that there is impeachable matter charged in the face of this resolution; and, when we deny it, because no motive is charged, they turn, and say we have abandoned our ground; that we soften down and palliate, to avoid the effect of our own act. This, also, is putting a false face upon the whole matter. I, for one, personally, never said and never believed that the President was actuated in this matter by those high motives of public interest which ought to govern the Executive of a great nation. I never thought so; I never said so; and I have not wavered in my opinion; but that opinion, which was my own, was never incorporated into the resolution, neither in language nor in substance. Then, let the resolution stand for itself, and speak its own language; and let the opinions of each of those who supported it be their own, be they strong or weak, firm or wavering; but let those private and individual opinions be kept distinct from the resolution, and let us be met in the argument fairly, not misrepresented.

I presume it will be admitted that it is in the power of Congress and the President, conjointly, by a law, to place the public treasure in such a situation that it will not be in the direct and immediate possession and control of the President. Perhaps I ask too much, by way of concession, considering the temper and character of the present times; but the time has been, and, I trust, will be again, when it would strike any American statesman as a self-evident proposition. The constitution declares that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury except upon appropriations made by law; and if the Executive be a unit, as has been sometimes contended; and if the keeping of the treasure be necessarily an executive office; and if the drawing of money from the Treasury be also an executive office, the keeping of the treasure and the drawing from the Treasury be both done by the same hand, then have the framers of our constitution failed, miserably failed, in their attempt to adjust its checks and balances—in their attempt to place the sword and the purse of the nation in separate and distinct hands. To say that money shall not be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations made by law, and yet place the whole treasure of the nation in the hands of the Executive, who is, (according to the political creed of gentlemen,) the disbursing officer, also would be an excess of weakness almost approaching to idiocy.

If, then, it were in the power of Congress to place the public treasure out of the immediate control of the President, it was done in the law chartering the late Bank of the United States. The public moneys were placed in deposit in that bank by law; the bank, therefore, became the Treasury; for that is the Treasury where the public treasure is deposited and kept. The constitution declares that money shall not be drawn from this Treasury except by appropriations made pursuant to law, and the law provides that the deposits (or, in other words, the treasure) shall remain in that bank, unless removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, (not by the President,) and for reasons which he (the Secretary) shall make known to Congress. So stand, or rather so stood, the constitution and the law—as the safeguards of the public treasure. Could the President touch, could he possess himself of, that treasure, without an infraction of the law and a violation of the constitution? Could he, by a straight-forward, direct act, in his own name, and by his own power, unaided by any instrument which he might fashion for himself, or which the constitution had placed in his hands for other purposes? If he could not, is the act the less illegal or unconstitutional when done by indirection? All admit that a direct order from the President would not have touched public funds, and that the immediate keepers of those funds would not have been bound to obey, or even have been justified in obeying, such order. But the law placed in the hands of the President an instrument with which it could be done, and with which it was done; and I shall now show that it was done by putting a lawful instrument to an unlawful use.

The constitution places the collection of the revenues of the United States in Congress; and the spirit of that provision, coupled with the other provision which requires a law of Congress to draw money from the Treasury, clearly fixes the custody of those revenues, when collected, in the same hands; and the several laws passed shortly after the adoption of the constitution, separating our Government into Departments, and appointing their heads, recognize and keep up this principle. In those acts the Department of state is called an "executive Department." So with the Department of War; and both communicate directly with the President, and not with Congress; while the Treasury Department is not styled executive, and is made to communicate directly with Congress. Thus is explained the intent of the framers of the constitution, and the understanding which a contemporaneous Congress had of its provisions.

But gentlemen here seize upon general terms used in that instrument, and would make them overturn its most particular and express provisions. The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) says that, by the express language of the constitution, "all executive power is vested in the President." The Senator has interpolated a word, and an important one. The constitution does not say "all;" its letter does not, its spirit does not. The language of the constitution is, "the executive power," &c.; but gentlemen, assuming that all executive power is granted, then exercise their ingenuity to find how many of the powers of our Government may be called executive; and all that can be included within that sweeping and undefinable term they attribute to the President. But the constitution does not say "all;" and if it did, the term, as it is elsewhere limited, would not justify their conclusions. Another clause in the constitution does grant "all the legislative powers" to Congress; and yet the same instrument, in another of its articles, confers a large and important portion of those powers upon the President. The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court of the United States, and such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time appoint; and yet the same instrument vests in the Senate of the United States an important portion of those judicial powers—the trial of impeachments. It vests in the President "the executive power," and in another article gives to the Senate of the United States a most important share in that executive power. Gentlemen who contend that all power executive in its nature must follow this general grant, and who go for the exact separation, by distinct lines, of the three great powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—and their investment in three separate, uncontrolled, irresponsible branches, seem to me, with all deference, to understand little of the nature of government. If those powers were exactly separated, so that each stood entirely unchecked and alone, the executive power, being the stronger—indeed, the only power capable of action—having drawn to itself, and, according to gentlemen, being entitled to, the custody of the treasure of the nation, would be independent of all others, and above them all, and all must be absorbed and swallowed up in its vortex.

I have said that the executive act which the resolution of March, 1834, condemns, was, in the language of that resolution, in derogation of both the constitution and law. This I shall attempt to establish.

It was against law. The act of Congress incorporating the Bank of the United States was a law containing in itself a contract as soon as accepted by the bank, and it was a contract for a good and valuable consideration; this contract was violated in its spirit and intent, (and the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) will not, I presume, deny that this contract had a spirit as well as letter, if the constitution have none.) It was violated in its spirit, and so violated that, as between individuals in a parallel case, an action of law could have been sustained, and damages recovered. This contract was, that the public money should be deposited in the bank, and should be continued there in deposit, until removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons which he was required to lay before Congress. For this, among other things, the bank agreed to transmit the public funds, wheresoever wanted, free of charge; and it paid, in cash, a large bonus to the Government. Under this contract, it seems to me perfectly obvious, and even self-evident, that the public deposits could not be removed, unless there were some just financial cause for removal. It could not be done to try experiments, nor to test its effect upon the public mind, but for some fiscal reason, of which the Secretary of the Treasury had official cognizance, and which he, as the fiscal agent, could make known to Congress. The removal, too, must, in order to conform to this law, be an act of the Secretary of the Treasury himself—his own official act—his own reason approving, and his own will moving him to its execution. It must have been, likewise, a Secretary, the regular officer of the Government appointed to perform the general duties of that office, and to whose duties this was but incidental and additional; not an officer appointed for the sole and only purpose of doing this act, and pledged or committed to the act before his appointment. If this were not the case, the reference to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the requirement of his reasons, were but a mockery, a criminal evasion of right and justice, which would stamp fraud upon any private contract. I have thus shown what ought to have been done according to a fair and just construction of this law and contract: I will now show what was in fact done.

Just after the adjournment of Congress, and but a few weeks after an inquiry in the House of Representatives, and a decision that the public deposits were safe in the Bank of the United States, the President set on foot negotiations with the State banks, with a view to the removal of the deposits; this without the consent or concurrence of the then Secretary of the Treasury to the removal, but with his known and avowed opinion against the propriety as well as the legality of the act. I speak now of Secretary McLane, who was consulted by the President, and required to do the deed. He would not lend himself to be the instrument for any such purpose; he refused, and was removed from that office, to a higher, it is true, but removed so that he went out of the way, and could not prevent the measure. He was of opinion that the deposits could not legally be removed without a reason, and that the reasons alleged as existing were unfounded or insufficient. Now, I contend that, according to any fair construction of the law, the bank had a right to the judgment of Mr. McLane, then Secretary of the Treasury, on that subject, and was entitled to all the benefit of his judgment and his volition; and it was a breach, or, worse, a dishonest evasion of that contract, to put that Secretary out of the way, his opinion having been taken, and because his opinion was taken, and put another in his place in order to try the experiment upon and by that other, especially as the then Secretary was not even accused of the slightest impropriety in his judgment or in his acts. His promotion to a superior office shows that he had not lost the confidence of the Executive. Mr. McLane was removed, and Mr. Duane appointed specially to perform the act. He was approached on the subject, immediately after his appointment, in a manner which touched his spirit and wounded his pride, and by an individual from whose communion he shrunk with disgust. He was pressed by the President himself, but at last refused, because the reasons for the act were insufficient, and he was removed; and so far as executive disappointment and party slander could do it, he was disgraced. The President then called in a third Secretary, who had pronounced an opinion before his appointment; and by the President, through him, the act was done. Now, I say that, if, in a parallel case between individuals, this course had been pursued by one party towards the other, any court or jury would decide, any honest community would declare, that the contract was violated—shamefully violated.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) in his zeal to vindicate the acts of the President, and testify his gratitude to him, has done injustice to some of his own constituents—to men, in all the relations of life, social and official, as correct and honorable as himself. The gentleman said that the directors of the Bank of the United States, for political effect, for the purpose of operating upon the elections, and compelling a recharter of the bank, first threw out a large amount of bank paper, and created a delusive prosperity; then suddenly contracted their issues, in order to distress the community, and make them cry out for a recharter. This, sir, is not true in the connection and the manner in which it is stated; it is not true in fact, to say nothing about motive. The bank did not contract its issues until it had received notice—unofficial, it is true, but not until it had received notice—that the deposits would be withdrawn, and that the executive power and influence would be directed against the institution, to discredit and destroy it. The documents laid upon our table during that agitating session conclusively show this fact. The public prints of the day, on the side of the administration, show it. The speeches of Senators in this body at that time show it. By all these, the bank was declared to be insolvent, and unworthy of credit. The public deposits were said to be unsafe in its vaults, in consequence of that insolvency; and the agent appointed by the President to settle the preliminaries of a contract with some of the State banks, declares that he will bring the Bank of the United States, as a reptile, to the feet of the Executive. Then, with all this executive power and executive influence directed against it; with this large amount of public deposits to be suddenly and capriciously withdrawn, while at the same time the party press resounded through the Union the approaching prostration and destruction of the bank; while the institution was assailed on all sides, and unadvised of the point at which the next attack was to be made; I ask you, sir, and I ask every candid man, whether the men who managed the affairs of that institution, whose public and whose private characters also were in a high degree involved in making good its defence, I ask whether they can be censured, with any show or color of justice, for using all the lawful means which were placed in their hands to sustain and support the credit of the institution.

Sir, not only their duty to themselves, but their duty to the public at large, required it. If that bank had fallen beneath the weight of the executive arm, it would have dragged down with it most of the banks in the Union, and it would have caused much individual distress, bankruptcy, and ruin. Hence every principle of self-preservation, every motive of patriotism and of duty, united to impel those men to use every means so to guard and fortify and defend their institution, as that it would stand the shock. And they did guard it and defend it so that it withstood a power before which the Bank of England would have fallen, even in its most palmy days. Perhaps they fortified their fortress more strongly than actual necessity required; perhaps they overrated the strength of the enemy, and were not fully conscious of their own; perhaps they remained in their intrenchments after the siege was raised, or the power of the assailants had become exhausted; but if they erred, it was on the side not of danger but of duty, and their success has conferred a lasting benefit on the country. This much I have thought proper to say in behalf of those gentlemen with whom I have some acquaintance, but no connection of any kind; and I say it as an act of common justice towards them, who have been attacked, and whose acts have been misrepresented on this floor.

The Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. STRANGE,) in the abundance of his charity, declares that he does not accuse Senators of taking bribes of the Bank of the United States. He acquits them of the foul charge, as he really believes they were not bribed. The Senate are much indebted to the honorable member for his decree of acquittal, especially as they never constituted him their judge. But what right has he, or what right has any man who is not himself shameless, in the presence of this body or elsewhere, to entertain the infamous proposition for a moment; to speak of it in terms of either denial or belief; to refer to it at all, except to consign the base slanderers who invented and who uttered it, to the depth of infamy which their atrocious falsehoods have merited? But there are bounds to the liberality of the Senator from North Carolina. He thinks, if I have comprehended him, that gentlemen here who were counsel for the Bank of the United States may have been warped in their feelings and judgment from that cause, to form opinions which no unbiassed and intelligent man could form, and to do acts which no honest man having an intellect much above idiocy could do. The Senator has not told us where, or how, or among whom, he has formed his opinion of the bar, especially of those who are admitted to be among its best and most honorable and most enlightened members.

[Mr. STRANGE explained: did not say that gentlemen who were counsel for the bank were biassed from that cause, but that they were warped by political excitement.]

I am happy (said Mr. E.) to receive the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina, and yet I am at a loss to comprehend how he used the fact of the employment of some gentlemen as legal counsel for the bank, and the statement of that fact following, with a "but," the general acquittal of direct and naked bribery. But however these engagements may have been supposed by him or others to operate on the minds of gentlemen with whom they were made, they certainly never affected mine, as I never was in any case the counsel of that institution. Still, I know not but the same influence may be brought equally home to me, for I in several cases profited by the litigation of the bank, by engagements on the opposite side, which engagements I should never have had, if there had been no bank to bring suits against those who employed me to defend them. So that, on the whole, I believe I must even share with my friends here, whom I have sometimes met in the hall below, where justice is still administered, and where truth and reason and law are not yet outraged or spurned. I must even content myself to share with them in the imputation of that bias which counsellors at law are supposed to feel in behalf of those through whose means they obtain a cause in a court of justice.

But I do not admit that the Senator's charge, as explained, approaches nearer to the truth than that which I had mistaken for it, and which he has just corrected. I, for one, was not moved in this matter by political interest or political excitement. It was a subject for cool deliberation and sober judgment, and I brought the powers of my mind calmly and patiently to act upon it; and when full conviction followed investigation, and my opinion was fixed, I acted in obedience to the dictates of that judgment, not under excitement—unless, indeed, a strong feeling of attachment to those abstractions called law and right, which at some times, and in some minds, warms, and kindles, and glows to enthusiasm, is to be called by that name.

I have said, and have attempted to show, that the act of the President, in the removal of the deposits, was illegal. The Senator from North Carolina cannot conceive it possible that any man can hold such an opinion; but he tells us that he was himself startled at the boldness of the act: he feared the people would not sustain it. And permit me, with all deference, to say to that gentleman, that if the people had not sustained it, he would then have been startled at its illegality. I thought it illegal; so thought twenty-eight out of forty-eight Senators in this body; so thought McLane, Secretary of the Treasury; so thought Duane, who was made Secretary for the mere purpose of doing the act. And when they thought so, their political feelings and their personal predilections were all on the side of those doing the act which their judgments condemned. This same act, sir, which startled the Senator from North Carolina in his private retreat, startled also the nation; and the sensation did not subside until they and he had become used and reconciled to new and extravagant acts of executive power. There are other gentlemen now on this floor who condemned this act in the strongest terms, until they knew that the popular voice would sustain it. The Senator from Virginia near me, (Mr. Rives,) at the close of the last session, in a speech which, I am sorry to say, has never found its way into the public papers, declared that in this act he thought the Executive had gone to the very verge of the constitution, but that he had not overstepped it. I differed from the Senator from Virginia in this only: I thought he had not only gone to the verge of the constitutional boundary, but that he had broken over it. That gentleman and myself were separated in opinion by a mere mathematical line—length, without breadth or thickness—for he thought, and so said on the occasion I have referred to, that the custody of the public treasure belonged, by the constitution, to the representatives of the States and of the people; and that almost any sacrifice ought to be made, in order to restore it to their hands. But the Senator from North Carolina—whose opinion, since he has recovered from the first surprise that the executive act occasioned, is, on this subject especially, entitled to a very great weight—thinks that no man, possessing both honesty and sense, could vote for the resolution which passed the Senate.

[Mr. STRANGE. I did not say so. I said they could not, unless under strong previous bias.]

Mr. EWING. The explanation amounts to but little. A bias which destroyed the honesty or obscured the sense, is now introduced and attributed, to lighten the odium of the charge which his unqualified language, as I understood it, cast upon the former majority of this body. And now, the Senator from Virginia, who believed the President had gone to the very verge of the constitution, and had then possessed himself of the treasure which, by that constitution, belonged to the representatives of the people, and the Senator from North Carolina, who was, in private, "startled" by the boldness of the act, until he found that the people sustained it, are ready to vote censure and obloquy upon those Senators who ventured to express an opinion, before they knew whether that opinion would be sustained by the popular voice or not. For one, I respect not their opinions, so elicited and so expressed; and I scorn their censure and their reproach. When men use language harsh or vindictive, or utter degrading charges against others at least as honorable as themselves, they seize a two-edged sword, which often wounds the hand that wields it. I am willing to stand in the ranks in which I then stood, and now stand, and receive their onset, no matter how fierce and how furious. I am willing to risk the character of the majority which passed that resolution, for integrity and intelligence, and independence of thought and of action, against this majority, which is now the instrument of its repudiation. And if, in connection with the pregnant incidents of the times, the names of those who have taken part in the moving scenes should descend, and pass in review before posterity, I feel that I have well chosen the rank in which my humble name shall stand to receive the judgment of that august tribunal.

I find that I am desultory and diffuse in my course of discussion, but time was not allowed me to prepare to be connected and brief. I have shown that the removal of the deposits was in violation of a contract, and against law.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

I shall now endeavor to make good the position that it was in violation of the constitution. For this, a few words will suffice; for it flows as a consequence from the illegality of the act of removal, and the conceded point that the Legislature, and not the Executive, is the constitutional keeper and guardian of the public treasure. The President, if he had seized that treasure by an act of open and direct violence, and become himself the keeper, in defiance of legislative authority, would, by the concurrent opinion of all here, have violated that constitution which made the Legislature its keeper. But if, through the exercise of a power which the law (not the constitution) placed in his hands for other purposes, he did by lawful means effect this unconstitutional object, does it vary the case, or make the violation of the constitution less certain? The President had by law a right to remove the Secretary of the Treasury, though he had no right to seize the public treasure; but, through the exercise of that power of removal, exerted for that distinct and avowed purpose, and that purpose only, he did seize upon the public treasure, and dispose of it according to his will. He used a lawful weapon to do an illegal and unconstitutional act. This is not difficult to be comprehended. A man has a legal right to use his own walking-stick; yet it is easy to conceive how he may use it illegally. The Senator from Virginia admits that the President almost violated the constitution. "He marched to its verge." I say he overstepped it.

These are my reasons for thinking and for voting that the executive act of the President in the case referred to, was not in accordance with the constitution and law, but in violation of both; and I care not how lightly the Senator from North Carolina may speak of either the sense or honesty which dictated that opinion and that vote. Language such as his on this occasion falls harmless to the ground, or recoils on him who utters it.

Having proved the statement in the resolution true, the next inquiry is as to our right to spread it on the record. Gentlemen on the side of the administration heap upon the act, in this aspect of it, the terms "shameful," "disgraceful," "flagrant impropriety"—all the epithets of detestation and abhorrence which those diligent gentlemen have been able to collect and amass from our whole vocabulary. But let this pass; it amounts to little. Reproach and violence from those who profess to pass judgment, leaves an intelligent public (to whom is the final appeal) impressed with the conviction that the discretion of the judge was lost in his own passion. They probably will not stop to inquire what has become of his propriety. On the one hand, towards the former majority of the Senate we have vituperation and reproach fit to be cast only on a tenant of Newgate, by a felon like himself; and towards the President tirade upon tirade of fulsome flattery, which would make even a coquette turn sick. Let all this go to the country; a discerning public will see what I see—motives not to be named or avowed, lying deep in the breasts of those who say and do these things—deep, but not hidden, and prompting them, or rather goading them on to the act. As the deed is to be done, I am glad it comes in the form, and is pressed in the spirit and temper which here discloses itself; for, being so done, it will be repudiated as authority, either as to opinion or fact, by every honest and candid mind.

Why was it improper or indelicate to pass this resolution, if the facts and opinions set forth in it be true and correct? Gentlemen say we may not express our opinion of the act, because we may possibly be the triers of the actor. The President might, by possibility, be impeached, and we, as a Senate, would be called upon to try him; therefore, it was indelicate and improper to give an opinion beforehand which might influence our decision hereafter. Now, my answer to this is, that the question of delicacy and propriety here put, is merely of a personal nature, and addresses itself to each individual member rather than to the whole body; for the Senate, as a body, was not committed to any thing by that resolution. Suppose, then, at the time these resolutions passed, with the full knowledge that all of us had of the power of the Executive and the state of parties in the other House; suppose any one here, being asked privately his opinion on the subject, had declined, as a matter of delicacy, to give it, lest he should be committed, in case of an impeachment preferred against the President, which would you have considered it, a serious scruple, or rather an idle jest? The truth is, there is nothing in the point, nor am I able to convince myself that any man ("except under strong political bias") can believe there is any thing in it. As for myself, I knew there was to be no impeachment, and no trial; and my own opinion of propriety and right was then, as it is now, the guide of my own actions. The President had done an act violatory of the constitution, and especially affecting the powers and rights of this body as one of the legislative branches of the Government. What was to be done? Reassert the constitution and the rights of the Senate by law? The executive veto was ready to give a quietus to every law which you might have attempted to pass. He had possessed himself of the public treasure, and you could pass no law to wrest it from his hands. What was to be done? Be calm, say gentlemen; be quiet; make no disturbance; it is quite startling; but say nothing; the country can stand it; and perhaps, if you are silent and patient under this, the President may commit no more acts of violence; but, if you irritate, he may do still worse things. They therefore would have recommended silence and submission.

The Senate, as a legislative body, has the right to assert its own powers by virtue of that first of nature's laws, self-preservation. A body composed of numerous members can speak only by some prescribed form, such as an order or resolution; and as, in this case, their constitutional powers were assailed, it was their duty, their solemn duty, to reassert them, that the invasion might not stand without objection or contradiction, and thus become a binding precedent in future times.

The resolution of the Senate is also objected to as one couched in terms of censure against the President; it is said to be reproachful in its language and its import. Believing that I have established the position that the resolution is true in point of fact and opinion, and that it was due to the rights of this body, which we were delegated by the States, for the time being, to guard and protect, that we should, in a resolution couched in some language, assert those rights; I now ask any candid man, whether a partisan of the President or not, if he can devise any language, conveying the substance and sense of that resolution, which shall be more decorous and more courteous than that? Can you, sir, convey the idea in milder, more dignified, and more appropriate language? It is true it contains no compliment, no adulation. This the Senator from Pennsylvania has discovered, and therefore condemns it. That gentleman, in reference to the President, uses the word "immaculate," which I never before heard applied to but one created being, and that in worship. This resolution contains no such term, as applied to the President; and I think I would not now, if it were again before the Senate, move to insert the word, even if that would gain for it the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In England, from which we derive our free institutions, and to which we still refer for precedent of parliamentary independence, (God knows how long those examples may be endured,) in England it is not deemed the duty of Parliament to address the King, or to answer his address, in terms only of acquiescence and praise. The British Parliament represents a free people, and they have not forgotten to speak the language of freemen; and did any one ever hear of an attempt in that body to cast reproach upon itself or any of its members, because they ventured in such address to move or to express disapprobation of the acts of their monarch, or to assert their own rights or the rights of the people? It certainly has not been deemed a cause for expunging their journals, that they contain something disagreeable to majesty. There was a time, it is true, as late as the reign of Charles the First, when the King sent into the House of Commons his warrant to arrest and imprison members for words uttered on the floor of Parliament; but that time has gone by. Great Britain, moving in the direction towards freedom and the perfecting of free institutions, has long since passed that point, and we, tending as rapidly towards despotic power, have not yet quite reached it. When we look at British precedents and refer to British history, we ought not to forget that they and we have started at different points, and are moving in different directions. They, beginning with an irregular and almost despotic monarchy, with undefined powers, checked only by the strength of the feudal aristocracy, have marched onwards slowly but steadily, step by step, towards the perfection of a free and representative Government; and perhaps they are still moving onward. We, commencing with a pure constitutional representative Government, with justly balanced powers, have rushed onward with a velocity almost inconceivable towards despotism, if it be decorous to call that despotism which concentrates all the powers of the Government in a single man, and makes his will the law. If, in our different course, we should meet our great archetype, and find, at some one moment of our history, our Government to be what hers is or was, we are not to suppose that our career is thenceforward to be the same. If we meet, we pass with the swiftness of moving engines, so that we can scarcely catch a glance of that which we have met, and from which we are passing.

Mr. President, every thing intrinsic and extrinsic, all that can catch the popular ear or enlist one vulgar passion, no matter how low and base, is resorted to by gentlemen who ought to be, and who are, honorable, to sustain them in the commission of this act. The Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) could you credit it, sir, says that this Senate, which is one of the constitutional departments of our Government, and without which the form as well as the essence of our Government could not exist; that this Senate, of which he himself is a member, and which a common but very homely proverb might teach him he could not dishonor without self-degradation; this Senate, he says, is essentially an aristocratic body, riding upon the backs of the people. Do we hear that here, and from such a source, or was I deceived? Who are they that compose the aristocracy of this body? Men elected by the State to discharge, for a time, an important trust; and who, when that trust is discharged, and the period of their service ended, return again to the common mass from which they were taken? Aristocracy! Where is the danger, where is the possibility, of an aristocratic order rising up in this Union? Look about you everywhere: men who hold the highest stations, and wield the greatest influence, and even wealth, spring from the common ranks of the people. Their power and their influence they cannot transmit; and, as to their wealth, when the hand that gathered and the hand which holds it shall moulder in the dust, it is scattered to the four winds of heaven; it goes to build up and enrich the son of the hard-handed yeoman; and the children's children of him who counted his gold by millions become, not beggars, but common laborers in our streets. Where, then, is the danger of aristocracy in America? There is one source from which it may flow in upon us, and one only. When our public offices become transmissible by the will of the incumbent to his successor; when the men who hold station can direct the line through which the succession to that station shall descend, whether by birth to the son, or by appointment to the favorite, we have, in substance, a monarchy, and we have an aristocracy, in the classic language of the Senator, "riding on the backs of the people;" nay, we have worse, a shameful, corrupt, and corrupting oligarchy.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BURCHANAN) says that the Senate is merely called upon to rejudge its own justice; in other words, to determine whether the opinion it expressed was correct or not. But is this true? Is that the act to which the majority of the Senate is now proceeding? If so, it were but an expression of opinion adverse to opinions heretofore expressed by a former majority, and entirely consistent with gentlemanly intercourse and feeling. But no such thing. No; it is placed, and it is pressed, as a vote of censure and opprobrium upon the former majority. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, it seems, once intended it should assume a form consistent with the courtesy and propriety of legislative bodies. He promised the striking out of the obnoxious word "expunge," and so the resolution was to have passed; and what strong motive, or strong offence, could have induced the Senator to abandon his conciliatory course, and again poison the resolution with insult and reproach? What, think you, could have so driven him from his propriety? Why, truly a Senator from Massachusetts, some two years since, moved to lay the expunging resolution, when so amended, on the table; that was the insult: a motion to lay a resolution on the table is the mighty insult which swells the hearts of gentlemen almost to bursting with patriotic indignation, and which justifies all this harsh and ruthless violence. Hence the word "expunge" in the body of the resolution—hence a recital charged with as harsh and injurious imputation as gentlemen can use towards each other, if not more harsh and more injurious. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he wished to be saved the necessity of compelling the Senate to vote this stigma upon themselves. Who, I ask, gave him, and those with whom he acts, power, and who gave them impunity, to fix stigmas, or compel stigmas, upon men, in all things honorable, their equals at least? Who cares for their stigma or their censure? I, for one, cast them to the winds. I despise, I trample upon them. Sir, since it has been determined that a resolution in any form inconsistent with the resolution of March, 1834, should pass; and since there is at last a majority in the Senate ready to obey the mandate, I am glad once again that it contains substance, and has assumed a form, which will forever destroy it as authority for the future; and when it comes to an issue such as this, veracity, and honor, and character brought into collision, I fear not the issue of the contest, and I care not with what weapons it is waged. All at last results in an appeal to the country and to future times. And if this resolution had been couched in language of decent sobriety; if it had been in its terms calm, dispassionate, and strong, it would, by virtue of the names which support it, have carried with it much weight and authority; but now there is no danger of this; the resolution itself, and the speeches with which it is ushered in, show the spirit by which it is moved. Sir Edward Coke, at a time when he was himself a sycophant, called Sir Walter Raleigh "a spider of hell," because Raleigh was unhappily out of favor with his sovereign; yet, no one at this day esteems Coke the more or Raleigh the less for this outpouring of malignity. Edmund Saunders, in the report of one of his cases at law, says that Twysden (Justice) gave judgment in furore; and he adds, in his quiet manner, "note, reader, his judgment was clearly wrong;" and such has been the universal opinion of the profession since; and such will be the opinion, a priori, of mankind, as to every judicial decision, and every act of a deliberative body, which is the result of passion rather than of reason and judgment.

The majority of the Senate, who are moving on, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, moved on, to the destruction of the journals, ought to consider well the act which they are about to perform. The constitution, which we and they are sworn to support, requires that the Senate shall "keep" a journal of their proceedings; much useless learning was expended upon this word at the last session. We know its meaning without consulting our dictionaries; its popular sense is its true sense. The framers of the constitution did not search books for the definition of the word, but understood it and used it in its plain and obvious sense; and they would have been astonished if it had been told them that that word could ever become the subject of cavil. That it has so, and that it is now the doctrine of the majority that the destruction of the record is no infraction of the constitution, which requires that it shall be kept, is a touchstone by which the value of their judgment against the former majority of the Senate may be tested. It is a matter that every man of plain common sense can understand and decide, as well as the most learned and most wise; and they can, from this specimen, determine how much weight is due to the opinions of men who hold that to erase, to blot out, to expunge, is not inconsistent with the command "to keep," to which command we all have sworn obedience. I will not touch the miserable sophistry by which gentlemen attempt to evade the meaning and wrest the sense of this provision of the constitution: it does not merit a reply.

The constitution of Pennsylvania is substantially copied, in this particular, from the Constitution of the United States; like that, it contains a provision that both Houses shall keep a journal. The Senator from Pennsylvania, many years ago, while a member of one branch of that Legislature, moved a resolution declaring that it was a violation of the constitution to expunge any thing from the journal once entered there. He is of the same opinion still; and he proposes to be consistent, and yet vote for expunging what is entered on the journals of this body, under a precisely similar constitutional provision. Could any man, who had not heard him, conjecture how this could be done? The word expunge has, he says, a literal, and it has also a metaphorical meaning; and the records of the Senate are to be expunged metaphorically. What a farce, if its atrocity would permit us to look upon it as a subject of ridicule! But who could avoid smiling, even in the midst of bitterness, to see the array of authorities which the erudite Senator adduced to show that the word "expunge" is used metaphorically in cases where it cannot have a literal application? He has shown us examples in which good writers speak of expunging forms of government, systems of religion, and the vices of men—all clearly metaphorical, and known at once to be so, because they are not susceptible of the literal and physical application of the term. You cannot draw a black line over, nor can you draw black lines round, a "form of government," for you cannot touch it or handle it, though you may mar its symmetry and destroy its strength; nor can you take physical, tangible hold of systems of religion or of human vices; hence the terms you apply to them are necessarily metaphorical, whether you expunge, uproot, or demolish them. But if you expunge a writing which is on paper, or uproot a tree or shrub, or demolish a building, the words then have their literal meaning, capable only of literal, physical application; and he who pretends to use it under those circumstances metaphorically, wrests the word from its true use, and gives it a false application. Expunge metaphorically! The disquisition of the learned gentleman reminds me of the death of two doughty heroes in a fatal battle, commemorated in the "Rape of the Lock"—

"One died in metaphor, and one in song."

It will be seen at once that the thought is much better in a burlesque poem than in grave debate on the floor of the Senate.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania has spread cheering prospects before us; a bright vista, opening amid the surrounding gloom, to delight our vision. This, he says, is the last exciting subject that is to agitate our councils; we are to have a halcyon season; all is to be, henceforth, quiet, and kindness, and peace. But he has not told us how these things are to be brought to pass; whether this is the last act of violence that is to be perpetrated by the majority against the constitution of their country and the rights of this body; or whether he supposes that, by this, the spirit of liberty is to be crushed, and we are to be awed to silence and submission. I will suppose the first, as it better accords with the kindness which he still entertains for those whose rights and feelings he has most outraged; and if so, his language may be rendered into brief, plain English, thus: Gentlemen, be quiet and be calm; meet us with no arguments, and cast on us no reproaches; the President must be gratified, because he is immaculate; and you must be stigmatized, because you have offended him. We may be somewhat harsh and unscrupulous, but excuse us, for we are very much excited; but this is the last time we will do an act of lawless violence against you; all shall be, henceforth, justice and peace.

I should be gratified to know that the Senator from Pennsylvania has that power over the political elements which he seems to claim, in giving us this strong assurance of their future quiet. Would that we could rely upon his promise or his prediction; but no, he is deceived. Those who have abandoned the standard of the constitution and the law, cannot, when they choose, rear it again, and rally the hosts around it, and calm their fears, and reanimate their confidence. They cannot lay their hands upon the institutions of their country, and pull down and destroy, until they themselves shall be satisfied, and then bid the work of mischief cease. When the ocean is lashed into a rage, no matter who are the spirits of the storm, they cannot say to it, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." No, he is deceived; there are other powers in motion below and around him, which he wists not of, and whose might he can neither direct nor resist. I have stood upon the borders of this mighty ocean, and noted the precursors of the coming storm. I have heard the moan of the waves in the caverns of the deep, and seen the upheaving of the billows, which will rise, and rage, and toss, as foam from their crest, him and those who are now his trust and his strength.

Mr. President, I envy not the triumph of him who has pressed forward these resolutions, against the opinions, and the feelings, and the consciences, of those whom he has found means to compel to their support—resolutions which he has urged on with passions—fierce, vindictive furious. Still less do I envy the condition of those who are compelled to go onward, against all those feelings and motives which should direct the actions of the legislator and the man. Why do I see around me so many pale features and downcast eyes, unless it be that repentance and remorse go hand in hand with the perpetration of the deed? I had rather stand with the minority; yes, I would rather a thousand times stand alone, powerless but conscience-free, than to wield the strength of an empire, on the hard conditions on which it is placed in their hands.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

But this scene is passing, and will soon have passed, not to be recalled—the deed is to be done, and you and we must submit our acts to an enlightened public, whose judgment will be a foretaste of the judgment of posterity. To these I bow with submission and hope, but not with unwavering confidence of the future. The fame of those who have joined in this struggle for the constitution depends upon the final success of constitutional government. If that prevail and endure, if the clouds that overshadow its prospects pass away, and it be restored to what it once was, in all its freshness and beauty, every thing that we could desire for ourselves and our country is attained. But if we still move on in the downward course, if the cataract only be passed, and we are to glide on in the smooth but rapid current into the gulf to which we have been tending, and are never to return, these struggles will be referred to hereafter as scenes in which the country was disturbed by violent and factious spirits, and the names of those who stood for the constitution amid these stormy scenes will be mentioned only with censure and reproach. So it has been in times past. When the last spark of Roman liberty was extinguished, and a monarch's court and council occupied the forum and the Senate chamber, when no voice but that of Augustus was heard, and no power but his was known, the venal flatterers of his court vied with each other in heaping praise on him, and censure and reproach on those firm spirits who stood for their country to the last, and were at last buried in its ruins. Cæsar, by his power and clemency, had subjugated a world; all but the dark and unbending soul of Cato. In an event such as this, (which Heaven avert,) let the little band to which it is my pride to belong, share in the reproach as they share in the spirit of the last of the Romans—that spirit which scorns to bow before any earthly power, save that of their country and its laws.

Protest of the Senators from Massachusetts.

The debate having closed, and the question being about to be taken, Mr. WEBSTER rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Upon the truth and justice of the original resolution of the Senate, and upon the authority of the Senate to pass that resolution, I had an opportunity to express my opinions at a subsequent period, when the President's protest was before us. Those opinions remain altogether unchanged.

And now, had the constitution secured the privilege of entering a PROTEST on the journal, I should not say one word on this occasion; although, if what is now proposed shall be accomplished, I know not what would have been the value of such a provision, however formally or carefully it might have been inserted in the body of that instrument.

But, as there is no such constitutional privilege, I can only effect my purpose by thus adressing the Senate; and I rise, therefore, to make that PROTEST in this manner, in the face of the Senate, and in the face of the country, which I cannot present in any other form.

I speak in my own behalf, and in behalf of my colleague; we both speak as Senators from the State of Massachusetts, and, as such, we solemnly PROTEST against this whole proceeding.

We deny that Senators from other States have any power or authority to expunge any vote or votes, which we have given here, and which we have recorded, agreeably to the express provision of the constitution.

We have a high personal interest, and the State whose representatives we are, has also a high interest in the entire preservation of every part and parcel of the record of our conduct, as members of the Senate.

This record the constitution solemnly declares shall be kept; but the resolution before the Senate declares that this record shall be expunged.

Whether subterfuge and evasion, and, as it appears to us, the degrading mockery of drawing black lines upon the journal, shall or shall not leave our names and our votes legible, when this violation of the record shall have been completed, still the terms "to expunge" and the terms "to keep," when applied to a record, import ideas exactly contradictory; as much so as the terms "to preserve" and the terms "to destroy."

A record which is expunged, is not a record which is kept, any more than a record which is destroyed can be a record which is preserved. The part expunged is no longer part of the record; it has no longer a legal existence. It cannot be certified as a part of the proceeding of the Senate for any purpose of proof or evidence.

The object of the provision in the constitution, as we think, most obviously is, that the proceedings of the Senate shall be preserved, in writing, not for the present only, not until published only, because a copy of the printed journal is not regular legal evidence; but preserved indefinitely; preserved, as other records are preserved, till destroyed by time or accident.

Every one must see that matters of the highest importance depend on the permanent preservation of the journals of the two Houses. What but the journals show that bills have been regularly passed into laws, through the several stages; what but the journal shows who are members, or who is President, or Speaker, or Secretary, or Clerk, of the body? What but the journal contains the proof, necessary for the justification of those who act under our authority, and who, without the power of producing such proof, must stand as trespassers? What but the journals show who is appointed, and who rejected, by us, on the President's nomination; or who is acquitted, or who convicted, in trials on impeachment? In short, is there, at any time, any other regular and legal proof of any act done by the Senate than the journal itself?

The idea, therefore, that the Senate is bound to preserve its journal only until it is published, and then may alter, mutilate, or destroy it at pleasure, appears to us one of the most extraordinary sentiments ever advanced.

We are deeply grateful to those friends who have shown, with so much clearness, that all the precedents relied on to justify or to excuse this proceeding, are either not to the purpose, or, from the times and circumstances at and under which they happened, are no way entitled to respect in a free Government existing under a written constitution. But, for ourselves, we stand on the plain words of that constitution itself. A thousand precedents elsewhere made, whether ancient or modern, can neither rescind, nor control, nor explain away, these words.

The words are, "each House shall KEEP a journal of its proceedings." No gloss, no ingenuity, no specious interpretation, and much less can any fair or just reasoning, reconcile the process of expunging with the plain meaning of these words to the satisfaction of the common sense and honest understanding of mankind.

If the Senate may now expunge one part of the journal of a former session, it may, with equal authority, expunge another part, or the whole. It may expunge the entire record of any one session, or of all sessions.

It seems to us inconceivable how any men can regard such a power, and its exercise at pleasure, as consistent with the injunction of the constitution. It can make no difference what is the completeness or incompleteness of the act of expunging, or by what means done, whether by erasure, obliteration, or defacement; if by defacement, as here proposed, whether one word or many words are written on the face of the record; whether little ink or much ink is shed on the paper; or whether some part, or the whole, of the original written journal may yet by possibility be traced. If the act done be an act to expunge, to blot out, obliterate, to erase the record, then the record is expunged, blotted out, obliterated, and erased. And mutilation and alteration violate the record as much as obliteration or erasure. A record, subsequently altered, is not the original record. It no longer gives a just account of the proceedings of the Senate. It is no longer true. It is, in short, no journal of the real and actual proceedings of the Senate, such as the constitution says each House shall keep.

The constitution, therefore, is, in our deliberate judgment, violated by this proceeding in the most plain and open manner.

The constitution, moreover, provides that the yeas and nays, on any question, shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. This provision, most manifestly, gives a personal right to those members who may demand it, to the entry and preservation of their votes on the record of the proceedings of the body, not for one day or one year only, but for all time. There the yeas and nays are to stand, forever, as permanent and lasting proof of the manner in which members have voted on great and important questions before them.

But it is now insisted that the votes of members, taken by yeas and nays, and thus entered on the journal, as matter of right, may still be expunged; so that that, which it requires more than four-fifths of the Senators to prevent from being put on the journal, may, nevertheless, be struck off, and erased, the next moment, or at any period afterwards, by the will of a mere majority; or, if this be not admitted, then the absurdity is adopted of maintaining that this provision of the constitution is fulfilled by merely preserving the yeas and nays on the journal, after having expunged and obliterated the very resolution, or the very question, on which they were given, and to which alone they refer; leaving the yeas and nays thus a mere list of names, connected with no subject, no question, no vote. We put it to the impartial judgment of mankind, if this proceeding be not, in this respect also, directly and palpably inconsistent with the constitution.

We protest, in the most solemn manner, that other Senators have no authority to deprive us of our personal rights, secured to us by the constitution, either by expunging, or obliterating, or mutilating, or defacing, the record of our votes, duly entered by yeas and nays; or by expunging and obliterating the resolutions or questions on which those votes were given and recorded.

We have seen, with deep and sincere pain, the Legislatures of respectable States instructing the Senators of those States to vote for and support this violation of the journal of the Senate; and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief, and entire conviction, that most, if not all these proceedings of States, had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been urgently requested and insisted on as being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the executive branch of this Government which has brought the Legislatures of so many of the free States of this Union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties, for the purpose of co-operating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitutional, so derogatory to the character of the Senate, and marked with so broad an impression of compliance with power.

But this resolution is to pass. We expect it. That cause, which has been powerful enough to influence so many State Legislatures, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here.

We make up our minds to behold the spectacle which is to ensue.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

We collect ourselves to look on, in silence, while a scene is exhibited which, if we did not regard it as ruthless violation of a sacred instrument, would appear to us to be little elevated above the character of a contemptible farce.

The scene we shall behold, and hundreds of American citizens, as many as may crowd into these lobbies and galleries, will behold it also: with what feelings, I do not undertake to say.

But we PROTEST, we most solemnly PROTEST, against the substance and against the manner of this proceeding, against its object, against its form, and against its effect. We tell you that you have no right to mar or mutilate the record of our votes given here, and recorded according to the constitution; we tell you that you may as well erase the yeas and nays on any other question or resolution, or on all questions and resolutions, as on this; we tell you that you have just as much right to falsify the record, by so altering it as to make us appear to have voted, on any question, as we did not vote, as you have to erase a record, and make that page a blank, in which our votes, as they were actually given and recorded, now stand. The one proceeding, as it appears to us, is as much a falsification of the record as the other.

Having made this PROTEST, our duty is performed. We rescue our own names, character, and honor, from all participation in this matter; and whatever the wayward character of the times, the headlong and plunging spirit of party devotion, or the fear or the love of power, may have been able to bring about elsewhere, we desire to thank God that they have not, as yet, overcome the love of liberty, fidelity to true republican principles, and a sacred regard for the constitution, in that State whose soil was drenched, to a mire, by the first and best blood of the Revolution. Massachusetts, as yet, has not been conquered; and while we have the honor to hold seats here as her Senators, we shall never consent to a sacrifice either of her rights, or our own; we shall never fail to oppose what we regard as a plain and open violation of the constitution of the country; and we should have thought ourselves wholly unworthy of her if we had not, with all the solemnity and earnestness in our power, PROTESTED against the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, as amended,

MR. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

He then moved that the blanks in the resolution be filled by inserting the 16th day of January. It was agreed to; and, having been done,

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on the adoption of the resolution in the following form:

Resolution to expunge from the journal the resolution of the Senate of March 28, 1834, in relation to President Jackson and the removal of the deposits.

Whereas, on the 26th day of December, in the year 1833, the following resolve was moved by the Senate:

"Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his own sense of duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which proposed resolve was altered and changed by the mover thereof, on the 28th day of March, in the year 1834, so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That, in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposit of the public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which resolve, so changed and modified by the mover thereof, on the same day and year last mentioned, was further altered, so as to read in these words:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both;"

In which last-mentioned form the said resolve, on the same day and year last mentioned, was adopted by the Senate, and became the act and judgment of that body, and, as such, now remains upon the journal thereof:

And whereas the said resolve was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregularly and illegally adopted by the Senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belonged to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice; because President Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him, as a violator of his oath of office, and of the laws and constitution, which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial, or the means of defence:

And whereas the said resolve, in all its various shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and therefore unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unauthorized by the constitution; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then or can now be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people:

And whereas the said resolve, as adopted, was uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue; without specifying what part of the executive proceedings, or what part of the public revenue, was intended to be referred to; or what parts of the laws and constitution were supposed to have been infringed; or in what part of the Union, or at what period of his administration, these late proceedings were supposed to have taken place; thereby putting each Senator at liberty to vote in favor of the resolve upon a separate and secret reason of his own, and leaving the ground of the Senate's judgment to be guessed at by the public, and to be differently and diversely interrupted by individual Senators, according to the private and particular understanding of each: contrary to all the ends of justice, and to all the forms of legal or judicial proceedings; to the great prejudice of the accused, who could not know against what to defend himself; and to the loss of senatorial responsibility, by shielding Senators from public accountability for making up a judgment upon grounds which the public cannot know, and which, if known, might prove insufficient in law, or unfounded in fact:

And whereas the specification contained in the first and second forms of the resolve having been objected to in debate, and shown to be insufficient to sustain the charges they were adduced to support, and it being well believed that no majority could be obtained to vote for the said specifications, and the same having been actually withdrawn by the mover, in the face of the whole Senate, in consequence of such objection and belief, and before any vote taken thereupon; the said specifications could not afterwards be admitted by any rule of parliamentary practice, or by any principle of legal implication, secret intendment, or mental reservation, to remain and continue a part of the written and public resolve from which they were thus withdrawn; and, if they could be so admitted, they would not be sufficient to sustain the charges therein contained:

And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and the constitution, the adoption of the said resolve, before any impeachment preferred by the House, was a breach of the privileges of the House; not warranted by the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate; and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence:

And whereas the temperate, respectful, and argumentative defence and protest of the President against the aforesaid proceeding of the Senate was rejected and repulsed by that body, and was voted to be a breach of its privileges, and was not permitted to be entered on its journal or printed among its documents, while all memorials, petitions, resolves, and remonstrances, against the President, however violent or unfounded and calculated to inflame the people against him, were duly and honorably received, economically commented upon in speeches, read at the table, ordered to be printed with the long list of names attached, referred to the Finance Committee for consideration, filed away among the public archives, and now constitute a part of the public documents of the Senate, to be handed down to the latest posterity:

And whereas the said resolve was introduced, debated, and adopted at a time and under circumstances which had the effect of co-operating with the Bank of the United States in the parricidal attempt which that institution was then making to produce a panic and pressure in the country; to destroy the confidence of the people in President Jackson, to paralyze his administration; to govern the elections; to bankrupt the State banks; ruin their currency; fill the whole Union with terror and distress; and thereby to extort from the sufferings and the alarms of the people the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of its charter:

And whereas the said resolve is of evil example and dangerous precedent, and should never have been received, debated, or adopted by the Senate, or admitted to entry upon its journal: Wherefore,

Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the journal; and, for that purpose, that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session 1833-'34 into the Senate, and, in the presence of the Senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: "Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

On agreeing to this resolution, the vote was as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON, observing that nothing now remained but for the Secretary to carry into effect the order of the Senate, moved that that be forthwith done.

The Secretary thereupon produced the record of the Senate, and, opening it at the page which contained the resolution to be expunged, did, in the presence of such of the members of the Senate as remained, (many having retired,) proceed to draw black lines entirely round the resolution, and to indorse across the lines the words "Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, 1837."

No sooner had this been done, than hisses, loud and repeated, were heard from various parts of the gallery.

The CHAIR, (Mr. KING, of Alabama.) Clear the galleries.

Mr. BENTON. I hope the galleries will not be cleared, as many innocent persons will be excluded, who have been guilty of no violation of order. Let the ruffians who have made the disturbance alone be apprehended. I hope the Sergeant-at-arms will be directed to enter the gallery, and seize the ruffians, ascertaining who they are in the best way he can. Let him apprehend them, and bring them to the bar of the Senate. Let him seize the bank ruffians. I hope that they will not now be suffered to insult the Senate, as they did when it was under the power of the Bank of the United States, when ruffians, with arms upon them, insulted us with impunity. Let them be taken and brought to the bar of the Senate. Here is one just above me, that may easily be identified—the bank ruffians!

The order to clear the galleries was revoked, and the Sergeant-at-arms directed to proceed into the galleries and apprehend the persons who had created the disorder. In a very few minutes the Sergeant-at-arms returned, and reported to the Chair that he had apprehended an individual, and had him in custody.

Mr. BENTON moved that he be brought to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the motion, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered and taken, stood—yeas 17, nays 8. So the motion was carried.

It was suggested by Mr. MOORE that there was not a quorum present, and the Chair at first so decided. But, on being reminded that one of the Senators from Louisiana had resigned, 25 was a majority of the 49 remaining, he declared that a quorum was present.

Mr. MOORE now moved an adjournment; but the motion was lost.

The Sergeant-at-arms now produced and presented an individual at the bar of the Senate.

[He was a tall, well-dressed man, wrapped in a black overcoat.]

Mr. BENTON said that, as the individual had been taken from among the respectable audience in the gallery, and had been presented in this public manner with all eyes fixed upon him, he had perhaps been sufficiently punished in his feelings. Mr. B. was not disposed to push the proceedings any further, and therefore moved that he be discharged from custody.

Mr. MORRIS considered the whole proceeding as very extraordinary. If the individual had been worthy of arrest, he ought to have an opportunity of defence. A citizen had been brought to the bar of the Senate, and not informed for what reason, nor of what offence he stood charged; and now it was moved that, without a hearing, he be discharged from custody. Call you this (said Mr. M.) the justice of the Senate of the United States? Is it in this manner that citizens are to be treated? It appears to me a most extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. SEVIER moved an adjournment; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON, near whose seat the person apprehended then stood, proposed that the individual have an opportunity to purge himself by oath from the contempt. The Senate were not to presume him guilty; and if he was willing to swear that he intended no contempt, he ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MORRIS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for his discharge; and they were ordered accordingly.

Mr. BENTON observed that if the individual was ready to go to the Clerk's table, and there, by oath, to purge himself of the contempt, he had no objection. Let him do so.

Mr. ROBINSON now stated, on behalf of the person apprehended, that he was willing and ready to answer interrogatories.

Mr. BENTON thereupon withdrew his motion for his discharge.

The CHAIR reminded him that he could not do this, inasmuch as the yeas and nays upon it had been ordered.

Mr. MORRIS was strongly opposed to having the individual suddenly, without warning, and without opportunity to consult counsel, brought forward to take his oath, and undergo interrogatories. It would be better to give him until to-morrow, that he might have some leisure for reflection. He had been brought up here before the Senate of the United States, and before the people of the United States, and to require him thus suddenly to be put upon oath in his defence was wrong.

He concluded by moving an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STRANGE thought that if the individual was willing now to be sworn, and to undergo interrogatories, he was certainly the best judge of his own rights. He best knew what he could undergo, and there was no need that Senators should become his advocates.

Mr. BENTON said that if the man wished to purge himself on oath, now, here, in the presence of the Senate, it was very well. Let him do so. But if he wanted to go away and consult a lawyer, if he must ask a lawyer to-morrow before he could tell whether he meant to insult the Senate to-night, he was opposed to it. If he was ready to swear, let him do it, but no consulting with lawyers.

The CHAIR stated to Mr. MORRIS that the individual in custody was not brought up without a charge, as that Senator seemed to intimate. He was charged with disorderly conduct in the presence of the Senate, and the law gave the Senate, as it gave a court of justice, power to protect itself in all such cases, by a summary proceeding, and on the evidence of its own senses.

Mr. ROBINSON again said that the individual in custody wished for an opportunity of purging himself from the contempt.

Some confusion prevailed. But the motion for his discharge being pressed, the question was put, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—23.

NAY.—Mr. Wall—1.

The individual was accordingly discharged from custody.

The individual referred to thereupon addressed, and, addressing the Chair, said:

“Mr. President, am I not to be permitted to speak in my own defence?”

The CHAIR, to the Sergeant-at-arms: "Take him out!"

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 17.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

MR. KENT, having presented a memorial from the grand jury of Washington county, protesting against the interference of citizens from distant States in respect to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, moved that it be laid on the table and printed.

MR. MORRIS said that he had hundreds of petitions to present for the abolition of salvery; and, therefore, he would ask for the yeas and nays on the question of printing the memorial which had just been presented. Not ordered.

MR. HUBBARD suggested to the Senator from Maryland, (MR. KENT,) whether it would not be as well to print an extra number of copies of this important document, for the purpose of distribution, as it might be productive of good.

MR. CALHOUN said that he would make that motion. It was a most important paper, and there was one part of it at which he most heartily rejoiced. It took the true position—that abolition petitions should not be received. There was a dangerous and mischievous spirit at work in various parts of the country, connected with this question. It was only at the last session that he had contended for what the memorialists suggest to Congress. He had urged that very point, and he found himself in a very considerable minority. He hoped that such would not be the case now he was supporting this motion. He would second the motion of the Senator from Ohio, trusting that he would renew it, and be indulged with the yeas and nays.

MR. HUBBARD remarked that he had suggested to the Senator the printing of an extra number, not on account of his own feelings particularly, but because he believed the proceedings of individuals in different parts of the country on this subject were predicated upon the supposed fact that the people living in the District of Columbia were in favor of the abolition of slavery from among them.

MR. NILES said that the question was not whether petitioners in general stood upon a somewhat different ground from the present residents in the District of Columbia, but whether the subject-matter was proper for Congress to entertain, even so far as to print a petition which might operate on public sentiment. For his own part, he wished that Congress would act decidedly on this agitating topic. He had no doubt that these petitioners had a deep interest in what they requested. But, nevertheless, the question was the same as respected both classes of petitioners, and was one which Congress could not go into at all. When the subject was not at present discussed by the public, and when it was desirable that tranquillity should be preserved, why, he asked, should the Senate of the United States agitate the question now? He recollected perfectly well, that at the last session the gentleman from South Carolina went so far as to protest against the reception of a single petition, though, to be sure, coming from those not having the same interest as the gentleman whose memorial was now before the Senate, but still such an interest as gave them a right to come here. The rule in regard to the right of petition must apply equally and fairly, and give no preference to one portion of the community over another. He was, then, he must say, altogether opposed to printing the memorial, and should vote against the adoption of that course. The printing of an extra number of copies would produce no good effect, but, on the contrary, would cause the subject to be again agitated in various parts of the Union. His honorable friend (MR. HUBBARD) seemed to think that by the distribution of the memorial a good effect might be produced on the public mind. He could not agree with him on that point, and must repeat that the subject was one which Congress ought not to entertain, inasmuch as it was not proper that they should act on one side of the question and not on the other.

MR. BROWN said he intended to vote against the extra number. If he were to vote to print an extraordinary number of the memorial sent here by the grand jury, it would imply that there was some danger of Congress being about to legislate on the subject. - He repeated that should an extra number be ordered, the idea would be spread abroad, and reasons given to suspect, that Congress intended to act in the matter. Now, as he did not believe that there was the slightest ground for any such apprehension, as no such action was entertained by either branch of the National Legislature, he was utterly averse to do any act which had a tendency to create that idea. But, besides that, it did appear to him somewhat novel to ask for the printing of an extraordinary number of a document coming from private individuals.

Undoubtedly, the proper course of gentlemen was, not to do any act here which would promote agitation. Now, he contended that the printing of the document in question, and the dissemination of it throughout the country, did, in some degree, tend to increase the agitation in reference to this question.

Why, then, he would ask, should the Senate of the United States lend its sanction to a course which would induce the country to believe that it purposed acting on the subject of slavery? There being no ground to apprehend any such movement on the part of Congress, he would do nothing to lend his sanction to the supposition that Congress intended to interfere with the matter.

MR. LINN said he would be pleased to know whether any practical benefits were likely to grow out of circulating, by order of the Senate, copies of the document now proposed to be printed. What, he asked, was the proper remedy for the evil of which the people of the District of Columbia complained, and concerning which they had directed the attention of Congress? Was their property in danger? Were the laws insufficient to protect their slaves? If so, let us then march directly up to the subject, and enact such as will afford ample security. For measures of a practical nature, he would give his vote with great pleasure. He said he was well aware that questions of this kind came up here, and incidentally impressed persons at a distance with the idea that Congress wished to deprive them of the right to be heard here, and of the right to petition. Nothing, in his opinion, was more erroneous. Refuse to receive and hear an abolition petition, and you render the abolitionists a thousand times more active and industrious in propagating their doctrines, and more successful in enlisting the sympathies in their favor of those who believe in the inherent right of the people to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. He never had voted, nor never would vote, for the printing and disseminating an abolition memorial; so likewise he would not lend his aid for the printing of this document in favor of slavery.

On the great question of slavery, the constitution and laws would find ample support in the good sense of the great body of the American people. He gave it as his opinion, that to insure tranquillity, was to let this exciting topic alone.

Mr. MORRIS renewed his motion for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And the question was then taken on printing the usual number of copies—yeas 34, nays 5.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, appeared and took his seat.

THURSDAY, January 19.

Hon. THOMAS CLAYTON, Senator elect from the State of Delaware, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate dated the 16th instant, I transmit a copy and a translation of a letter addressed to me on the 4th of July last, by the President of the Mexican Republic, and a copy of my reply to the same on the 4th of September. No other communication on the subject of the resolution referred to has been made to the Executive by any other foreign Government, or by any person claiming to act in behalf of Mexico.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1837.

[TRANSLATION.]

The President of the Mexican Republic to the President of the United States.

COLUMBIA, (IN TEXAS,) July 4, 1836.

MUCH ESTEEMED SIR: In fulfilment of the duties which patriotism and honor impose upon a public man, I came to this country at the head of six thousand Mexicans. The chances of war, made inevitable by circumstances, reduced me to the condition of a prisoner, in which I still remain, as you may have already learned. The disposition evinced by General Samuel Houston, the commander-in-chief of the Texian army, and by his successor, General Thomas J. Rusk, for the termination of the war, the decision of the President and cabinet of Texas in favor of a proper compromise between the contending parties, and my own conviction, produced the conventions of which I send you copies enclosed, and the orders given by me to General Filisola, my second in command, to retire from the river Brazos, where he was posted, to the other side of the river Bravo del Norte.

As there was no doubt that General Filisola would religiously comply, so far as concerned himself, the President and cabinet agreed that I should set off for Mexico, in order to fulfil the other engagements; and, with that intent, I embarked on board the schooner Invincible, which was to carry me to the port of Vera Cruz. Unfortunately, however, some indiscreet persons raised a mob, which obliged the authorities to have me landed by force, and brought back into strict captivity. This incident has prevented me from going to Mexico, where I should otherwise have arrived early in last month; and, in consequence of it, the Government of that country, doubtless ignorant of what has occurred, has withdrawn the command of the army from General Filisola, and has ordered his successor, General Urrea, to continue its operations. In obedience to which order, that general is, according to the latest accounts, already at the river Nueces. In vain have some reflecting and worthy men endeavored to demonstrate the necessity of moderation, and of my going to Mexico, according to the convention; but the excitement of the public mind has increased with the return of the Mexican army to Texas. Such is the state of things here at present. The continuation of the war, and of its disasters, is therefore inevitable, unless the voice of reason be heard, in proper time, from the mouth of some powerful individual. It appears to me that you, sir, have it in your power to perform this good office, by interfering in favor of the execution of the said convention, which shall be strictly fulfilled on my part. When I offered to treat with this Government, I was convinced that it was useless for Mexico to continue the war. I have acquired exact information respecting this country, which I did not possess four months ago. I have too much zeal for the interests of my country to wish for any thing which is not compatible with them. Being always ready to sacrifice myself for its glory and advantage, I never would have hesitated to subject myself to torments or death, rather than consent to any compromise, if Mexico could thereby have obtained the slightest benefit. I am firmly convinced that it is proper to terminate this question by political negotiation: that conviction alone determined me sincerely to agree to what has been stipulated; and, in the same spirit, I make to you this frank declaration. Be pleased, sir, to favor me by a like confidence on your part; afford me the satisfaction of avoiding approaching evils, and of contributing to that good which my heart advises. Let us enter into negotiations by which the friendship between your nation and the Mexican may be strengthened, both being amicably engaged in giving being and stability to a people who are desirous of appearing in the political world; and who, under the protection of the two nations, will attain its object within a few years.

The Mexicans are magnanimous when treated with consideration. I will clearly set before them the proper and humane reasons which require noble and frank conduct on their part, and I doubt not that they will act thus as soon as they have been convinced.

By what I have here submitted, you will see the sentiments which animate me; and with which I remain your most humble and obedient servant,

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

To his Excellency General ANDREW JACKSON,
President of the United States of America.

The President of the United States to the President of the Mexican Republic.

HERMITAGE, September 4, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th of July last, which has been forwarded to me by General Samuel Houston, under cover of one from him, transmitted by an express from General Gaines, who is in command of the United States forces on the Texian frontier. The great object of these communications appears to be, to put an end to the disasters which necessarily attend the civil war now raging in Texas, and asking the interposition of the United States in furthering so humane and desirable a purpose. That any well-intended effort of yours in aid of this object should have been defeated, is calculated to excite the regret of all who justly appreciate the blessings of peace, and who take an interest in the causes which contribute to the prosperity of Mexico, in her domestic as well as her foreign relations.

The Government of the United States is ever anxious to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations. But it proceeds on the principle that all nations have the right to alter, amend, or change, their own Government, as the sovereign power, the people, may direct. In this respect, it never interferes with the policy of other powers, nor can it permit any on the part of others with its internal policy. Consistently with this principle, whatever we can do to restore peace between contending nations, or remove the causes of misunderstanding, is cheerfully at the service of those who are willing to rely upon our good offices as a friend or mediator.

In reference, however, to the agreement which you, as the representative of Mexico, have made with Texas, and which invites the interposition of the United States, you will at once see that we are forbidden, by the character of the communications made to us through the Mexican minister, from considering it. That Government has notified us that, as long as you are a prisoner, no act of yours will be regarded as binding by the Mexican authorities. Under these circumstances, it will be manifest to you that good faith to Mexico, as well as the general principle to which I have adverted, as forming the basis of our intercourse with all foreign powers, make it impossible for me to take any step like that you have anticipated. If, however, Mexico should signify her willingness to avail herself of our good offices in bringing about the desirable result you have described, nothing could give me more pleasure than to devote my best services to it. To be instrumental in terminating the evils of civil war, and in substituting in their stead the blessings of peace, is a divine privilege. Every Government, and the people of all countries, should feel it their highest happiness to enjoy an opportunity of thus manifesting their love of each other, and their interest in the general principles which apply to them all as members of the common family of man.

Your letter, and that of General Houston, commander-in-chief of the Texian army, will be made the basis of an early interview with the Mexican minister at Washington. They will hasten my return to Washington, to which place I will set out in a few days, expecting to reach it by the 1st of October. In the meantime, I hope Mexico and Texas, feeling that war is the greatest of calamities, will pause before another campaign is undertaken, and can add to the number of those scenes of bloodshed which have already marked the progress of their contest, and have given so much pain to their Christian friends throughout the world.

This is sent under cover to General Houston, who will give it a safe conveyance to you.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To Gen. ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

The Message and documents having been read,

Mr. PRESTON said it would strike the Senate at once that since the date of the letter written by Santa Anna, his situation had been very much changed. On the 4th of July last he was a prisoner in the hands of the Texans, but had been subsequently released, and was now in the city of Washington. According to the terms and purport of the correspondence, it would appear that it was carried on whilst Santa Anna was a prisoner. The President of the United States, aware of that fact, had expressed himself as being unable, in consequence, to enter into any negotiation with him while so situated. But now, as he (Mr. P.) had just stated, Santa Anna was in this city, and could negotiate on the subject up to April next; but whether he would or would not, he (Mr. P.) could not say; nor was it very material to the purpose Mr. P. had in hand. There was a resolution in relation to Texas offered a few days ago by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and which had been made the order of the day for to-day; what disposition he wished to make of it, he was not aware. It was a matter for the gentleman's discretion. The correspondence which had been laid before the Senate, however, would not, in his (Mr. P.'s) opinion, render it necessary to change the language of the resolution. Concurring, as he did, with that resolution, he would now say that he was prepared to establish the fact, that upon the recognized principles of national law, the practice of this Government, and the policy of the country, she ought, as was her duty, to make a prompt, speedy, and absolute recognition of the independence of Texas. He hoped, at the proper time, to be able to prove this. He insisted that her independence should be immediately acknowledged, and that, too, without any regard to what might be said or done by Santa Anna, for his authority had ceased in Texas forever. After having heard read the present and the other Message of the President in relation to this subject, it was not his desire that any thing should be done here in reference to it, that would have the effect of contravening, running counter to, or obstructing, any purpose of the Executive of the United States.

He (Mr. P.) had understood that the President, when he sent his former Message, had submitted this matter to Congress for their consideration, being willing to carry into effect what they might deem right and proper; but there were, at that time, some difficulties in the way, which prevented his recommending the adoption of any legislation on the subject. It seemed to him (said Mr. P.) that had the President of the United States not been aware of the fact that another expedition under General Bravo was about to invade Texas, he would not have hesitated to recommend to Congress to do something in reference to settling the war between Texas and Mexico.

Mr. P. adverted to the circumstances connected with the failure of the expedition under General Bravo, and then concluded with saying that all he desired was that Congress should proceed as early as possible to discuss the question of immediately acknowledging the independence of Texas. She was entitled to it; she had a right to demand it of the United States, and the sooner it was granted the better. He would await the action of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. DAVIS,) as well as the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, when he would have something further to say on the subject.

The Message and documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY, January 21.

Foreign Emigrants.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Wirtsborough, Sullivan county, New York, and he asked that it might be read.

The document was accordingly read, and proved to be a kind of remonstrance, on the subject of Roman Catholic emigrants to the country, brought in under the auspices of Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, &c. It insisted on the impropriety and inexpediency of allowing so many persons to enter the country, whose practice and tenets were avowedly and directly hostile to our republican institutions, and especially prayed Congress to institute commissions, in various parts of the country, to procure information and report on the subject.

Mr. C. said some of the objects prayed for this Government had no power to grant, however alarming to these good and religious people the evils complained of and the progress of papacy might be. But there was one object which Mr. C. thought might be a proper subject of inquiry, being within the power of Congress; and that was a change in our laws of naturalization. He therefore moved that the memorial be referred to the Judiciary Committee; and it was so referred.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Public Lands.

The Senate took up the bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities.

The question pending was on Mr. TIPTON's amendment, offered yesterday, to the first section of the bill, "that all lands that have been in the market ten years, and remain unsold, shall be sold for seventy-five cents an acre; and all that have five years, shall be disposed of at one dollar; provided that not more than one hundred and sixty acres be sold to one purchaser."

MESSRS. EWING and CLAY spoke against the bill, MESSRS. DANA and TIPTON for it.

The amendment proposed by Mr. TIPTON was rejected by the following vote:

NAYS.—MESSRS. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge—19.

Mr. BENTON then offered the following amendment:

That it shall and may be lawful for any head of a family, young man over the age of eighteen years, or widow, not having received a donation of land from the United States, and being or wishing to become an actual settler on any parcel of public land which shall have remained five years unsold after having been offered at private sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and not exceeding in quantity the amount of one quarter section, to demand and receive, from the proper register and receiver, a written permission to settle on the same, upon payment, to be made to the proper receiver, of the sum of seventy-five cents per acre; and if such person, so applying for and receiving such permission, shall forthwith settle on the said land, and he or she, or his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall cultivate the same for five successive years, and shall be a citizen or citizens of the United States at the end of that time, then, on proper proof being made, before the register and receiver, of such settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, a patent shall issue for the said land to the person who received such permission, or his or her heirs or legal representatives. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to all persons who may settle on the public lands, according to the provisions of this section, that no dispensation shall at any time be granted to any individual from complying with the substantial conditions herein prescribed. And if due proof of settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, as herein required, be not made within one year next after the expiration of said five years, the said land shall again be subject to entry at private sale, as land belonging to the United States. And if two or more persons, entitled under this act to the privileges of actual settlers, shall apply for the same parcel of land, then the register and receiver shall immediately decide the right of preference between them, according to priority of settlement and other equitable circumstances; and where these are equal, the decision shall be taken by lot.

The question was taken on its adoption by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—20.

So the amendment was lost.

THURSDAY, January 26.

Michigan Senators Admitted.

A Message was then received from the President of the United States, stating that the President had signed the bill for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The credentials of the Hon. JOHN NORVELL and the Hon. LUCIUS LYON, elected by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, on the 10th November, 1835, to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, were read by the Secretary; and,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States was administered to Messrs. NORVELL and LYON by the Vice President, and they took their seats in the Senate.

Treasury Circular.

Mr. WALKER moved to postpone the previous orders, and take up the bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for dues by the United States.

The question on taking up the bill was decided by—yeas 33, nays 12.

Mr. RIVES thereupon offered an amendment, to extend the prohibition respecting the notes of banks issuing notes of small denominations, so as to embrace, after the 30th of December, 1841, notes of $20. [The bill only extended to those of five and of ten dollars.]

He supported the amendment in a short speech, urging the moral effect of the measure and its necessity, as the only means of effecting the enlargement of the specie basis of our circulation.

Mr. EWING referred to a provision in the bill which requires the deposit banks to receive and pass to the credit of Government all such bank notes as they receive in general deposit. This took away their power to oppress, and reconciled him to the bill, which should now have his vote. The effect of Mr. RIVES' amendment would be to confine the circulation of the large notes in the West to the banks in the immediate vicinity of the deposit banks, while all the small notes circulating there would be those of banks at a distance, to whom it was of less consequence that their notes should be received at the land offices than that their small notes should have a wide circulation.

After some remarks of Mr. NILES, and a brief speech from Mr. WALKER, the question on Mr. RIVES' amendment was decided by:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—18.

The bill was ordered to its engrossment.

FRIDAY, January 27.

Michigan Senators.

Mr. GRUNDY submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Michigan shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th May, 1789.

Mr. GRUNDY observed, that before submitting the motion to carry the resolution into effect, a word of explanation would perhaps be necessary. There were, according to the constitution, three classes of Senators; and there was an equal number of each, until the coming in of the Senators from Arkansas; but one of them drawing number one, and the other number three, of course there were more of these numbers than of number two. This he had in view in drawing up the motion; and, by providing that numbers two and three only shall be drawn, the inequality would be lessened.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered two, and the other shall be a blank, and each Senator shall draw out one paper; that the Senator who shall draw the paper number two shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1839;

that the Secretary then put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered one, and the other shall be numbered three, and the other Senator shall draw out one paper; that if the paper drawn be number one, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837, and if the paper drawn be number three, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1841.

In pursuance of the above order, Messrs. NORVELL and LYON proceeded to draw ballots for their respective classes; when Mr. LYON, drawing number two, was classed with the Senators whose terms of service expires on the 3d of March, 1839; and Mr. NORVELL, drawing number three, was classed with the Senators whose terms of service expire on the 3d of March, 1841.

American Colonization Society.

Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the District of Columbia, stating that they had, a number of years past, formed an association for colonizing free negroes, with their own consent, on the coast of Africa; that many donations had been made to them in money and in lands, which last species of property they could not render available, in consequence of their not having a charter; and praying for an act of incorporation to enable them to hold and convey real estate. Mr. C. moved to refer this memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALHOUN regretted that the Senator from Kentucky had thought fit to present this memorial, and deprecated any discussion or agitation of the subject, which he thought would rather tend to increase than to allay the excitement which had been produced by an injudicious interference with a question of much delicacy. He did not intend to oppose the reference of the memorial, but he indulged the hope that the committee would see the propriety of not acting on it during this session.

Mr. CLAY regretted extremely that there should have been any expression, even in a modified form, in opposition to the object which the memorialists desire to attain. The day would come, he would venture to predict, when the people living in all portions of this vast continent would become converts to the American colonization scheme, and become convinced of its utility, and the humane principles by which it is characterized, in striving to ameliorate the present condition of the African race.

The object, then, of the memorialists was to send free negroes, with their own voluntary consent, to Liberia. They do not desire to touch any interest or any property—to affect any right of any citizen here, or in the States. The memorialists come here and tell the Senate that many donations have been made to them, from time to time, both in land and money, and it was of the highest importance that such an act as they applied for should be granted. He might remind the Senate of a donation that was given the Colonization Society by one of the best and greatest men this country had ever produced—he meant the late venerable ex-President Madison. He bequeathed the donation (on account of there not being in existence such an act as these memorialists pray for) to Mr. Gurley, for the benefit of the society. Although, in the present case, the trust was faithfully executed, in other cases it might not be; hence, therefore, the memorialists ask for an act of incorporation, in order that they can receive what may be given them. Now, the object was dear, was interesting, was just, was natural; and he could not but express his hope that an act of incorporation would be granted them.

Mr. CALHOUN said that from the first to the last he had been under the impression that any interference with the objects of this society by the General Government would not only be unconstitutional, but would have the most mischievous effects. He would remind the Senator from Kentucky, who had mentioned the late Mr. Madison as one of the friends of the Colonization Society, that that great statesman was so strict in his notions as to the granting of charters by the General Government, that he had vetoed the act of Congress incorporating a church in Alexandria. The Senator from Kentucky must know that great diversity of opinion existed among the wisest and best men of the country as to the ultimate good to be effected by this society; and that the prevailing opinion of the great body of the people of the South was against it. Nine-tenths of the Southern people at least, said Mr. C., were opposed to any interference with the objects of this society by the General Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky; and that was, that, if an act of incorporation be granted at all, it must not be confined in its operation to the District of Columbia; it must go to the extent of the whole Union. It appeared to him (Mr. B.) that this was not a proper subject to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was a committee having a great deal of business to attend to, though not of a character of such general importance as was connected with this memorial. He should, therefore, think it would be better to have a special committee on this question. The gentleman from Kentucky understood the matter perfectly well, and should be placed at the head of it, and could bring forward such a proposition as would meet general approbation. He (Mr. B.) therefore moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee.

Mr. CLAY observed that he understood the subject, and had determined to make his proposition as free from objection as possible; and, therefore, he limited the powers of the act of incorporation, to this District only. He was perfectly aware that in an attempt to give it a general character, so that the society might establish branches here and there, a constitutional question would arise. He hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would withdraw his motion for a select committee. He (Mr. C.) did himself doubt whether Congress had the power to pass an act of incorporation which should have powers beyond the District of Columbia. But as to the memorial, he would say that, as it came from the District of Columbia, the proper reference was to the committee having charge of its affairs, to which it might be sent; and he hoped that it would report a bill as speedily as possible. He hoped gentlemen would not postpone the consideration of the subject.

MR. CALHOUN conceived that the Senator from Pennsylvania had taken the proper view of this question. He thought, too, that it should be referred to a select committee. The Senator from Kentucky and himself view the subject in a very different point of view. A mysterious Providence had brought the black and the white people together from different parts of the globe, and no human power could now separate them. The whites are a European race, being masters; and the Africans are the inferior race, and slaves. He believed that they could exist among us peaceably enough, if undisturbed, for all time; and it was his opinion that the Colonization Society, and all the other schemes which had been gotten up through mistaken notions of philanthropy, in order to bring about an alteration in the condition of the African, had a wrong foundation, and were calculated to disturb the existing relations between the two races, and the relations between the North and the South. He knew the Senator from Kentucky viewed the subject in a very different light, for he had stated on many occasions his opinions the held. He (Mr. C.) believed that the very existence of the South depended upon the existing relations being kept up, and that every scheme which might be introduced, having for its object an alteration in the condition of the negro, was pregnant with danger and ruin. It was a benevolent object, and highly desirable that the blessings of civilization and Christianity should be introduced into benighted Africa; but this was a Government of limited powers, and had no more to do with free negroes than with slaves; and if Africa was to be Christianized and civilized, he hoped it would not be done by this Government acting beyond its constitutional powers. It was a matter of little importance to him, whether the memorial should be referred to a select committee, or to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MR. PRESTON expressed his hope that the memorial might be sent to the Committee on the District.

MR. STRANGE said that he should be compelled to vote against the reference of the memorial to any committee whatsoever. He coincided in opinion with both the Senators from South Carolina, that, were an act of incorporation passed, its effects would be coextensive with the Union itself. And he should deprecate more the location of a society at this point than at any other, because of its commanding position, and on account of its indicating the right of Congress to interfere with so delicate and important a subject. It was impossible to be so obtuse as not to see that this society, with its Briareus arms, would exercise a great influence over the interests of the Southern country. What would be its effects, but to hold out to the slave population a desire to become free? He meant, according to the laws of the country in which they live. They did not generally desire freedom, in their degraded condition, and most of the slaves preferred living in that condition. But when an inducement was held out to them, it was done to make them discontented with the situation in which God had placed them. He had been opposed to the Bank of the United States, because he believed Congress had no power to grant a charter out of the District of Columbia; and for the same reason, nearly, he was now also opposed to granting an act of incorporation to the Colonization Society in this District, because, in its very nature, its operations could not be confined to it solely.

MR. RIVES had made up his mind to vote for the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia; he did not wish to be considered as expressing any opinion that the objects of this society could be accomplished by the aid of Congress. While he did not believe that it was competent for Congress to incorporate any society whose objects extended beyond the limits of the District, and were coextensive with the Union, he was yet disposed to vote for the reference, on the assumption that the acts of this society were to be confined to the District of Columbia.

MR. KING, of Alabama, felt very unwilling that the memorial should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, for it was general in its character, as many gentlemen seemed to think; and that was to his mind the very reason why it should not be sent to this committee, whose duty was to attend to business connected only with the ten miles square, and to guard the rights of the people living within that space. It was quite palpable that no corporate body of this character could be established here, without affecting the whole Union. Why did not the society, instead of coming to Congress for an act of incorporation, apply to some of the States of the Union. Their object was clear; and he could not but regard this as an entering wedge to more extended operations, and it should be frustrated at once. He had never thrown any obstacle in the way of what he considered praiseworthy and meritorious on the part of the Colonization Society; but it was not the duty of Congress to lend them any assistance. Mr. K. concluded by moving that the memorial be laid on the table.

The memorial was laid on the table—ayes 24, noes 12.

Treasury Circular—Paper Money.

[SENATE.]

Treasury Circular—Paper Money.

The following bill was read a third time :

A bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided : that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit : from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues ; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be so receivable ; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash : Provided, That if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BENTON rose and commenced his speech against its passage with stating the reason why he had not spoken the evening before, when the question was on the engrossment of the bill. He said that he could not have foreseen that the subject depending before the Senate, the bill for limiting the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, would be laid down for the purpose of taking up this subject out of its order ; and, therefore, had not brought with him some memorandums which he intended to use when this subject came up. He did not choose to ask for delay, because his habit was to speak to subjects when they were called ; and in this particular case he did not think it material when he spoke ; for he was very well aware that his speaking would not affect the fate of the bill. It would pass, and that was known to all in the chamber. It was known to the Senator from Ohio (Mr. EWING) who indulged himself in saying he thought otherwise a few days ago ; but that was only a good-natured way of stimulating his friends, and bringing them up to the scratch. The bill would pass, and that by a good vote, for it would have the vote of the opposition, and a division of the administration vote. Why, then, did he speak ? Because it was due to his position, and the part he had acted on the currency questions, to express his sentiments more fully on this bill, so vital to the general currency, than could be done by a mere negative vote. He should, therefore, speak against it, and should direct his attention to the bill reported by the Public Land Committee, which had so totally changed the character of the proceeding on this subject. The rescision of the Treasury order was introduced a resolution—it went out a resolution—but it came back a bill, and a bill to regulate, not the land office receipts only, but all the receipts of the Federal Government ; and in this new form is to become statute law, and a law to operate on all the revenues, and to repeal all other laws upon the subject to which it related. In this new form it assumes an importance, and acquires an effect, infinitely beyond a resolution, and becomes, in fact as well as in name, a totally new measure. Mr. B. reminded the Senate that he had, in his first speech on this subject, given it as his opinion, that two main objects were proposed to be accomplished by the rescinding resolution : first, the implied condemnation of President Jackson for violating the laws and constitution, and destroying the prosperity of the country ; and, secondly, the imposition of the paper currency of the States upon the Federal Government. With respect to the first of these objects, he presumed it was fully proved by the speeches of all the opposition Senators who had spoken on this subject ; and, with respect to the second, he believed it would find its proof in the change which the original resolution had undergone, and the form it was now assuming of statute law, and especially with the proviso which was added at the end of the second section.

Having remarked upon the phraseology of the bill, and shown that a paper currency, composed of the notes of a thousand local banks, not only might become the currency of the Federal Government, but was evidently intended to be made its currency ; and that, in the face of all the protestations of the friends of the administration in favor of re-establishing the national gold currency, Mr. B. would now take up the bill of the committee under two or three other aspects, and show it to be as mistaken in its design as it would be impotent in its effect. In the first place, it transferred the business of suppressing the small-note circulation from the deposit branch to the collecting branch of the public revenue. At present, this business was in a course of progress through the deposit banks, as a condition of holding the public moneys, and, as such, had a place in the deposit act of the last session, and also had a place in the President's message of the last session, where the suppression of paper currency under twenty dollars was expressly referred to the action of the deposit banks, and as a condition of their retaining the public deposits. It was through the deposit banks, and not through the reception of local bank paper, that the suppression of small notes should be effected. In the next place, he objected to the committee's bill, because it proposed to make a bargain with each of the thousand banks now in the United States, and the hundreds more which will soon be born, and to give them a right—a right by law—to have their notes received at the federal Treasury. He was against such a bargain. He had no idea of making a contract with these thousand banks for the reception of their notes. He had no idea of contracting with them, and giving them a right to plead the Constitution of the United States against us, if, at any time, after having agreed to receive their notes, upon condition that they would give up their small circulation, they should choose to say we had impaired the contract by not continuing to receive them; and so either relapse into the issue of this small trash, or have recourse to the judicial process to compel the United States to abide the contract, and continue the reception of all their notes. Mr. B. had no idea of letting down this Federal Government to such petty and inconvenient bargains with a thousand moneyed corporations. The Government of the United States ought to act as a Government, and not as a contractor. It should prescribe conditions, and not make bargains. It should give the law. He was against these bargains, even if they were good ones; but they were bad bargains, wretchedly bad, and ought to be rejected as such, even if all higher and nobler considerations were out of the question. What is the consideration that the United States is to receive? A mere individual agreement with each bank by itself, that in three years it will cease to issue notes under ten dollars, and in five years it will cease to issue notes under twenty dollars. What is the price which she pays for this consideration? In the first place, it receives the notes of such banks as gold and silver at all the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, of the United States, and, of course, pays them out again as gold and silver to all her debtors. In the next place, it compels the deposit banks to credit them as cash. In the third place, it accredits the whole circulation of the banks, and makes it current all over the United States, in consequence of universal receivability for all federal dues. In other words, it indorses, so far as credit is concerned, the whole circulation of every bank that comes into the bargain thus proposed. This is certainly a most wretched bargain on the part of the United States—a bargain in which what she receives is ruinous to her; for the more local paper she receives in payment of her revenues, the worse for her, and the sooner will her Treasury be filled with unavailable funds.

Mr. B. had been at work for five years to procure the suppression of paper money under twenty dollars. His exertions, on that point, had brought him into communication with the officers of many banks; and it was due to them to say, that all the banks of high character, with which he had communicated, were in favor of the suppression of small notes; and he was fully persuaded that many of them, and as a mere condition of retaining the public deposits, if the deposit banks were reduced to the proper number, would give up their circulation entirely, and introduce into our country the example of banks of discount, deposit, and exchange, alone, as they exist in Europe, and where they give all the real benefits of banks, without the dangers and mischiefs of issuing paper money. In his opinion, about thirty deposit banks were enough; they were more places of deposit than existed during the time of the Bank of the United States, which had but twenty-four branches; and if the deposits were confined to about thirty banks of good capital and high character, these banks would immediately, that is to say, within one or two years, and now while we have the specie to justify the operation, enter heartily into the measure of putting down the circulation of notes under twenty dollars. With the additional inducement of relinquishing the interest which they now pay on deposits, he felt certain they would quickly accomplish this great work for the country. Now is the time, as Mr. C. P. White says in his letter, now is the time to do it, when our specie is between seventy and eighty millions of dollars. Certainly this is the time, while forty-five millions of that specie is locked up in the vaults of banks—and while our paper circulation is so redundant as to have undergone a depreciation which is heavily felt in the price of every article of consumption by all persons who live upon wages and fixed income. This is the time to effect the suppression; and it was afflicting to see it lost; for to postpone it five years was to lose the golden opportunity. And at whose instance was this to be done? At the instance of the small banks—the two-and-sixpenny concerns—to which it was an object to put out small notes, for the sake of the gain to the bank upon the loss to the community, in the wear and tear of small notes. Mr. B. said it was the small banks which cling to the small notes, and some of them since they became deposit banks, and in violation of the deposit law. He would give an instance; it was from that same Clinton Bank of Columbus, from which he had before read. In the statement of its condition made to the Legislature of Ohio on the 9th day of January of the present year, the circulation of the bank is thus stated: One-dollar bills, $6,226; two-dollar do. $4,916; three-dollar do. $6,669; five do. $60,085; ten do. $10,910; twenty do. $12,140; fifty do. $13,400; one hundred do. $300. Now, here is a bank whose total circulation is $115,000, and of which the whole, except about $25,000, is under twenty dollars; and yet this bank, on this question, and in this chamber, is to outweigh the Manhattan, and the other great banks of the country!

Mr. B. said it was curious to observe that the small country banks in England had governed the legislation of the British Parliament in the suppression of the small notes, precisely in the manner now going on in this country, and with the same disastrous results there which may be expected to ensue here. He would, to show this, read an extract from the testimony of the governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Horsley Palmer, before Lord Althorp's committee, in 1832. He says:

"By the resolution of the House of Commons of 1819, the Bank of England was required, within four years, to pay off in gold the amount of their one-pound notes then in circulation, (about £7,500,000;) further, to provide the coin for paying off the country small notes in 1825, (about £7,800,000 more;) in addition to which, the necessity was imposed of providing the requisite surplus bullion for insuring the convertibility of all their liabilities; which addition of bullion to their stock could not be estimated at less than £5,000,000; making in the aggregate £20,000,000 of gold as necessary to be procured from foreign countries within the space of four years from 1819. The bank cancelled their own small notes in 1821, (two years before the time limited by Parliament.) In 1822, being three years prior to the time fixed by Parliament, they were in a situation to furnish the gold for paying off the country small notes, (that is, they had procured the whole 20 millions in gold, near 100 millions of dollars, from foreign countries in three years,) when, without any communication with the bank, the Government thought proper to authorize a continuance of the circulation of the country small notes until 1833."

Mr. B. said it was here seen that the governor of the Bank of England complained that, when the Bank of England had procured twenty millions sterling in gold in three years, (equal to near one hundred millions of dollars,) and had suppressed its own small notes, and had gold enough to supply the place of all the country banks' small notes, these country banks got the time extended for the suppression of theirs—got it done in Parliament, without consultation with the Bank of England—and extended up to the year 1833. This is the testimony of the governor of the bank, and the point of it is this: that the Parliament lost the golden moment of doing the great work, and lost it by conforming to the interests of the small country banks, whose friends were numerous and powerful in Parliament, in opposition to the interests of the empire, and against the wishes of the Bank of England. The rest is matter of history. That history is, that these country banks never enjoyed the seven years which Parliament granted them. Having seven years to go upon, they resolved to make hay while the sun was shining. So to work they went, and put out more small notes than ever. The consequence was, the vast and disastrous explosion of the paper system which took place in 1825, an explosion which covered all England with the wrecks of broken fortunes, and in which so many families who thought themselves affluent were suddenly sunk, without any fault of their own, and, as if by magic and enchantment, from the enjoyment of wealth and happiness, to the sufferings of poverty, misery, and despair. History, said Mr. B., is said to be philosophy teaching by example. But how many of her lessons are lost upon the world! Here is a great lesson given to us in our own time, and by the nation from whom we have borrowed our whole system of banking. Yet this lesson is lost upon us; and we must go through her sufferings, and learn it ourselves, as she did, before we can know it. Our circumstances are the same; we have accumulated upwards of 70 millions of gold and silver; it is increasing every day; we are ready for the operation of drawing in small notes, and putting out hard money; the strong and respectable banks wish us to do it; the public interest requires it to be done; the policy of President Jackson's administration prescribes it; yet we lose the golden opportunity; we put it off for five years! and instead of adopting an efficient course to act upon masses of banks, and upon every variety of their circulation under twenty dollars, we take an impotent, inefficient course, and to act upon units, and upon the notes which they issue only, and by way of bargain, which either party may terminate when it pleases, a bargain which must be fatal to our Treasury if the banks accept it!

Mr. B., having gone over these objections to the committee's bill, would now ascend to a class of objections of a higher and graver character. He had already remarked that the committee had carried out a resolution, and had brought back a bill; that the committee proposed a statutory enactment, where the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. EWING,) and the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) had only proposed a joint resolution; and he had already further remarked, that in addition to this total change in the mode of action, the committee had added what neither of these Senators had proposed, a clause, under a proviso, to enact paper money into cash—to pass paper money to the credit of the United States, as cash—and to punish, by the loss of the deposits, any deposit bank which should refuse so to receive, so to credit, and so to pass, the notes "receivable" under the provisions of their bill. These two changes make entirely a new measure—one of wholly a different character from the resolutions of the two Senators—a measure which openly and in terms, and under penalties, undertakes to make local State paper a legal tender to the Federal Government, and to compel the reception of all its revenues in the notes "receivable" under the provisions of the committee's bill. After this gigantic step—this colossal movement—in favor of paper money, there was but one step more for the committee to take, and that was to make these notes a legal tender in all payments from the Federal Government. But that step was unnecessary to be taken in words, for it is taken in fact, when the other great step becomes law. For it is incontestable that what the Government receives, it must pay out; and what it pays out becomes the currency of the country. So that when this bill passes, the paper money of the local banks will be a tender by law to the Federal Government, and a tender by duress from the Government to its creditors and the people. This is the state to which the committee's bill will bring us! and now, let us pause and contemplate, for a moment, the position we occupy, and the vast ocean of paper on which we are proposed to be embarked.

We stand upon a constitution which recognizes nothing but gold and silver for money; we stand upon a legislation of near fifty years, which recognizes nothing but gold and silver for money. Now, for the first time, we have a statutory enactment proposed to recognize the paper of a wilderness of local banks for money, and in so doing to repeal all prior legislation by law, and the constitution by fact. This is an era in our legislation. It is statute law to control all other law, and is not a resolution to aid other laws, and to express the opinions of Congress. On this point he must be permitted to refer to what he had said in a former part of this debate, when he dwelt upon the difference between an act of Congress and a resolution of Congress, and congratulated himself that no act of the national Legislature had ever attacked the great fundamental acts for the collection of the revenues in the gold and silver money of the constitution.

Mr. B. said, the effects of this statute would be, to make a paper government—to insure the exportation of our specie—to leave the State banks without foundations to rest upon—to produce a certain catastrophe in the whole paper system—to revive the pretensions of the United States Bank—and to fasten, for a time, the Adam Smith system upon the Federal Government and the whole Union.

Mr. B. objected to the bill, for want of certainty in the kind of money which was to be received in the land offices. The whole question was left afloat. Nothing was fixed; nothing was stationary. What was land-office money to-day might not be so to-morrow. The orders for the reception and rejection of different paper, or the same paper, might vary from day to day. A farmer hears that the notes of a particular bank are receivable; he supplies himself with those notes and goes to the office. When he gets there, he may meet an order to exclude them; and then be turned over to a money-dealer to furnish himself with other notes, no better than those he had, but at a cost of five, ten, or fifteen per cent. to him, to effect the exchange. Far better would it be for the farmers and settlers to have the permanency and uniformity of gold and silver only for land-office payments; then they would always know what they had to rely upon, and would be free from disappointments and impositions.

Mr. B. further objected to the receivability of paper money at the land offices, on account of the advantages which it gave to bankers and their favorites over the rest of the community. To a banker, or his favorite, it was pretty immaterial whether he gave a quire or a ream—a handful, or an armful—of his paper, for a parcel of land; and whether this paper was speckled over with figures for five dollars or fifty dollars, or five hundred dollars. It was all pretty much the same thing to him. To a farmer, however, who had to give labor, or produce, or property, for every dollar he obtained, it was quite another affair; and it was impossible for him to stand the competition with the man of quires, with his machine to impress letters and figures for as many dollars as he pleased, on the little oblong slips of paper which constituted bank notes. It was a shame in the Government to put the farmer in competition with such wholesale manufacturers of paper dollars.

Mr. B. further objected to this bill, because its tendency was to inundate the new States with strange and unknown bank paper. In the new States, whatever was land office money was current money. It was current, not only at the land office, but in every place, and all over the State. It was a Government indorsement, which gave credit to the whole issue of the bank. Taking advantage of this, it was quite usual for enterprising banks to get their paper made receivable in the land offices: then go to the new States, and lay out immense quantities of it in the purchase of products, or property; and then leave it to be shaved out of the hands of the people when it ceased to be land office money, or when specie was wanted for it.

Finally, Mr. B. objected, totally, to the idea of continuing to receive paper money for the dues of the Federal Government. This bill was intended to be a permanent law; there was no limitation of time in it. It was intended to continue paper money forever as the currency of the Federal Government. There was no longer any plea of necessity to justify such a gross departure from the constitution. It is not now as it was in 1816, when the joint resolution of that year was passed. Then, there was less specie in the country than ever was known; now there is more than ever was known. The joint resolution of 1816 was a great advance upon the existing state of things at that time: the same resolution would be a retrograde movement, and a great falling back at the present day. We have now near eighty millions of specie. The Secretary of the Treasury computed it at seventy-three millions two months ago, and it has been increasing ever since. A New Orleans paper computes it at eighty millions. Say the amount is seventy-five millions; that sum is far beyond any possible demand that the collection of the revenues in specie could demand. On this point Mr. B. spoke with data in his hand, and could demonstrate and prove up what he said. He had two different data to go upon, either of which would be sufficient, and both of which, together, would be conclusive. First, as to the amount of money which it requires to effect a given amount of payments in transacting the business of the country. Everybody knows that it does not require an amount of money equal to the whole amount of annual payments, to make those payments. This might be the case if every creditor ate all the money which he received; but as he does not eat it, but pays it over to somebody else, it follows that the same piece of money performs many payments in the course of the year; and, consequently, that a sum far below the amount of annual payments will be sufficient to effect all those payments. A proportionate supply, then, is all that is wanted; and that proportion is fixed by political economists at the one-tenth. Thus, annual payments to the amount of ten millions may be effected by means of one million; and so on in the same proportion, for any amount. Upon this data it would require but a small part of our seventy odd millions to effect all the annual payments to the Federal Government. Then, try another data. Take the experience of the Bank of the United States. During the time that that bank was the fiscal agent of the Government, nothing was received by the Federal Government but its own notes and silver; for there was then no gold in circulation. The amount of United States Bank notes in circulation, though pushed up a few times to twenty odd millions, was generally below twenty; but take that for the average, and add the silver, which was computed in 1832, by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) in the debate on the renewal of the bank charter, at from twenty to twenty-two millions; put these two sums together, and you have about forty millions, or little more than half the gold and silver now in the country. Here, again, the result is satisfactory, and shows that we have more than enough for this purpose. But there is still a third way to arrive at the same result. It is by looking to the actual amount that will be required for the great sources of Government demand—lands, customs, and Post Office. The lands, whether sales are restricted to settlers, or limited to hard money payments, which would itself be a restriction of sales to settlers, it is certain not more than five or six millions of dollars' worth would be sold; and, as the Government would not eat these five or six millions, but pay them back as fast as received, it would follow that a part only of it would be sufficient to make the whole payment. Then, as to the customs: they may amount to about twenty millions, but would, in reality, require but little specie; for the payments through the customs are seldom made by counting money, but by a transfer of credit on the books of a bank. An order to pay the customs in hard money would make very little difference in the payments as now made. This, every merchant and business man fully understands. Next, as to the Post Office: here the receipts are upwards of four millions per annum; but the Postmaster General does not eat the money, but pays it out immediately, and sends it back into the mass of circulation, in payment for services rendered to the Department by contractors, agents, deputy postmasters, &c., who immediately disburse it among the community.

Mr. B. said that this bill, though in its terms a general measure, and professing to act only on coming events, yet was, in reality, a measure rescinding the Treasury order of July last; and, as such, was greeted and saluted by the friends of the rescision on this floor. They openly celebrated the advent of the bill as the triumph of their movement, and announce its passage as a welcome victory. This may be. They may carry the bill, but they cannot carry the argument. They may rescind the order, but they cannot verify Mr. Biddle's prediction of the distress it was to create, nor invalidate President Jackson's statement of the good it had produced. In the month of November, Mr. Biddle predicted a world of woe—all to take place by the time that Congress met, and all to result from the Treasury order, and the manner of executing the deposit act—"intense pecuniary distress; derangement of exchanges; loss of confidence; destruction of the public prosperity; scarcity of money; fall of prices; ruin of the currency;" and he averred that the instant repeal of the Treasury order, under the command of Congress, if the Secretary would not do it voluntarily, would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and put an end to all this mass of woe in twenty-four days. On the other hand, the President informed us, in his annual Message, that the same Treasury order had produced many salutary consequences. He says it has checked the career of the Western banks, and given them additional strength to meet approaching difficulties; that it has cut off the means of speculation in the public lands; that it has saved the new States from the evils of a non-resident proprietorship; that it has kept open the public lands to the entry of cultivators, and saved them from competition with those who are favored with bank facilities; that it has caused gold and silver to flow into the new States, and placed the business of the whole country on a safer and more solid basis. This is the representation of the President; and which is the true picture? his statement, or Mr. Biddle's prediction? Surely the state of the country will answer the question! Certainly the personal knowledge of every individual will enable him to answer it! The whole prediction for the panic and pressure has failed! the edict for the distress has failed! It was to no purpose that the distress was commenced at several places; that many presses, and several speakers on this floor, announced and proclaimed it. The seventy odd millions of hard money which had been brought into the country was death to the operation; and, after a few vain efforts to renew the scenes of 1833, after a few abortive demonstrations to alarm the public, the whole contrivance was abandoned, or, rather, the performance was postponed; for it is never to be forgotten that panic and pressure is part of the permanent system of the denationalized national bank, and will be brought to bear, whenever opportunity will permit, until it shall be proved to the people that they cannot live without a national bank. The edict for the distress, then, has failed; and the failure of that scheme is itself the proof of the truth of President Jackson's statement of the good effects of the order. That order has been attended by every good effect which he has mentioned, and this is universally known in the West, and is proved negatively by the total absence of all complaint from that quarter. Nobody in the new States complains to us; no one in the new States sends here to demand the rescission of the order. That demand comes from Philadelphia, where there are no public lands; from Kentucky, where there are none; from Ohio, where there are next to none; and from members on this floor, who are backed by no memorials from home. The letter from the clerk in the land office at Kalamazoo covers the whole ground, and proves the wisdom, the beneficence, and the necessity of that order. The diminution of the sales after the issuing of the order is a further proof to the same effect. Before the sales, that is to say, in the months of May and June, two months in which the amount of sales should have been least, they amounted to the sum of six millions and a quarter; the months of October and November, the two months in which the sales should have been greatest, the amount was three millions one hundred thousand. The month of December, though the returns are not complete, shows a still further decline; and if gentlemen had patience to wait for the returns of January, the first month in which the order had full effect, they would, no doubt, find it bringing down the sales to a moderate amount, and effecting a diminution of income, from that source of revenue, to as small a degree as could be desired, and in a manner the most simple, the most regular, the most effectual, and the most satisfactory, that can be devised by the wit of man.

Every good consequence stated by the President had resulted from the operation of the order; and the evidence of this was too public and notorious to require illustration, or to admit of enumeration. But there was one point of his statement which was an exception to this remark, and on which it would be profitable to go into some detail; for it concerned not only the lands, but the far more important subject of the currency itself; he alluded to that part of the President's Message in which he stated that this order had checked the career of the Western banks, and compelled them to strengthen themselves against the revulsions consequent upon every expansion of the bank issues. This was true to a degree of which no one had a conception but those who had access to a knowledge of the condition of all the banks, and who availed themselves of that right of access to examine into the condition of these banks, and to compare that condition with the approved principles of what is considered safe and sound banking.

Mr. B. said that, among those things which were considered as settled in the science and mystery of banking, there was one principle which required the immediate means of the bank to bear a certain proportion to its immediate liabilities; below which proportion it was not safe for the bank to descend. The immediate means of the bank are its specie on hand; its liabilities are the circulation and the deposits; and the proportion which these ought to bear to each other has been fixed, at the Bank of England, after an experience of one hundred and forty years, at the one-third. Mr. B. deemed the verification of this principle so material that it deserved to be proved as well as stated. He would therefore produce the sworn testimony on this point taken before Lord Althorp's committee in 1832, and should confine himself to the evidence of the governor of the bank and one of its directors. The testimony of Mr. Horsley Palmer, the governor of the bank, is this: "The average proportion, as already observed, of coin and bullion which the bank thinks it prudent to keep on hand, is at the rate of a third of the total amount of all her liabilities, including deposits as well as issues." Mr. George Ward Norman, a director of the bank, states the same thing in a different form of words. He says: "For a full state of the circulation and the deposits, say twenty-one millions of notes and six millions of deposits, making in the whole twenty-seven millions of liabilities, the proper sum in coin and bullion for the bank to retain is nine millions." Thus, the average proportion of one-third between the specie on hand and the circulation and deposits, must be considered as an established principle at that bank, which is quite the largest, and amongst the oldest in the world. It might be well also to remark that the same proportion, very nearly, prevailed in the Bank of the United States at the time of the removal of the deposits in October, 1833; it was, of specie on hand, $10,663,441; of circulation and deposits, $37,105,465; being at the rate of between one-third and one-fourth of specie in hand for immediate liabilities. The proportion of about one-third being then established as the principle of safety in banking, let us apply that principle to some of our Western deposit banks in July last, to see what was

Treasury Circular—Paper Money.

[SENATE.]

their condition at that time; and in November, to see whether that condition was improved, as stated by the President.

[Here the statements were produced.]

Mr. B. said such was the condition of some of the Western deposit banks in July last, and such their condition in November; very far below the Bank of England standard at both periods, but greatly improved by the operation of the specie order, and doubtless much more improved by its continued operation to this time. There were many others of these banks also falling far below the Bank of England standard in July and November, and still below it. Mr. B. was ready to admit, what every business man must understand, that all these banks have a list of debts, and of bills of exchange, falling due from day to day, and amounting in the aggregate to more than all their liabilities; but he must be permitted to remark, that the Bank of England also has her list of debtors, and that nearly the whole of these debtors are in the city of London, within thirty minutes' run of the bank; that she is situated in the moneyed metropolis of the universe; that she is supported by the richest and most numerous body of merchants upon the earth, and backed by the whole power of the British Government, which stands her security for seventy millions of dollars, and lends her exchequer bills to the amount of millions, and increases their interest to facilitate their sale when necessary; and that, with all these resources, such as no bank in our America can pretend to, she yet deems it necessary to have always on hand, in coin and bullion, the one-third of the amount of her circulation and deposits. What, then, must be thought of the condition of some of the banks referred to, and others which might be referred to, in July last? Instead of one-third specie in hand to meet their immediate liabilities, the actual proportion in hand was the one-twentieth, the one-thirtieth, the one-fortieth, and the one-fiftieth! Mr. B. said it was beyond all human doubt, that if the Treasury order had not been issued, that the Western deposit banks would have exploded in the course of the last fall, and that we should now have been sitting here amidst the wrecks of the paper system. That order prevented this catastrophe; and it is precisely because it did prevent it, that it has excited the rage of Mr. Biddle, and of the whole political party imbodyed under the oriflamme of the denationalized national bank. It balked their present hopes of reascension to power through the ruin of the finances; and in their rage for this disappointment, they denounce the President for a violation of the laws and the constitution; they charge him with ruining the country; they attempt a new panic and pressure; and they call upon Congress to repeal the order.

[Here Mr. Benton read a bank letter of Mr.

Biddle, in favor of the local banks and against the specie circular, and showing that he chalked out the plan for this attack upon that circular, and in favor of imposing paper money upon the federal treasury, just as he had chalked out all the measures for the panic session.]

Mr. B. said that the views and sentiments disclosed in this extract were of great moment, and ought to be carefully considered by all whose duty it is, here or elsewhere, to legislate, or to act, upon the subject of the currency. The design is here disclosed to stir up the local banks against the Federal Government, to make alliance with them, and to force the Government to receive their paper in payment of all federal dues. This is the design disclosed; and with what motive? Certainly to ruin the finances of the Federal Government! Certainly to compel the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren to repeat the fatal error of Mr. Madison's administration, that of undertaking to make a national currency out of local bank notes. Warned by that fatal error of those who put down the first national bank, those who put down the second one determined to avoid it, and for that purpose to re-establish for the Federal Government the currency of the constitution. When this design was announced, our opponents treated it with derision. They said it could not be done; that a gold and silver currency could not be revived. They ridiculed the attempt; but what is the answer which four years have given to their ridicule? It is the actual revival of the gold currency, of which near twenty millions of dollars are now in the country; it is in the actual increase of our specie from twenty or twenty-two millions, as computed by the President of the Bank of the United States himself, when the charter for that institution was applied for in 1832, to near eight millions, which it is now known to be. The experiment of getting the gold and silver into the country has succeeded; ridicule has failed of its office. The gold and silver is here, enough, and more than enough, to make all the payments to and from the Federal Government. Ridicule will no longer answer; stronger measures must be resorted to, and legislation has become indispensable to the overthrow of the constitutional currency. To prevent the specie in the country from being used, is now the design; and, to accomplish that purpose, it becomes necessary to force the local paper of the States upon the Federal Government. The passage of this bill is indispensable to the success of Mr. Biddle's design, disclosed in the letter from which an extract had been read. He wants the question made between a national currency of United States Bank notes, and a national currency of local bank notes. He knows that between these two the United States Bank notes will prevail; that they will conquer, that they will whip, yes, whip like a dog, your national currency of local bank notes. We, on the other hand, want the question made between paper and gold, knowing that the country will sustain gold against paper; and these are the questions which are now to be decided by this bill. This bill will make the question in the form wished by the friends of the Bank of the United States, and will insure them the triumph to which they look for the re-establishment of the Bank of the United States and restoration of its political friends to power.

Sir, I have performed a duty to myself, not pleasant, but necessary. This bill is to be an era in our legislation and in our political history. It is to be a point upon which the future age will be thrown back, and from which future consequences will be traced. I separate myself from it; I wash my hands of it; I oppose it. I am one of those who promised gold, not paper. I promised the currency of the constitution, not the currency of corporations. I did not join in putting down the Bank of the United States, to put up a wilderness of local banks. I did not join in putting down the paper currency of a national bank, to put up a national paper currency of a thousand local banks. I did not strike Cæsar, to make Antony master of Rome.

President and Vice President elect.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of taking up and acting on the resolution submitted by him for the appointment of a joint committee to count the votes for President and Vice President. This motion having been agreed to, and Mr. GRUNDY's resolution being before the Senate,

Mr. GRUNDY had no objections to the inquiry proposed by the amendment; and he thought that some such provision as that proposed by the Senator from Kentucky would be very proper. He had seen in the public papers a statement charging that some of the electors who voted in the late presidential election held offices under the General Government, and had made inquiries for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of the matter. The information he had been able to collect related to two cases only; and as to these, the report had been founded altogether on a misapprehension.

Mr. CLAY offered the following amendment:

"And, also, to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election, contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the constitution. And if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any, and what, provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance, in future, of that section of the constitution."

Mr. HUBBARD wished a strict inquiry to be instituted, and measures to be adopted to guard against the occurrence of such a violation of the constitution as the Senator from Kentucky referred to. As it had been stated that two of the electors in his State (New Hampshire) held offices under the General Government, and were consequently ineligible, he was happy to state to the Senate that there was no foundation whatever for the report.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY was adopted, and the resolution, thus amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the committee be appointed by the Chair; and Messrs. GRUNDY, CLAY, and WRIGHT, were selected.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28.

Retirement of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT, after the reading of the journal, addressed the Senate as follows:

Senators: The period is at hand which is to terminate the official relation that has existed between us, and I leave, probably never to return to it, a body with which I have been long connected; where some remain whom I found here fifteen years ago, and where, in the progress of public duties, personal associations have arisen never to be forgotten. From such scenes I cannot retire without emotion. Nor can I give to the Senate the usual opportunity of choosing another to preside for a time over their deliberations, without referring to the manner in which I have endeavored to discharge a most gratifying and honorable trust connected with the office to which my country called me.

Entering upon it with unaffected diffidence, well knowing how little my studies had been directed to its peculiar duties, I was yet strengthened by the determination, then expressed, so to discharge the authority with which I was invested, as "best to protect the rights, to respect the feelings, and to guard the reputations, of all who would be affected by its exercise." I was sure that, if successful in this, I should be pardoned for errors which I could hardly expect to avoid.

In the interval that has since elapsed, it has been our lot in this assembly to pass through scenes of unusual excitement: the intense interest on absorbing topics, which has pervaded our whole community, could not be unfelt within these walls. The warmth of political parties, natural in such times, the unguarded ardor of sudden debate, and the collisions seldom to be separated from the invaluable privilege of free discussion, have not been unfrequently mingled with the more tranquil tenor of ordinary legislation. I cannot hope that, in emergencies like these, I have always been so fortunate as to satisfy every one around me; yet I permit myself to think that the extent to which my decisions have been approved by the Senate is some evidence that my efforts justly to administer their rules have not been vain; and I conscientiously cherish the conviction, that on no occasion have I departed from my early resolution, or been regardless of what was due to the rights or the feelings of the members of this body.

Though I may henceforth be separated from the Senate, I can never cease to revert with peculiar interest to my long connection with it. In every situation in my future life I shall remember with a just pride the evidences of approbation and confidence which I have here received; and as an American citizen, devotedly attached to the institutions of my country, I must always regard with becoming and sincere respect a branch of our Government invested with such extensive powers, and designed by our forefathers to accomplish such important results.

Indulging an ardent wish that every success may await you in performing the exalted and honorable duties of your public trust, and offering my warmest prayers that prosperity and happiness may be constant attendants on each of you, along the future paths of life, I respectfully bid you farewell.

Election of President pro tem.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a President pro tem.

The number of votes cast was 37; necessary to a choice 19. Mr. KING of Alabama had 26, Mr. SOUTHARD 7, Mr. CLAY 1, Mr. PRENTISS 1, Mr. EWING of Ohio, 1, Mr. BUCHANAN 1.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, being thus duly elected President pro tem. of the Senate, was conducted to the Chair by Mr. BENTON, and addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate: To be again called to preside over the deliberations of this august assembly fills my heart with the liveliest emotions of gratitude. When at the last session it pleased the Senate to place me in this exalted situation, I solemnly pledged myself to discharge the duties it devolved on me, without favor and without partiality. I felt conscious that I had done so; but could any thing add to the grateful sense I entertain of the honor you have again conferred on me, it will be found in the unequivocal testimony you have this day borne, that I had faithfully redeemed that pledge. The Senate of the United States, gentlemen, is, from its very organization, the great conservative body in this republic. Here is the strong citadel of liberty. To this body the intelligent and the virtuous, throughout our wide-spread country, look with confidence for an unwavering and unflinching resistance to the encroachments of power on the one hand, and the effervescence of popular excitement on the other. Unawed and unseduced, it should firmly maintain the constitution in its purity, and present an impregnable barrier against every attack on that sacred instrument, come it from what quarter it may. The demon of faction should find no abiding place in this chamber, but every heart and every head should be wholly occupied in advancing the general welfare, and preserving unimpaired, the national honor. To insure success, gentlemen, in the discharge of our high duties, we must command the confidence and receive the support of the people. Calm deliberation, courtesy towards each other, order and decorum in debate, will go far, very far, to inspire that confidence and command that support. It becomes my duty, gentlemen, to banish (if practicable) from this hall all personal altercation; to check, at once, every remark of a character personally offensive; to preserve order, and promote harmony. These duties, as far as my powers will permit, I shall unhesitatingly perform. I earnestly solicit your co-operation, gentlemen, in aiding my efforts promptly to put down every species of disorder. For your kindness, gentlemen, I tender you my grateful acknowledgments.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the President of the United States and the House of Representatives that the Senate have elected the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING their President pro tem.

Treasury Circular.

The bill designating and limiting the funds which shall be receivable in payment for the public revenues was taken up, being on its third reading.

Mr. WALKER said: Before replying to the indictment preferred by the honorable Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) against the Committee on Public Lands, it is proper to recur to the facts and circumstances under which this controversy originated. At an early period of the session, the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. EWING,) introduced a resolution to rescind the Treasury order. This resolution was very fully discussed, and especially by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) but Mr. W. had taken no part in this discussion.

[In the progress of the debate upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, a substitute was offered, as an amendment, by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES.) This substitute was advocated by that Senator, as in consonance with the President's recommendation, to render the legislation of Congress in the collection of the federal revenue auxiliary to the suppression of all notes of a smaller denomination than twenty dollars, and a consequent enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver. The Senator from Virginia had regarded the Treasury order as a temporary measure, to meet a pressing emergency, and as having in a great degree performed its office.]

Mr. W. had still refrained from embarking in the discussion upon this question. Several Senators, however, had expressed their opinions, and great difficulties appeared to be presented against any satisfactory adjustment of this question. Under these circumstances, several Senators, now within the sound of his voice, had proposed to him (Mr. W.) to refer both resolutions to the Committee on Public Lands. To this reference, Mr. W. said, he had at first objected, upon the grounds that the Committee on Public Lands was engaged in the laborious examination of another question, and that the subject of designating the funds receivable for the public dues belonged more appropriately to the Committee on Finance. Upon further consultation, however, with several Senators friendly to the administration, Mr. W. had at length reluctantly assented to the proposed reference, which was accordingly made by the vote of the Senate, including that of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.) No other report than that which was made, so far as Mr. W. was concerned, could have been anticipated; for to every Senator with whom Mr. W. had conversed, he had expressed his concurrence in the provisions, substantially, of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES;) and at the last session, when the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) introduced a resolution requiring payments of the public lands in gold and silver only, the Senate would well recollect that he (Mr. W.) had then expressed his opposition to that resolution, and so had a majority of the Senators now composing the Committee on Public Lands. When, then, the Senator from Missouri voted for this reference, he could not justly have anticipated any other report than that which was made by the committee. Why, then, did the Senator from Missouri vote for this reference, and then denounce the committee for making the only report which he could have expected, in conformity with their previously avowed opinions? Mr. W. said it became his duty, as chairman of this committee, and as their organ, to report a bill containing substantially the provisions of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia. Again, the subject had been discussed in the Senate, but Mr. W. had not participated in the debate; and the bill, by a large majority, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and now, when, by the usual rules of parliamentary debate, the contest might well be considered as terminated, the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) before the vote on the final passage, had made a very elaborate argument against the measure. To all this Mr. W. would make no objection; but when that Senator, having exhausted the argument, or having none to offer, had indulged in violent and intemperate denunciation of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the report made by him as their organ, Mr. W. could not withhold the expression of his surprise and astonishment. Mr. W. said it was his good fortune to be upon terms of the kindest personal intercourse with every Senator, and these friendly relations should not be interrupted by any aggression upon his part. And now, Mr. W. said, he called upon the whole Senate to bear witness, as he was sure they all cheerfully would, that in this controversy he was not the aggressor, and that nothing had been done or said by him to provoke the wrath of the Senator from Missouri, unless, indeed, to differ from him in opinion upon any subject constituted an offence in the mind of that Senator. If such were the views of that gentleman, if he was prepared to immolate every Senator who would not worship the same images of gold and silver which decorated the political chapel of the honorable gentleman, Mr. W. was fearful that the Senator from Missouri would do execution upon every member of the Senate but himself, and be left here alone in his glory. Mr. W. said he recurred to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri with feelings of regret, rather than of anger or excitement; and that he could not but hope, that when the Senator from Missouri had calmly reflected upon this subject, he would himself see much to regret in the course he had pursued in relation to the Committee on Public Lands, and much to recall that he had uttered under feelings of temporary excitement. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) being deeply solicitous to preserve unbroken the ranks of the democratic party in this body, participating with the people in grateful recollection of the distinguished services rendered by the Senator from Missouri to the democracy of the Union, he would pass by many of the remarks made by that Senator on this subject.

[Mr. BENTON here rose from his chair, and demanded, with much warmth, that Mr. WALKER should not pass by one of them. Mr. W. asked, What one? Mr. B. replied, in an angry tone, Not one, sir. Then Mr. W. said he would examine them all, and in a spirit of perfect freedom; that he would endeavor to return blow for blow; and that, if the Senator from Missouri desired, as it appeared he did, an angry controversy with him, in all its consequences, in and out of this House, he could be gratified.]

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) why has the Senator from Missouri assailed the Committee on Public Lands, and himself, as its humble organ? He was not the author of this measure, so much denounced by the Senator from Missouri, nor had he said one word upon the subject. The measure originated with the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES.) He was the author of the measure, and had been, and still was, its able, zealous, and successful advocate. Why, then, had the Senator from Missouri assailed him, (Mr. W.,) and permitted the author of the measure to escape unpunished? Sir, are the arrows which appear to be aimed by the Senator from Missouri at the humble organ of the Committee on Public Lands, who reported this bill, intended to inflict a wound in another quarter? Is one Senator the apparent object of assault, when another is designed as the real victim? Sir, when the Senator from Missouri, without any provocation, like a thunderbolt from an unclouded sky, broke upon the Senate in a perfect tempest of wrath and fury, bursting upon his poor head like a tropical tornado, did he intend to sweep before the avenging storm another individual more obnoxious to his censure?

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) the Senator from Missouri has thrice repeated the prayer, "God save the country from the Committee on Public Lands;" but Mr. W. fully believed that if the prayer of the country could be heard within these walls, it would be, God save us from the wild, visionary, ruinous, and impracticable schemes of the Senator of Missouri, for exclusive gold and silver currency; and such is not only the prayer of the country, but of the Senate, with scarcely a dissenting voice. Sir, if the Senator from Missouri could, by his mandate, in direct opposition to the views of the President, heretofore expressed, sweep from existence all the banks of the States, and establish his exclusive constitutional currency of gold and silver, he would bring upon this country scenes of ruin and distress without a parallel—an immediate bankruptcy of nearly every debtor, and of almost every creditor to whom large amounts were due, a prodigious depreciation in the price of all property and all products, and an immediate cessation by States and individuals of nearly every work of private enterprise or public improvement. The country would be involved in one universal bankruptcy, and near the grave of the nation's prosperity would perhaps repose the scattered fragments of those great and glorious institutions which give happiness to millions here, and hopes to millions more of disenthralment from despotic power. Sir, in resistance to the power of the Bank of the United States, in opposition to the re-establishment of any similar institution, the Senator from Missouri would find Mr. W. with him; but he could not enlist as a recruit in this new crusade against the banks of his own and every other State in the Union. These institutions, whether for good or evil, are created by the States, cherished and sustained by them, in many cases owned in whole or in part by the States, and closely united with their prosperity; and what right have we to destroy them? What right had he, a humble servant of the people of Mississippi, to say to his own, or any other State, your State legislation is wrong—your State institutions, your State banks, must be annihilated, and we will legislate here to effect this object. Are we the masters or servants of the sovereign States, that we dare speak to them in language like this—that we dare attempt to prostrate here those institutions which are created and maintained by those very States which we represent on this floor? These may be the opinions entertained by some Senators of their duty to the States they represent, but they were not his (Mr. W.'s) views or his opinions. He was sincerely desirous to co-operate with his State in limiting any dangerous powers of the banks, in enlarging the circulation of gold and silver, and in suppressing the small-note currency, so as to avoid that explosion which was to be apprehended from excessive issues of bank paper. But a total annihilation of all the banks of his own State, now possessing a chartered capital of near forty millions of dollars, would, Mr. W. knew, produce almost universal bankruptcy, and was not, he believed, anticipated by any one of his constituents.

Treasury Circular—Funds receivable for Public Dues.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us that this measure of the committee is a repeal of the constitution, by authorizing the receipt of paper money in revenue payments. If so, then the constitution never has had an existence; for the period cannot be designated when paper money was not so receivable by the Federal Government. This species of money was expressly made receivable for the public dues by an act of Congress, passed immediately after the adoption of the constitution, and which remained in force until eighteen hundred and eleven. It was so received, as a matter of practice, from eighteen hundred and eleven until eighteen hundred and sixteen, when, again, by an act of Congress then passed, and which has just expired, it was so authorized to be received during all that period. Now, although these acts have expired, there is that which is equivalent to a law still in force, expressly authorizing the notes of the specie-paying banks of the States to be received in revenue payments. It is the joint resolution of eighteen hundred and sixteen, adopted by both Houses of Congress, and approved by President Madison. That joint resolution is in these words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

Commenting upon this resolution, the Senator from Missouri, in his speech of December last, declared:

"This is the law, continued Mr. Benton, and nothing can be plainer than the right of selection which it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury."

"The words of the law are clear; the practice under it has been uniform and uninterrupted from the date of its passage to the present day. For twenty years, and under three Presidents, all the Secretaries of the Treasury have acted alike. Each has made selections, permitting the notes of some specie-paying banks to be received, and forbidding others."

Here this joint resolution is admitted by the Senator from Missouri to be "the law," and that the practice under it has been uniform to receive the notes of specie-paying banks. If, then, to authorize the reception of the notes of specie-paying banks in payment of the public dues be a violation of the constitution, it is obvious that the constitution never has had any existence, except in the golden visions of the honorable Senator from Missouri. Sir, what more is done by the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and now ordered to be engrossed by the Senate, than had been already accomplished by the joint resolution of 1816? This bill, as thus engrossed, is as follows:

"An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided: that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank."

Now, the principal difference between the provisions of this bill and the joint resolution of 1816 consists in the exclusion by the bill of notes of small denominations from revenue payments. Yet the Senator from Missouri would leave the resolution of 1816 in full force, unrepealed, unmodified, and yet objects to the measure now before us. The Senator from Missouri would have remain in force a resolution of Congress, by which the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, receive for the public dues bank notes, even of one dollar; and yet he objects to a measure by which that discretion is limited to the receipt of notes of the higher denominations. By the resolution, as it stands, the Secretary of the Treasury may collect the whole public revenue in bank paper; by the bill, as proposed, a portion of the public dues must be collected in gold and in silver; and yet the Senator from Missouri objects, and denounces the measure as a repeal of the constitution, by authorizing the payment of the public dues in bank paper, as if it were not authorized already by the joint resolution of 1816, which, as regards the customs, is untouched even by the Treasury order. Strange inconsistency! singular delusion! But has it come to this: that Congress has surrendered an unlimited discretion, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and must not now interfere? That, in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, it is all right that the Secretary of the Treasury should possess the discretionary power of receiving or rejecting bank paper in payment of the public dues; of discriminating between different individuals and different branches of the public revenue; of putting up and putting down bank paper at his pleasure—but that for Congress to interpose and define or limit that discretion is a violation of the constitution. That for the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the currency at his pleasure, and put up and put down State banks and their paper, is all right; but that for Congress to limit and define his power, in these respects, is unconstitutional. The Secretary of the Treasury, then, must be above Congress, and above the constitution, possessing an omnipotent, unchangeable, irreversible power on this subject. Is not the Senate astounded by the avowal and advocacy of such doctrines upon this floor—doctrines worthy of the Polignacs of France, and of the Stuarts of England, but wholly incompatible with the genius of our institutions, and directly contradictory, as shall be shown hereafter, to the opinions upon this subject of our patriotic President? Are the American people prepared to sustain these doctrines—doctrines which are essentially monarchical, which take from Congress all power over this subject; which deny their authority, the authority of the representatives of the people and of the States, and erect the Secretary of the Treasury into a dictator, whose mandates we may not control or alter? Sir, if the Secretary of the Treasury may thus abolish our power on this subject, and render it unconstitutional for us to interfere with his orders, why may not every other Secretary of every other Department claim similar power and the same exemption from our control? Such doctrines are the very essence of despotism, and now for the first time have they been openly avowed upon this floor and in this country. Tell me not, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury may receive or reject bank paper at his pleasure; may receive it, as he now does, for customs, and reject it in payment of the public lands; and that it is unconstitutional for Congress to regulate, define, and limit, that discretion. Standing upon the broad basis of the constitution, he would resist such doctrines; for they can only be maintained by a total overthrow of free government, and the establishment of arbitrary and despotic power.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us that he objects to the bill of the committee as an act of Congress, when it should have been a resolution. Sir, does that Senator contend that in directions given by Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, there is any distinction between a be it enacted, and a be it resolved, by the Congress of the United States? The constitution prescribes no such form, and recognizes no such distinction. It requires joint resolutions, except for adjournment, as well as laws, to be approved by the President; and when this is done, they have the same obligatory energy in limiting and directing the acts of our public agents. Sir, when the Senator from Missouri urged this new objection, he seemed to have forgotten his speech of December last, in which, when commenting upon the joint resolution of 1816, he declared "this is the law;" but now that Senator would have us believe that a joint resolution is not equivalent to a law of Congress. But if there be this distinction between a law and a joint resolution, in support of this plea of abatement, upon which the Senator from Missouri now relies, it shall be shown, before the close of this address, that the Senator from Missouri has himself, within the last twelve months, proposed laws, and amendments to laws, expressly authorizing the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues; and, consequently, if his own argument be true, has proposed a repeal of the constitution. Before, however, proceeding to this branch of the subject, let me ask, if the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues be a violation of the constitution, then not only have Congress, but this administration, and every one that preceded it, uniformly violated the constitution. Down to the period of the Treasury order of July last, this administration has constantly received bank paper in payment of the federal revenue, and is still receiving it, even under the Treasury order, in payment of customs. The argument, then, of the Senator from Missouri, is a bitter denunciation of the whole course of the President on this subject preceding the Treasury order, and it is also a denunciation of the principles of that order, so far as it does not exclude bank paper in payment of customs. The administration is now receiving bank paper in payment of customs, and no change on this subject is proposed by the President; and yet the Senator from Missouri tells us, that for Congress to authorize the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues is to repeal the constitution. Here is conclusive evidence that the Senator from Missouri goes far beyond the views of the President upon this subject. But the Senator from Missouri objects to the proviso of the bill introduced by the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw the deposits from any bank which refuses to pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, the notes of such specie-paying banks, receivable under this bill, as the bank receives on general deposit. This proviso is a wholesome restriction upon the abuse of power by the deposit banks. It will curtail, and was intended to curtail, the power of the deposit banks. It will arrest an odious monopoly, by preventing the deposit banks from making their notes the only paper receivable for the public dues; thus rendering, for all practical purposes, the paper of these banks the only currency of the Federal Government, to the manifest inconvenience of the people, and the severe oppression of other State banks equally as solvent as these institutions. It will prevent an oligarchy of deposit banks from controlling the currency, and exercising a power over the prosperity of the country quite as despotic as that possessed by the Bank of the United States. If we reject this proviso we shall only have disenthralled the American people from the Bank of the United States; one master, to substitute eighty masters; a combination of which, uncontrolled by this proviso, might hold in their power the prosperity of this nation. This same power was confided, in relation to the removal of the deposits, to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the Bank of the United States; and the existence, as well as the exercise, of this power, by that officer, was deemed, by the Senator from Missouri, most wise and salutary. Yet the Senator from Missouri now objects to this power, and says he would not intrust it even to the administration of the President or of his successor. Indeed! The Senator from Missouri would not confide to the Secretary of the Treasury the necessary power to remove the public moneys from any deposit bank, thus abusing its authority, and oppressing the people, in the contingency referred to in the proviso; and yet he would permit the joint resolution of 1816 to remain unrepealed and unmodified, by which the Secretary of the Treasury might, at his discretion, regulate the whole currency of the country, receive or reject bank paper at his option, change and rechange his orders upon this subject, introduce or exclude the currency of gold and silver, and exercise over this whole subject powers unregulated and uncontrolled. Sir, the Senator from Missouri stops at the molehill of this proviso, whilst he surmounts the mountain which rises to our view, upon a survey of the enormous powers which that Senator would intrust, without any regulation, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. W. said he would now proceed to prove that the Senator from Missouri had himself originally proposed something similar to the provisions of the bill which he now denounces as a violation of the constitution; and especially that he had directly proposed, by resolution as well as laws, to authorize the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues; and, until very recently, limited himself to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars, as proposed by the bill of the committee. And, first, Mr. W. read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 9th April, 1834, as follows:

"The following motion, submitted by Mr. Benton, was considered:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House, respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made * * * * * 3. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenue,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small-note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country."

Here it will be perceived that the Senator from Missouri then considered the joint resolution of 1816 as requiring alterations by Congress, so as "to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period." Here, then, was a direct proposition, by that Senator, to do precisely what is done by the bill of the committee, as regards the exclusion from revenue payments of notes only "under twenty dollars." Why, then, does the Senator now denounce what was then his own project as a repeal of the constitution?

His project then was, not as it now is, to exclude all but gold and silver from revenue payments, and cut loose the Federal Government from the paper system, but the very reverse, namely: to authorize bank notes not under twenty dollars to be received in revenue payments. And how received? Why, by regulations then proposed by him, to be made by Congress—by alterations of the joint resolution of 1816. The honorable Senator then also proposed to make "the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small-note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country." The terms "common currency," as distinguished from exclusive currency, are italicized in the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, and the suppression confined to "the small-note circulation." This suppression of "the small-note circulation," of notes under twenty dollars, was to be effected by the instrumentality of the revenue system of the United States. Now, is not all this precisely what is proposed in the bill of the committee? And are not that bill and this resolution of the honorable Senator substantially the same? Since this period, a great revolution appears to have taken place in the opinion of the honorable Senator, both as regards questions relating to the currency and to constitutional law. Then, that Senator was satisfied to encourage the circulation of bank notes not under twenty dollars, and to receive them in revenue payments. Now, nothing will answer his purpose but gold and silver; and, to authorize any thing else to be received in revenue payments is denounced as a repeal of the constitution! If this doctrine be true, then the Senator from Missouri stands upon the Senate journals self-convicted of an attempt to repeal the constitution.

But the Senator from Missouri has embodied the twenty-dollar principle as connected with the federal revenue, in an act of Congress, not a resolution.

Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 6th of April, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of a bill entitled 'An act making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners,' &c. The following amendment, proposed by Mr. Benton, being under consideration:

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no bank note of less denomination than twenty dollars shall hereafter be offered in payment, in any case whatsoever, in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him."

This section was, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, embodied in the act of Congress referred to, and is now the law of the land, having passed both Houses of Congress, and received the sanction of the President. This provision, it is true, is confined to payments by the United States. But if the United States, under this law, are to pay out bank notes not under twenty dollars, how can this be done if they are not authorized to receive such notes? What could be more contradictory than a bill, the first section of which should authorize notes not under twenty dollars to be paid by the United States, and the second section of which should prohibit the United States from receiving in payment any thing but gold and silver? How could the United States, by law, in all time to come, pay out that which by law they were debarred from receiving? The Senator from Missouri, then, has, by law, connected the Federal Government with the paper system. This section, adopted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, would come in very properly as an additional clause in the bill now before us; but as an additional proviso to the bill, which shall be quoted hereafter, proposed by that Senator, to re-establish a currency of gold and silver for the Federal Government, it would be ridiculous and contradictory.

Mr. W. stated that the Senator from Missouri had still further committed himself on this subject. He had not only directly countenanced the payment of the federal revenue in bank notes, but had himself proposed, at the last session, the creation by Congress, in this District, of new banks, authorized to issue notes not less than twenty dollars. Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 4th June, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

"On motion of Mr. Benton to recommit the bill, with instructions to report separate bills for the incorporation of new banks, with small capitals, adapted to the capacity of the District to sustain specie banks, and strictly limited to the business of the place; the said incorporations to contain, among other provisions, the following principles: 4. The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars; and all notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, by other banks, to be prohibited from circulation within the District. 5. All the notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one-half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank."

Now, Mr. W. would ask, if Congress could by law establish even in this District a certain number of banks authorized to issue notes of a certain denomination, could it not exercise the smaller power of authorizing the reception of bank notes in revenue payments? But, Mr. W. said, he quoted this to show that even at this late period the Senator from Missouri was not prepared to do execution on all banks and all bank paper. There were some curious matters connected with these propositions of the Senator from Missouri. His fifth proposition required "all notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one-half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank;" and this same provision the honorable Senator also proposed to apply to "the deposit banks," "in consideration of being made or continued depositories of the public moneys." Sir, the honorable Senator from Missouri would have the banks pay in a currency better than that required by the constitution. By that instrument, gold or silver is a legal tender in payment of debts, and a bank note is only an evidence of a debt due by the bank to the holder of the note; but the honorable Senator would require the banks to pay their notes in gold and silver, one-half of each metal. When a note of a thousand dollars shall be presented to a bank for redemption in specie, it is hoped the honorable Senator will not require those of less personal prowess than himself to carry away five hundred dollars in silver, when the bank otherwise might pay the whole amount in gold. Such equal division of the precious metals, however beautiful in theory, would be most inconvenient in practice; and if the honorable Senator is so equally attached to gold and silver as to be resolved on having a precisely equal circulation of each, there is one way which, if it were not presumptuous, Mr. W. could recommend to his serious consideration. It was this. That Senator took great delight in exhibiting a new and favorite coin of his, which he called billon. Mr. W. hoped he pronounced the word correctly; he was sure the Senator from Missouri did. This coin was composed partly of copper, and partly of silver, though not precisely one-half of each; the Senator having suffered great injustice to be done to the silver, by permitting a great preponderance of copper, a very inferior metal, not recognized by the constitution as a tender. Now, Mr. W. would suggest, that if the Senator from Missouri would have coined a new species of billon, composed of gold and silver, precisely one-half of each in value, would it not answer his purpose? Mr. W. would not warrant that it would answer, but would only suggest it to the consideration of the Senator from Missouri, as a substitute for his proposed entire equalization of the circulation of gold and silver, by compelling the banks to redeem their notes in one-half of each metal, especially as these banks might not find it very convenient to comply with these requisitions, and as a greater quantity of one metal than of the other might find its way, from time to time, out of the country, and thus destroy this metallic equilibrium of the honorable Senator.

Thus far the Senator from Missouri seemed to have confined his views to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars in revenue payments. But, on the 10th of June last, he changed his position, and introduced into the Senate the following bill:

"A bill to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received or offered in payment, on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: of less denomination than twenty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1837; of less denomination than fifty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1838; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1839; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1840; of less denomination than one thousand dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1841; and none of any denomination from and after the 3d day of March, 1842.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, violate, contravene, or in any way elude, or attempt to elude, the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending shall be liable to be dismissed from the service; and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of public moneys."

And here Mr. W. would remark that, by this bill, bank notes were permitted to be received in revenue payments until the 3d of March, 1842. If, then, the argument of the Senator from Missouri be correct, that to authorize, by act of Congress, the receipt of bank notes in revenue payments be a repeal of the constitution, this bill of the honorable Senator should have been entitled a repeal of the constitution until the 3d of March, 1842. The provisions of this bill were somewhat remarkable. All bank notes under twenty dollars were immediately excluded; the twenty-dollar notes, being the next greatest violators of the constitution, were executed in March, 1837; those of fifty dollars in March, 1838; those of one thousand dollars were repealed till March, 1841; and in March, 1842, execution was done on all "bank notes and paper currency of every description," and "the currency of the constitution" was re-established. Now, how was this prodigious revolution to be effected? Why, by dismissing from office any officer of the Government who should receive or offer in payment any thing but gold and silver, by which all were to be excluded but converts to the metallic currency of the honorable Senator; and by discontinuing, as a depository of the public moneys, any bank which should commit a similar offence. Now, does any Senator believe that any bank would accept the deposits on such terms? That it must pay out the public moneys in nothing but gold and silver, and transfer the precious metals from place to place, thousands of miles, at the will of the Government. Recollect that not only "bank notes," but also "paper currency of every description," is excluded by this bill; and, consequently, bank drafts would be as effectually refused by this bill as bank notes. Indeed, the authority to receive "funds," Eastern or Western, from any bank, constitutes one of the Senator's objections to the bill of the committee. Let us suppose, then, that the Government has two millions in silver at Natchez, which it desires at four different points, each one thousand miles distant. Will it transport these wagon loads of silver from point to point, where the money is wanted by the Government? for, recollect the Government must have the hard money, for it is to pay out as well as receive nothing but this. Is this practicable, or is there a bank in the Union that would accept the deposits on such terms as these? The banks are to be continued by this bill as depositories of the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, and yet we are to reject the paper of our own agents. The amount of the public revenue of last year was forty-seven millions of dollars. Now, all this we are to intrust to the custody of the banks; we are to trust them to the amount of forty-seven millions of dollars; but to refuse to receive any portion of their paper, in other words, trust them for forty-seven millions of dollars, and refuse them credit even for a twenty-dollar note. We are first asked to employ the banks as fiscal agents, and then set about the work of their destruction. Sir, the passage of this bill would insure the abandonment of the deposit bank system; and, as fiscal agents we must have, it would insure the re-establishment of a Bank of the United States, with all its oppressive powers. And here let me ask, can any thing be more inconsistent, as well as impracticable, than to employ the State banks as fiscal agents, as depositories of the public moneys, and yet reject their paper? If it be unconstitutional to receive one dollar of the public dues in the paper of any bank, is it not equally unconstitutional to make these unconstitutional banks, issuing this unconstitutional currency, our fiscal agents for the whole amount of our revenue, by bank credits? Under our deposit bill, when we confide money to a deposit bank, have we not previously taken its bond to repay? And if we take its bond, why not its paper? Sir, to carry out the gentleman's doctrine, he should discard the deposit banks as fiscal agents, and employ hundreds of separate individual agents, constantly traversing the country in all directions, with mules or wagons loaded with gold and silver. Such a system, and to this it would come, would require an army of agents greater than our whole standing army, to receive, transfer, and disburse, the forty-seven millions of gold and silver, the amount of this year's federal revenue. Such a system would enlarge the patronage and power of the General Government to an almost unlimited extent, and, if successful, paralyze the State Governments, by the destruction of State banks, State credit, and State institutions. But the whole system is impracticable, and it is time that the country should know that such is the opinion of the whole Senate, with the single exception of the Senator from Missouri himself. Sir, that Senator may rally three or four votes against the bill of the committee, but it will be from objections to the details of the measure, and not because they adopt the opinions of the Senator from Missouri on this subject. If the constitution is repealed by the reception of bank notes in revenue payments, why did the Senator from Missouri never come to the rescue till the 10th of June, 1836; and why did he then permit the session to pass by without any vote upon the measure; and why has he not reintroduced it at this session? The fact is, and the country should know it, that the Senator from Missouri can get no vote for this bill of his, except his own. Now, at this moment, he may bring it forward, or at any period of the session; we are anxious he should do so; and all we ask is a vote by ayes and noes, to show the American people that the Senator from Missouri stands alone on this subject. Now, the measure of the Senator from Missouri is not only impracticable, but defeats the great object of suppressing the small-note currency, and enlarging the circulation of gold and silver. The Federal Government, aided by its revenue, by the depositories of its money, and by State legislation, might gradually suppress all bank notes under twenty dollars, and gold and silver would then necessarily fill the vacuum, and constitute the common currency of the country in the ordinary transactions between the dealer and consumer. This would disarm the State banks of nearly all power to do evil, arrest excessive issues of bank paper, substitute gold and silver for all that great portion of the circulation of banks which consists of notes under twenty dollars, render and preserve the banks sound and solvent, our currency stable, and put an end to all apprehension of that explosion of the paper system with which many believe we are now threatened. This was a practical reform of the currency, and one which, Mr. W. said, he was deeply solicitous to see effected; but it can only be effected by the co-operation with Congress of the State Legislatures. The reform, too, must be by gradual and successive steps.

Treasury Circular—Funds receivable for Public Dues.

[SENATE.]

Therefore, the bill only proposed the refusal of the five-dollar notes after the 30th December, 1839, and the refusal of the ten-dollar notes after the 30th December, 1841, periods when Congress will be in session; and if the States will not then co-operate with us in this reform, we must, as the representatives of their wishes, repeal or modify the measure.

But will the measure of the Senator from Missouri effect any useful purpose? It holds out to the State banks no inducements to suppress their small-note currency. It is a declaration of war by this Government against the people of the States and the banks of the States. It demands that, out of a gold and silver currency in circulation, of twenty-eight millions, (as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury,) we should pay in this currency a revenue of forty-seven millions, according to the receipts of this year. It demands, then, an impossibility, unless an explosion of the State banks is created by draining them of their specie. It demands that this gold and silver be, at all the various points of collection or payment, at all times, in sufficient quantities to make these revenue payments and disbursements also. It would withdraw gold and silver from general circulation, and confine its use almost wholly to revenue payments and disbursements. It is, finally, an effort, on the part of this Government, to render all the notes of all the State banks uncurrent within the limits of the States, and is equivalent to a demand made by Congress upon the State banks to surrender their charters, or upon the State Legislatures to repeal them; and Mr. W. said he had never been authorized by the State of Mississippi to demand, in their name, a repeal or overthrow of any of their State institutions. To the extent that he was now willing to go, Mr. W. said he had distinctly expressed himself in an address preceding his election: in favor of the abandonment of the small-note currency, in favor of receiving the notes "for larger amounts" "of the solvent State banks," for "all dues to the National Government;" in favor of the enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver, and against "an exclusively metallic currency." Mr. W. said, having been elected with the open avowal of these doctrines, he hoped he stood not only upon the basis of his own previously expressed views, but also upon those of his constituents, in supporting the present bill, and opposing that of the Senator from Missouri.

Where is the distinction, in principle, as regards the reception of bank paper on public account, between the two provisions? And the Senator from Missouri, in thus denouncing the bill of the committee as a repeal of the constitution, denounces directly the President of the United States. Congress, no more than a State Legislature, can make any thing but gold or silver a tender in payment of debts by one citizen to another; but that Congress, or a

State Legislature, or an individual, may waive their constitutional rights, and receive bank paper or drafts, in payment of any debt, is a principle of universal adoption in theory and practice, and never doubted by any one until at the present session by the Senator from Missouri. The distinction of the Senator in this respect was as incomprehensible to him (Mr. W.) as he believed it was to every Senator, and, indeed, was discernible only by the magnifying powers of a solar microscope. It was a point-no-point, which, like the logarithmic spiral, or asymptote of the hyperbolic curve, might be forever approached without reaching; an infinitesimal, the ghost of an idea, not only without length, breadth, thickness, shape, weight, or dimensions, but without position—a mere imaginary nothing, which flitted before the bewildered vision of the honorable Senator, when traversing, in his fitful somnambulism, that tessellated pavement of gold, silver, and billon, which that Senator delighted to occupy. Sir, the Senator from Missouri might have heaped mountain-high his piles of metal; he might have swept, in his Quixotic flight, over the banks of the States, putting to the sword their officers, stockholders, directory, and legislative bodies by which they were chartered; he might, in his reveries, have demolished their charters, and consumed their paper by the fire of his eloquence; he might have transacted, in fancy, with a metallic currency of twenty-eight millions in circulation, an actual annual business of fifteen hundred millions, and Mr. W. would not have disturbed his beatific visions, nor would any other Senator—for they were visions only, that could never be realized—but when, descending from his ethereal flights, he seized upon the Committee on Public Lands as criminals, arraigned them as violators of the constitution, and prayed Heaven for deliverance from them, Mr. W. could be silent no longer. Yes, even then he would have passed lightly over the ashes of the theories of the honorable Senator, for, if he desired to make assaults upon any, it would be upon the living, and not the dead; but that Senator, in the opening of his (Mr. W.'s) address, had rejected the olive branch which, upon the urgent solicitation of mutual friends, against his own judgment, he had extended to the honorable Senator. The Senator from Missouri had thus, in substance, declared his "voice was still for war." Be it so; but he hoped the Senate would all recollect that he (Mr. W.) was not the aggressor; and that, whilst he trusted he never would wantonly assail the feelings or reputation of any Senator, he thanked God that he was not so abject or degraded as to submit, with impunity, to unprovoked attacks or unfounded accusations from any quarter. Could he thus submit, he would be unfit to represent the noble, generous, and gallant people, whose rights and interests it was his pride and glory to endeavor to protect, whose honor and character were dearer to him than life itself, and should never be tarnished by any act of his, as one of their humble representatives upon this floor.

Mr. RIVES returned his thanks to Mr. WALKER for his able and satisfactory defence of the bill. He should not be able to add much to what had been said by the honorable Senator, but was desirous of adding his mite in reply to so much of what had so zealously been urged by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON), as had not been touched upon by the chairman of the Land Committee; and, as he understood there were gentlemen on both sides of the question who were desirous of being heard, he suggested the propriety of deferring further debate on the bill to Monday. This was, after some conversation, agreed to.

Thanks to the Vice President.

Mr. BENTON introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate cordially reciprocate the sentiments of personal kindness expressed by MARTIN VAN BUREN, Vice President of the United States, towards the members of this body, upon taking leave of them; and that the thanks of the Senate be presented to him, in testimony of the impartiality, dignity, and ability, with which he has presided over their deliberations, and of their entire approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him as President of the Senate.

Mr. B. suggested the propriety of taking up the resolution and acting upon it at this time.

The CHAIR stating that this could only be done by unanimous consent,

Mr. CALHOUN objected.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his hope that the resolution would be acted on at once.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired whether it was usual to pass a vote of this kind.

Mr. BENTON quoted several precedents to show that it was; whereupon,

Mr. CALHOUN, observing that it was a mere formality, withdrew his objection; and the question being put, the resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

MONDAY, January 30.

American Colonization Society.

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the memorial from the Colonization Society, presented by him on Friday last, expressing the hope that there would be no further debate upon it, and calling for the yeas and nays on the question of taking up; which were ordered.

The question was decided in the negative:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Kent, Knight, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—25.

Treasury Circular.

The bill to designate and limit the funds which shall be receivable for the public revenue was taken up as the special order, and

Mr. RIVES addressed the House at length in its support, and in reply to Mr. BENTON. [This speech was not reported.]

Public Lands.

The question being on Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment to this bill, allowing parents to enter small tracts for their children, to be patented when they should come of age—

The amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN was agreed to.

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Lyon, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Fulton, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Page, Preston, Ruggles, Tipton, Wright—15.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the bill was further amended, so as to allow no one to enter a tract in his own name until he is 21 years old.

Hon. ALEXANDER MOUTON, Senator elect from the State of Louisiana, vice Mr. PORTER, resigned, was qualified and took his seat.

Copyrights to Foreigners.

Mr. CLAY said that he begged leave to present to the Senate a memorial or address from certain living authors of Great Britain. Among the subscribers to it would be recognized some of the most distinguished names in the literary world—names (said he) with which we have been long familiar, and whose admirable productions have often instructed and delighted us all. They represent that, owing to the want of legal protection in the United States, they are deprived of the benefit here of their literary property; that their works are published without any compensation being made to them for their copyrights; that they are frequently altered and mutilated, so as to affect injuriously their reputations; and that an arrangement which they, or some of them, had made with booksellers in the United States, to secure a fair and just remuneration for their labors, had been defeated by the practice of other American booksellers. They therefore request the passage of a law, by which their right of property may be protected.

I am quite sure, (continued Mr. CLAY) that I need not say one word to commend this address to the attentive and friendly consideration of the Senate, and every member of it. Of all classes of our fellow-beings, there is none that has a better right than that of authors and inventors, to the kindness, the sympathy, and the protection of the Government. And surely nothing can be more reasonable than that they should be allowed to enjoy, without interruption for a limited time, the property created by their own genius. Unfortunately, but too often dependent upon that alone, if they are deprived of it, they are bereft of the means of subsistence. The signers of this address may, with more confidence, indulge the hope of the passage of the law which they solicit, from the consideration that, according to the liberality of the British practice, the security of copyright is not restricted to British subjects, but is equally enjoyed by foreigners. And I understand that there are instances of American authors who have availed themselves of it. When we reflect what important parts of the great republic of letters the United States and Great Britain are, and consider their common origin, common language, and similarity of institutions, and of habits of reading, there seems to me to be every motive for reciprocating between the two countries the security of copyrights. Indeed, I do not see any ground of just objection, either in the constitution or sound policy, to the passage of a law tendering to all foreign nations reciprocal security for literary property.

Mr. C. moved that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PRESTON had no doubt of the general propriety of the direction proposed to be given to the memorial; all subjects of this kind were properly brought before the Library Committee. But the subject was one of some difficulty; there was a large and meritorious class of authors in this country, who had a direct interest in securing to the authors of Great Britain the copyright to their works, because copies of these works were sold without the expense of a copyright, and thus came in free and injurious competition with the works of American authors. But, then, publishers had an opposite interest, to seize upon foreign works without price, and republish them. The consequence was, that the labor of foreign authors was converted to the use of publishers here, who often sent into the market a most despicable article in point of execution, entirely unworthy of the state of the arts in this country. Publishers, therefore, had arrayed themselves against the object of this memorial; and the subject, therefore, resolved itself into a complicated question of free trade and protection of the mechanical arts, with which is numbered the art of printing. On this subject Mr. P. was not now prepared to decide. They had two authors to our one, and were, therefore, more interested in the protection of mental labor; while we published three or four books to their one, and were, therefore, more interested in protecting publishers. Mr. P. was understood to suggest that the subject ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee of five, expressing the desire that he might be excused from serving on such committee.

Mr. CALHOUN was aware that the interest of booksellers in the United States was adverse to the object of this memorial; but he did not suppose that it was of a character or nature such as required its rejection. The works for which copyrights would be secured in this country constituted but a small portion of the entire literature of Great Britain or this country; and of the works of the distinguished names on this memorial, the copyright of a great portion had expired, which was, therefore, subject to free publication; and perhaps it would not be thought proper to revive the right in this country. By several living foreign authors, an attempt had been made to secure their property in this country, by designating the booksellers in the United States by whom alone their works were to be published. The attempt, however, proved impracticable, for other booksellers also published their works without license, so as entirely to deprive them of the benefits of such property in this country. Mr. C. thought the proper committee was that on the Judiciary, though he would not object to a select committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN said when this question came to be considered, it would be a vexed and difficult question. He would not discuss it now, but he saw an interest involved far beyond that of publishers, to whose interest he would pay a smaller regard; and that was the interest of the reading people of the United States. Cheap editions of foreign works were now published and sent all over the country so as to be within the reach of every individual; and the effect of granting copyrights asked for by this memorial would be, that the authors who were anxious to have their works appear in a more expensive form would prevent the issuing of these cheap editions; so that the amount of republications of British works in this country, he thought, would be at once reduced to one-half. But to live in fame was as great a stimulus to authors as pecuniary gain; and the question ought to be considered, whether they would not lose as much of fame by the measure asked for, as they would gain in money. It was especially well worthy of the committee to go beyond publishers, and ascertain what would be the effect on the acquisition of knowledge in this vast country.

Mr. GRUNDY's motion to refer the memorial to a special committee was then carried; and the Chair appointed MESSRS. CLAY, PRESTON, BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, and EWING of Ohio, to compose the committee.

SATURDAY, February 4.

Copyrights to Foreigners.

Mr. CLAY presented a list, on parchment, of additional names of British authors to the address which he had submitted to the Senate the other day. He moved that it be printed with the other names attached to the address, and be referred to the select committee raised on that subject; which was accordingly ordered. He also moved the appointment of an additional member of the select committee; which was ordered.

Mr. C. also presented a petition from sundry American authors, praying amendments in the copyright law. They represent the importance of native literature, and the propriety of extending to it reasonable encouragement. They state that, owing to the fact that booksellers in this country can possess themselves of and publish new works as they issue, from time to time, from the British press, without any charge on account of the copyright, American authors of similar works are unable to obtain for their copyrights a fair compensation.

Mr. C. understood that the course of this business was, that American booksellers have their agents in Great Britain, who, as soon as a new work makes its appearance, transmit it to them by the first packet. Sometimes it is received from the packet at the Narrows, and the vessel being detained there a short time, from some cause or other, by the time she arrives at the wharves the work is published and ready for distribution. This extraordinary despatch is effected by means of steam presses, and the hundreds of hands employed by some of the booksellers. The consequence is, that the work is often slovenly published, on bad paper, with bad types, and omitting maps, diagrams, engravings, and other illustrations. This the first publishers feel themselves constrained to do, lest some rivals shall publish a cheaper edition than that which they have issued. Purchased in this defective form, no one can get the genuine production of the British author without sending abroad for it, as is sometimes done.

Mr. C. understood that the business of republishing in this country late British works was principally confined to two highly respectable houses in New York and Philadelphia, of whom he did not mean to say one word in disparagement. They merely availed themselves of the actual state of things, and undoubtedly placed the American public under obligations for supplying them so rapidly and so cheaply with the latest effusions of the British mind.

If the foreign author is justly secured in his rights of property, the practical consequence will probably be, that he will sell his copyright to some American publisher, the work will be carefully and deliberately printed, without mutilation or abstraction, and will be in a condition worthy of preservation.

Mr. C. moved the reference of the petition to the select committee heretofore appointed; which was ordered.

Mr. NILES, referring to the memorial from American authors, said they had gone one step beyond what had ever been done. They were not satisfied with obtaining the right to the productions of their own minds; they asked Congress to prohibit, for their benefit, the use of the productions of others. This he opposed.

Mr. PRESTON was not adverse to granting copyrights to foreign authors. He had formerly expressed himself in favor of this grant to foreign authors, which might have been a motive for sending petitions on the subject; and all his inclinations were still decidedly in favor of the proposed measure. He believed, also, that Congress possessed the constitutional power to pass it, and by that part of the constitution which provides for the promotion of knowledge.

We had been in the daily habit, Mr. P. said, of appropriating to our use the productions of minds beyond the Atlantic, without any recompense. We had luxuriated in the works of Sir Walter Scott without any remuneration to him, at the time when he was toiling night and day to pay a debt; when, if he had received from us the thousandth part of the value of his works, the debt would have been paid. Mr. P. had always regarded this as an instance of ingratitude, which of itself induced him very strongly to the support of this measure.

Mr. CLAY, in reply to Mr. NILES, said he was very glad of the benefit of his suggestions, and they would doubtless receive the special attention of the committee. But he thought he would be satisfied that no such mischief was intended as he supposed. The whole object was to put foreign authors on the same footing on which our own authors are in England. He thought the extension of copyrights would not, on the whole, make any addition to the cost of the books.

The reference and printing were ordered.

Election of President and Vice President—Mode of counting Votes.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the select committee appointed to consider and report on the mode of examining and counting the votes for President and Vice President, and whether any votes have been given by persons not competent under the constitution, made a special report thereon; which was read.

The report states that in some instances not more than four or five electors have been chosen in some of the States, who are officers of the General Government, (deputy post-masters,) and that such votes are, in the opinion of the committee, not in conformity with the provisions of the constitution; but at the same time the few votes thus given will not vary the result of the election, as it was not contemplated by any one that the appointment of one ineligible elector would vitiate the vote of his State. The report concludes with recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: "Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A. B. for President of the United States, ——— votes. If not counted, for A. B. for President of the United States, ——— votes. But in either event A. B. is elected President of the United States." And in the same manner for Vice President.

Mr. NORVELL said that the resolutions were joint resolutions. The first prescribed the usual manner in which the two Houses assembled together on the second Wednesday in February, for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. To this, of course, he had no objection. The second resolution, in relation to the votes of Michigan, declared, in substance, that if they were not essential to the election of a President, they should be announced, but need not be received as good. Their reception, then, as sound votes, depended upon a contingency which it was known would not happen. He called for a division of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, in order that he and his colleague might have an opportunity of recording their votes against the second resolution. Michigan, when the people of that State gave their votes for presidential electors, was a sovereign State, acknowledged to be such by an act of Congress of the United States. She was now, before her electoral votes were to be counted, a sovereign State of this Union, acknowledged to be such by another act of the Congress of the United States. He had, therefore, risen to enter his most solemn protest, in behalf of the people of Michigan, against any decision of this body, or of Congress, which would, even by implication, have the effect of preventing their electoral votes from being counted for President and Vice President of the United States; and upon the motion to adopt the second resolution, he requested that the yeas and nays might be taken.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that the committee were unanimous for reporting the second resolution. The same course had been pursued with regard to the State of Missouri, and under the like circumstances; and when Senators recollected that this was the very place where the rock lies which may destroy this Government, they would perceive that the committee had good reasons for recommending the resolution objected to. Suppose, said Mr. G., the two Houses should differ and separate, and suppose the House should refuse to send for the Senate again: where will be your President or Vice President? Though he had been one of the most anxious for the admission of Michigan, yet he thought it better, under the circumstances, that her vote should not be counted, except in the way provided for by the second resolution. To count the vote could do no good, inasmuch as it would not vary the result; and it might do harm. No man was more anxious than he was for the admission of Michigan; yet he must express the opinion that she was not a State of this Union when she gave her vote.

Mr. NORVELL said that, if this Union should ever receive a shock, as intimated by the Senator from Tennessee, it would arise from the practice of injustice by this Government towards one or more of the States of the confederacy and not from the right decision of such questions as the one now pending. The reception of the votes of a State entitled to vote for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, by whom she, as well as the other States, was to be governed, could never endanger the Union. The result of the late election, he knew, could not be varied by the votes of Michigan; and less hazard would, therefore, be encountered at this time in properly deciding the question upon receiving the votes of States in similar circumstances with Michigan, than at any other time. The case of Missouri, quoted by the Senator from Tennessee in support of the second resolution, was not, upon this point, a case analogous to that of Michigan. Missouri was a State when her electors were chosen, but she was not a State of the Union when the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the electoral votes for President and Vice President. She was not admitted until some months afterwards; but the State of Indiana did present a precisely analogous case to that of Michigan. Indiana, when her electors were chosen, had formed her constitution and State Government; but she was not admitted into the Union until some time in the succeeding December. She became, however, a member of the Union before the electoral votes were counted. When the two Houses assembled, and, in counting the votes, came to those of Indiana, objection was made to their reception. The two Houses separated. Some discussion arose in both on the subject; but, before the point was directly decided by either, a message was sent by the House of Representatives to the Senate, that they were ready to proceed in the count. When they came together again, the votes of Indiana were counted, and recorded among the electoral votes of the other States. Such is exactly the situation of Michigan. But he had not risen to provoke debate. His object was simply to protest against the principle of the second resolution reported by the Senator from Tennessee, and to ask for himself and his colleague the poor privilege of recording their names against it. He did not know that they would be sustained by the vote of any other Senator present.

Mr. CLAY said that the committee had followed exactly the course adopted in the case of Missouri; and the Senators from Michigan would see that there was to be no exclusion of their votes, though no use might be made of them. Whether they were counted or not, the result would be the same. Now, when gentlemen reflected for a moment upon the operations of this Government, the difficulties to be settled, the important questions pending, and especially the one as to the election of a Chief Magistrate, they would see at once the necessity of avoiding doing any thing which would have the effect of creating excitement, or throwing any difficulty in the way at this particular juncture, when they were about to decide on so very important a question as would have to be disposed of on Wednesday next.

With regard, then, to what the Senator from Michigan (Mr. NORVELL) had said as to Michigan being similarly situated to Missouri and Indiana, when they were admitted into the Union, and yet they were permitted to vote, he could not agree with him. The case of Michigan was not exactly that of Missouri, nor that of Indiana. The act of Congress passed admitted her on certain conditions, and, having accepted those conditions, she became a State, and performed all her functions as a State, and had given her votes for President and Vice President; and but for the formality of this resolution, which was deemed necessary by the committee, she was put upon precisely the same footing as the States which had been mentioned. Whilst, then, he admitted there was some slight difference between the case of Michigan and that of Missouri and of Indiana, he could not admit that Michigan should vote, except in the manner pointed out in the resolution; for he thought, under all the circumstances connected with this matter, it would be better to take the course recommended by the committee.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that, notwithstanding what was said by gentlemen to the contrary, during the debate on the admission of Michigan, they would now see that she was a State, de facto, at the time she formed her constitution. Now, if they applied the reason of that case to this, what was the result? Michigan was not a State in this Union when her Senators were elected, nor when she voted for President and Vice President. The case was really a clear one, and any reason which would exclude these votes ought to have excluded her Senators from taking their seats on this floor. He did not believe that doubtful questions of this kind should be waived; and this question should be settled at once. He should, therefore, feel himself bound to vote against the resolution.

Mr. LYON asked what course the committee would have recommended in case the vote of Michigan had varied the result. Would Michigan in such case be deprived of her vote? Mr. L. referred to the vote of Indiana, which, under similar circumstances, had been counted, and contended that Michigan was as much entitled to count her vote as was the State of Indiana. He thought the Senate would not make so unjust a discrimination between the two States as the resolution contemplated, and he would unite with his colleague (Mr. NORVELL) in protesting against it.

Mr. GRUNDY replied that the gentleman could not expect him to answer a question which the wisest of their predecessors had purposely left undetermined. What might be done under the circumstances adverted to by the Senator from Michigan, should they ever occur, the wisdom of the day must decide.

Mr. PRESTON concurred in all the views taken by his colleague in regard to this question.

The first resolution reported by the committee was adopted, without division; and the second was adopted—yeas 34, nays 9, as follows:

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TIPTON said that he was requested to present to the Senate two memorials, signed by citizens of Carroll and White counties, in the State of Indiana, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. These petitions, said he, are printed papers, couched in language both decorous and respectful, and signed by citizens of great respectability. I acknowledge, said Mr. T., the right of the people to petition Congress for a redress of their grievances, and I feel it to be my duty, as one of their representatives on the floor of the Senate, to present their petitions, and to ask for them a respectful consideration; but I feel it to be due to the petitioners, to the Senate, and to myself, to state respectfully but firmly, that my reflections on this subject have brought me to a conclusion very different from that which they seem to have arrived at.

I am unable to perceive, sir, whence it is that Congress derives the power to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia. Our forefathers, in framing the federal constitution, recognized the existence of slavery in a portion of the States of this confederacy, by permitting slaves to be enumerated in apportioning representatives on the floor of Congress. Every attempt made by citizens of the non-slaveholding States to disturb the rights of our neighbors to this species of property distracts the peace of the country and endangers the existence of the Union.

It is contended that Congress has exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia. If that be granted, it is but a delegated and limited power, not original, derivative. Slavery existed in Virginia, Maryland, and other States, before the federal constitution was adopted; slavery then belonged exclusively to the several States, and there it still remains; their entering into the Union did not yield to the Federal Government any right to interfere with the question of slavery within the States or in this District. The States of Virginia and Maryland ceded to the Federal Government this ten miles square, called the District of Columbia, for a seat of Government, and granted to Congress exclusive legislative powers over it for that purpose. This power was given to Congress by the States for special purposes, and is limited, from the very nature of the grant. Congress cannot abolish the right of trial by jury, abridge the liberty of the press, nor establish a national church, in this District, any more than in any of the States; nor do I believe that Congress has a right to interfere with slavery in the District, while Virginia and Maryland continue to be slave States.

Were it possible that the petitioners could effect their object, and abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, they would erect a receptacle in the midst of two slaveholding States for fanatics, abolitionists, and runaway slaves, who would, from their stronghold here, spread dissatisfaction, death, and destruction, through the surrounding country. Could the States who ceded the District have anticipated such a result, they never would have ceded it to the United States. Mr. T. said he was happy in being able to state to the Senate that there were but thirty-three names signed to these petitions, and that he hoped and believed that there was but a small portion of his constituents in favor of the course that the petitioners recommended; that he thought it was best to meet this question fairly; and, taking the suggestion of an honorable Senator from Virginia, not now here, (Mr. Tyler,) he would move to refer these petitions to the Committee for the District of Columbia. Let that committee give us a report that will present a full and fair view of the subject. This, he thought, would quiet the public mind. This course was adopted some years ago, when Congress was overrun with petitions for stopping the mail on Sunday. The memorials were referred to the appropriate committee, and one able report from the chairman of the committee had put that exciting subject to rest, as he hoped, forever.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed the hope that a question would be made on the reception of the petitions. He insisted that, if an objection should be made to the reception of a petition, it was the rule, and for forty years had been the practice of the Senate, to take the vote of reception, without a motion not to receive. He read the rule on this point, which stated that if there was a cry of the House to receive, and no objection should be made, or if the House were silent, the reception would take place of course. Otherwise, a vote must be taken on its reception. Mr. C. said he had in vain insisted on this at the last session. He hoped the Chair would now sustain the rule, before Mr. C. would be compelled to move a non-reception.

[An extended discussion now took place, in which Messrs. Calhoun, Ewing, Tipton, Morris, Swift, Grundy, White, Buchanan, Hubbard, Bayard, Davis, King of Georgia, Southard, Preston, Webster, Cuthbert, Rives, and Wall, took part, when—]

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the motion to receive the memorial was laid upon the table.

Mexico—Reprisals for Non-Satisfaction of Claims.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States.

To the Senate of the United States:

At the beginning of this session, Congress was informed that our claims upon Mexico, had not been adjusted, but that, notwithstanding the irritating effect upon her councils of the movements in Texas, I hoped, by great forbearance, to avoid the necessity of again bringing the subject of them to your notice. That hope has been disappointed. Having in vain urged upon that Government the justice of those claims, and my indispensable obligation to insist that there should be "no further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress of the injuries complained of," my duty requires that the whole subject should be presented, as it now is, for the action of Congress, whose exclusive right it is to decide on the further measures of redress to be employed. The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given, with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end, I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States, by the Executive, against Mexico, to enforce them, in the event of a refusal, by the Mexican Government, to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico.

The documents herewith transmitted, with those accompanying my message in answer to a call of the House of Representatives of the 17th ultimo, will enable Congress to judge of the propriety of the course heretofore pursued, and to decide upon the necessity of that now recommended.

If these views should fail to meet the concurrence of Congress, and that body be able to find in the condition of affairs between the two countries, as disclosed by the accompanying documents, with those referred to, any well-grounded reasons to hope that an adjustment of the controversy between them can be effected without a resort to the measures I have felt it my duty to recommend, they may be assured of my co-operation in any other course that shall be deemed honorable and proper.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1837.

The Message was ordered to be printed with the accompanying documents, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Liberation of American Slaves by British Authorities while passing from one United States Port to another.

A resolution offered by Mr. CALHOUN, calling on the President for information in regard to the aggression committed by the authorities of Bermuda on a Southern vessel, freighted with slaves, which was driven by distress into the ports of Bermuda, coming up for consideration—

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the cases referred to in the resolution presented one of the greatest outrages ever committed on the rights of individuals by a civilized power. The resolution proposed to ask from the President copies of any correspondence that may have taken place with the British Government relative to the seizure, by the British authorities, of the slaves who were carried as passengers in two American vessels. One of these vessels had sailed from Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, for New Orleans, having on board some slaves, the property of a gentleman removing from that State to the State of Mississippi; and she was wrecked near New Providence, where the slaves were forcibly seized and detained. The Legislature of North Carolina had, in consequence, expressed their disapprobation of such unwarrantable conduct, and unanimously passed resolutions calling upon the General Government to institute an inquiry into the matter. The other case was that of a vessel bound from Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to Charleston, South Carolina. Having met with very stormy weather, she was forced into the port of Bermuda, where the British authorities took possession of the slaves, and set them at liberty. He insisted that there was not a clearer constitutional question than that a vessel sailing from one part of the United States to another was as free from search as the territory of the United States itself; and when a vessel was forced by stress of weather into a foreign port, she was entitled to commiseration on account of her situation. The claims of humanity, he held, were, in such cases, to be superadded to the laws of nations. These points being so clear, he was astonished that outrages of this kind had been committed for the last three years. He did not doubt, for a moment, but that the Executive had done his duty, and exercised his accustomed vigilance, in reference to these matters. But still he (Mr. C.) was at a loss to perceive how it happened, after such a lapse of time, that the slaves had not been restored, nor any compensation made to the owners. Now, this resolution he had introduced for the purpose of getting information on the subject, and in order that justice might be done to our citizens.

At the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY,

Mr. CALHOUN modified his resolution, so as to insert in it the words "provided the President does not deem it incompatible with the public interests;" and the resolution, thus amended, was adopted.

Distribution of Books.

The resolution authorizing the distribution, among the new Senators, of nineteen copies of the American State Papers, published by Messrs. Gales & Seaton, coming up for consideration—

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved to refer it to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the motion. It was a question, he said, of mere distribution; and, if an inquiry beyond that were instituted, it did not properly belong to the Library Committee.

Mr. GRUNDY was opposed to any reference. A committee could do nothing to assist the Senate on the subject.

Mr. LINN suggested the propriety of throwing all such documents into the library. He said he was perfectly willing to do so with his; and would make a motion to that effect to-morrow, unless some other Senator would do so.

Mr. SEVIER said that, if this resolution should not be carried, he should vote that the documents in the possession of the older members should be restored.

Mr. RUGGLES said that those could not be recovered which had been carried away, and some of the Senators would be unwilling to restore what they had received. He thought it was best to serve all alike. It had been said that it was stolen property. If it were so, he was disposed, like the Senator from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVIER,) in regard to the public lands, to take his share of the spoils, whatever might be hereafter.

Mr. BENTON suggested two amendments to the resolution: first, to strike all out, and direct the members who had received such documents to restore them; and if that should fail, he would then move that the Secretary should get the documents at the lowest price for which they could be obtained. He would also move hereafter that each Senator should be furnished with the legislative history of the time during which he should remain in Congress.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the resolution was laid on the table.

Counting Votes for President and Vice President of the United States—Election of Vice President by the Senate.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, that the House were ready to proceed to count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Senate accordingly adjourned to the hall of the House.

The Senate having returned to their chamber, and the President resumed the chair—

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him of his election as President. And Mr. GRUNDY was appointed by the Chair to act on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY, then, from the joint committee on the election, reported a preamble and resolution, stating that no election of Vice President of the United States had been made by the college of electors; that Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, were the highest on the list of persons voted for; and resolving that the Senate do now proceed to elect one of these gentlemen Vice President of the United States; and that Senators give their votes, viva voce, in their places, on the call of the Secretary.

The resolution was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to vote accordingly, the result of which was as follows:

FOR RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Mr. Benton, of Mo.	Mr. Fulton, of Ark.
Black, of Miss.	Grundy, of Tenn.
Brown, of N. C.	Hendricks, of In.
Buchanan, of Penn.	Hubbard, of N. H.
Cuthbert, of Ga.	King, of Alabama.
Dana, of Maine.	King, of Georgia.
Ewing, of Illinois.	Linn, of Missouri.
Lyon, of Michigan.	Rives, of Virginia.
McKean, of Penn.	Robinson, of Ill.
Moore, of Alabama.	Ruggles, of Maine.
Morris, of Ohio.	Sevier, of Ark.
Mouton, of La.	Strange, of N. C.
Nicholas, of La.	Tallmadge, of N. Y.
Niles, of Conn.	Tipton, of Indiana.
Norvell, of Mich.	Walker, of Miss.
Parker, of Va.

FOR FRANCIS GRANGER.

Mr. Bayard, of Del.	Mr. Prentiss, of Vt.
Clay, of Kentucky.	Robbins, of R. I.
Clayton, of Del.	Southard, of N. J.
Crittenden, of Ky.	Spence, of Md.
Davis, of Mass.	Swift, of Vermont.
Ewing, of Ohio.	Tomlinson, of Conn.
Kent, of Maryland.	Wall, of N. Jersey.
Knight, of R. I.	Webster, of Mass.

The President of the Senate (Mr. KING, of Alabama) then rose and proclaimed the result of the election, as follows:

The whole number of Senators of the United States is	52
Majority necessary to a choice	27
Quorum required by the constitution	35
Whole number of Senators present	49
For Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky,	33
For Francis Granger, of New York,	16

From which it appears that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, having the votes of a majority of the whole number of Senators, as required by the Constitution of the United States, is duly elected; and I therefore declare that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, has been chosen by the Senate, in pursuance of the provisions contained in the constitution, Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1837.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee to inform RICHARD M. JOHNSON of his election; and the Chair was authorized to appoint the member thereof on the part of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,
The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SWIFT presented the petition of inhabitants of the town of Georgia, in the State of Vermont, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. S. moved to refer that part of the petition which relates to the slave trade to the Committee for the District of Columbia, remarking that he believed the question on this subject had not been distinctly tried.

Mr. BROWN moved to lay this motion on the table; which was accordingly ordered, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. SWIFT, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Hendricks, Knight, McLean, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, Webster—11.

Cession of the Public Lands.

Mr. CALHOUN introduced as a substantive proposition, and in form of a bill, the amendment he had the day before moved to the land bill; which proposes a cession of the public lands, on certain conditions therein specified, to the States, respectively, in which they lie. It was read once, and, by unanimous consent, received its second reading.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he wished it to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, or to a select committee, as the Senate might choose.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to refer the bill to a select committee. The Committee on Public Lands were already burdened with business, and he was desirous that the Senator from South Carolina should have an opportunity of presenting his whole views on the subject in the form of a report.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Election of President.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the Hon. MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him that he has been elected President of the United States, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and had received for answer that he desired to express the grateful sense that he entertained of the distinguished honor which his fellow-citizens had conferred on him; and requested them to assure their respective Houses that they might rely on his unceasing endeavors to execute the responsible trust which devolved on him, in a manner most conducive to the public interest.

Funds Receivable by the Federal Treasury in Payment for Public Lands, Custom House Duties and other Dues.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to designate and limit the kinds of funds receivable for the public revenue.

Mr. HUBBARD moved an amendment to the bill, requiring the registers and receivers to receive the same scrip in payment for the public lands as heretofore.

Mr. CLAY remarked that the bill in its present form left the Treasury order unrescinded, the subject of that order being still wholly in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He had an amendment therefore to offer, which, if accepted by Mr. HUBBARD as a part of his, and adopted by the Senate, would reconcile him to the bill. This amendment declared that it was not lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make any discrimination in the funds so receivable as public revenue.

Mr. HUBBARD accepted this addition to his amendment; which amendment, so amended, was adopted.

The bill was then passed, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McLean, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—41.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Linn, Morris, Ruggles, Wright—5.

SATURDAY, February 11.

Vice President elect.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the honorable RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and inform him that he had been elected by the Senate to the office of Vice President of the United States, reported that, on Saturday last, they had performed that duty, and had received the following letter, which they were requested to present to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I have received, with no ordinary emotions, the notice, through your committee, of my election to the office of Vice President of the United States by the Senate. I accept the station assigned me. This token of regard from the representatives of the States will ever be held in grateful recollection. Permit me to tender you my sincere thanks.

Observing that your decision is in harmony with a majority of the States and a moiety of all the electors in the primary colleges, my gratification is heightened, from the conviction that the Senate, in the exercise of their constitutional prerogative, concurred with and confirmed the wishes both of the States and the people. Called, in virtue of this prerogative, to preside in the deliberations of your enlightened body, from and after the 3d of March next, permit me to make use of this opportunity to say that I cannot feel insensible to difficulties which I must anticipate, and the frequent occasion I may have for your forbearance. Though for thirty years a member of one or the other of the two Houses of Congress, yet I have never been accustomed to pre-side, even temporarily, over either, or in any deliberative assembly. My attention has generally been engrossed by the more immediate acts of legislation, without special regard to the minuteness of rules and orders, so necessary to the progress of business, and so important for the observance of the presiding officer.

Contemplating the character of my distinguished predecessors, and considering my deficiency in point of talent, and the want of experience for the appropriate duties of the station, it is impossible for me to overcome entirely the diffidence with which I meet this call of my fellow-citizens. But this reflection will always console me, that any errors on my part will effect me personally rather than the public; the intelligence of the Senate will guard the country from any injury that might result from the imperfections of its presiding officer, and its magnanimity will cover these imperfections with the veil of charity. In this conclusion, I find a warrant in contemplating among the members of your body so many friends with whom I have been associated in public life. It is only in the event of an equal division of the Senate that the presiding officer is called upon to give his vote. My hope is, that there may be always sufficient unanimity to prevent such a contingency. If, however, it should happen, this duty will be familiar to me, and I shall perform it without embarrassment. In exercising this power, I shall expect the same indulgence that I have ever extended to others, where differences of opinion existed.

To the Senate, the most important trusts are committed. Its duties are legislative, executive, and, in certain contingencies, judicial. As citizens, every branch of our Government is dear to us; but, from my more immediate relation to this, by your choice, I shall regard it with special interest. It stands pre-eminent in talent and character. In presiding over its deliberations, it shall be my effort to act with perfect respect and impartiality towards every member, and endeavor, by this course of conduct, to merit the approbation of all.

R. M. JOHNSON.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1837.

Cession of the Public Lands.

The bill (Mr. CALHOUN's) to cede the public lands, on certain conditions, to the new States, came up in its order for a second reading.

The constitutionality and expediency of this cession was discussed by MESSRS. CALHOUN, HUBBARD, NORVELL, WEBSTER, SEVIER, WALKER, NILES, ROBINSON, SOUTHARD, TIPTON, and BUCHANAN, when the bill was laid upon the table, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—20.

Fortification Bill.

The Senate then proceeded to take up a bill making provision for the collection of materials and the purchase of sites for certain fortifications therein designated. [It appropriates about a million and a half of dollars to these objects.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN demanded further information in reference to the necessity of these works, the estimates upon which the appropriations were founded, and the total expense of completing the works for which this bill, appropriating a million and a half of dollars, proposed only to make preparation.

Mr. BENTON, chairman of the Military Committee, who had reported the bill, stated, in reply, that it was identically the same bill which had passed the Senate at the last session. The Senator was, therefore, in possession of full information in regard to it.

Mr. SOUTHARD opposed the bill in most of its features. It was a carrying out of the plan which had been laid down by General Bernard. And though the scheme of defence by fortifications proposed by that celebrated engineer might have been wisely adapted to the state of the country at that period, its condition had since been so greatly changed, by the increase of its population and the augmentation of its power, that many of the features of the plan were no longer necessary, and might advantageously be dispensed with. The improvements which had been made in the means for transportation of the munitions of war rendered it now a comparatively easy thing to concentrate large bodies of the militia at any point that might be threatened by a foe. And thus the necessity of many forts otherwise requisite was superseded. And forts, if not judiciously located, were not only of no valuable service, but, owing to the train of consequences they drew after them, were a positive evil.

The bill being on its passage,

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Wright—26.

MONDAY, February 13.

Trade with Belgium.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved that the Senate consider a bill from the House, respecting the duties on Belgian vessels and their cargoes. The bill having been taken up,

Mr. BUCHANAN briefly explained its object. By the act of 1824, this Government had offered to all nations to receive their products in their own vessels on the same terms as they should receive our products in our vessels. Holland had refused these terms, and imposed a discriminating duty of ten per cent. in favor of their own vessels. We might, according to the principles of that act, have done the same, as a countervailing measure, in favor of our own navigation; but as, notwithstanding the duty of ten per cent., our own navigation continued to enjoy almost the whole of the trade between Holland and the United States, nothing further was done, and the vessels of Holland were allowed to enter our ports on the same terms with our own. This was before the separation of Belgium from Holland; but after that separation, on the vessels of Belgium presenting themselves for the first time in our ports, a discriminating duty was demanded of them, although none was demanded from Dutch ships. As this seemed a hardship, the present bill has been introduced, in order to put Belgian vessels on the same footing with those of Holland. A proviso, however, was inserted in the bill, empowering the President, whenever circumstances should, in his opinion, render it expedient, to enforce the act of 1824 against both Dutch and Belgian vessels.

Mr. CLAY further explained the case, confirming the statements made by Mr. BUCHANAN, of whom, however, he inquired whether information had been obtained by him as to the present proportion between Dutch and American navigation employed in the trade with Holland, as, in 1835, it appeared that the Dutch were rather gaining upon us.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied that he had not, but would make the inquiry at the Department, and have the facts ready by to-morrow.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to its third reading.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Trade with Belgium.

The bill respecting the discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes coming up on its passage—

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, when this bill was before the Senate yesterday, he had promised to ascertain from the Department the comparative state of the Dutch and American tonnage, as employed in the Holland trade during the past year. He had done so; and it appeared from the result that the amount of Dutch tonnage was increasing rapidly on the American. He did not know whether this was owing to the discriminating duty imposed by the Dutch Government in favor of their own vessels in Dutch ports, or not; but if such was the fact, then the provisions of the act of 1824 should be promptly applied by the Executive. Mr. B. then read the following statement: In the year 1834, the amount of American tonnage in this trade was (in round numbers) - - - 17,000 tons.
In 1835, - - - 15,000 "
In 1836, - - - 8,500 "
while the amounts of Dutch tonnage, on the contrary, had proportionably diminished.

In 1834, the Dutch tonnage was	1,651 tons.
In 1835, - - - -	3,058 "

Mr. CLAY said that, when we saw, for three successive years, a regular diminution of American tonnage, and a regular increase of the competing foreign tonnage, there could be no doubt that both results proceeded from a common cause. The act of 1824 proceeded on the principle of entire and perfect reciprocity. That principle had been departed from by the Government of Holland, while Belgium was in union with Holland. There was much reason to believe that the present relative condition of the navigation of America and of Holland was the result of that departure. Under those circumstances, it seemed that, though the Senate could not well refuse to pass the present bill, which did nothing but put Holland and Belgium on the same footing, the Executive was bound to enforce the provisions of the act of 1824 to both Governments. He trusted this would be done.

Mr. DAVIS, who had not been present when the bill was introduced, was desirous that the bill should lie over for one day, in order that he might have an opportunity to look a little into the returns stating the existing condition of the trade, with a view of judging of the true cause of the present state of things. Possibly this act might be construed as an evidence that this Government was prepared to extend the relaxation of the provisions of the act of 1824, though he was very sure the Senator who introduced the bill had no such intention.

Mr. BUCHANAN concurred in the views expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, and explained that the proviso in this bill had been introduced with an express view to enable the President to apply the provisions of the act of 1824 to both Holland and Belgium.

Mr. CUTHBERT contended that the true standard by which to judge of the existing indulgence to Holland, was not the immediate effect of it on the comparative navigation of the two countries, but its effect as an example and a precedent, which was likely to induce other nations to pursue the same course which had been adopted by the Dutch Government.

The bill was passed.

SATURDAY, February 18.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of Hon. LEWIS F. LINN, re-elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, for six years from and after the 4th of March next.

Papers of Mr. Madison.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the joint resolution authorizing the purchase of the manuscripts of the late President Madison, was taken up and considered.

Mr. ROBBINS said: I consider this work of Mr. Madison, now proposed to be given to the world under the patronage of this Government,

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Papers of Mr. Madison.

as the most valuable one to mankind that has appeared since the days when Bacon gave to the world his Novum Organon. That produced that revolution in analytics, which has produced the immense superiority of the moderns over the ancients in the knowledge of nature, and in the improvement of the condition of human life—the fruit of that knowledge. With Bacon it was a mere theory; a theory, however, which he fondly cherished, and confidently believed would be prolific, as it has been, of the most magnificent results; but in the hands of Newton, and of his other disciples and followers, it became a practical guide to those astonishing discoveries which, in their consequences, have, among other things, converted those elements of nature before supposed to be, only to be controlled by the same almighty hand which formed them, into the ministers and agents of man, obedient to his will, and subservient to his use. It has enabled man to draw the veil from the face of nature; to inspect her mechanism; and to avail himself of her principles for the augmentation of his own power. It has given him power after power; and is still going on to give him power upon power, as his researches go on in exploring her boundless fields, and in making discovery upon discovery; and to this growing increase of human power, no human being can now assign the possible limits. True, it has not enabled man, as it was fabled of him by the poets of old, to steal the fire from the heavens; but it has enabled him to do more and better—it has enabled him to become an humble pupil in the school of the Divine Artist; and, by studying his models, to copy his agencies, though at the immeasurable distance which separates a finite from the infinite being.

As this Organon of Bacon has been the beacon-light to mankind to guide him to the true philosophy, and to the improvement of his physical condition, so will this work of Madison, as I trust and predict, be his beacon-light to guide him to the true science of free government, and to the improvement of his political condition. The science of free government, the most difficult of all the sciences, by far the most difficult, whilst it is the most important to mankind; of all the slowest in growth, the latest in maturity. Not the science which has penetrated the causes and explained to mankind the phenomena of the heavens is so difficult; that has been found of easier and more rapid attainment. Indeed, the difficulties to be overcome in evolving this science are so great, that we are to wonder less at its tardy advances, than at its final success. In the first place, it requires the deepest and most perfect insight into the nature of man: of man not only in his general nature, but as modified by society; which everywhere has superinduced and clothed him with a second nature, denominated habit; and that as diversified as the countries he inhabits. Then it requires that faculty of comprehensive combination, which is the rarest of all the gifts of God to man, and which, whenever and wherever it appears, seems destined to produce an era in human affairs; a faculty of combining into a whole, where the elements to be combined are so various as to be almost infinite; a whole perfect in relation to all its parts, and its parts perfect in relation to the whole. Besides, the perfect model of the free government is not like the perfect model of any other science. Of every other science, the perfect model anywhere is the perfect model everywhere, and everywhere alike perfect. The perfect watch at Washington, for instance, is the perfect watch at Canton, and so all over the globe; but not so the perfect model of the free government: that, though the principles are the same everywhere, the form varies as the circumstances vary, of the people by whom it is established; to which circumstances it must always be adjusted and made to conform.

Here, with us, the difficulties to be overcome in this achievement, from the nature of the elements to be combined, were stupendously great. In looking back to those difficulties, that they were overcome at all appears to me now little less than a prodigy; and it still fills me with astonishment. For here a combination was required that would produce a structure, perfectly anomalous in the history of human Governments; and such a structure was produced, and as perfect as it was novel. Here were a people, spread and spreading over a vast territory—that stretching and to stretch almost from the rising to the setting sun—this scattered and countless multitude were to be ruled in freedom as one people, and by the popular will—that will to be uncontrolled in itself, and controlling every thing. Such an achievement, the most enlightened friends of freedom and human rights, in all countries and in all ages, had deemed to be morally and physically impossible. Besides, here were thirteen States, and all the other States to be formed out of that vast territory, without being destroyed as States, to be so combined as to form, in the general aspect, but one simple Government; with all the unity and energy of one simple Government; powerful alike to assert and maintain all their rights as a nation, against all other nations; and the rights of every individual, all over this boundless domain, against every aggressor; that is, a Government equally fitted and efficient for all the purposes of peace and war. Such an achievement, often before, and under much more favorable circumstances, because upon a much more limited scale, had been attempted, but never before accomplished; as is but too well attested by the histories and the destinies of all the confederacies that before had ever existed on the earth.

Those confederacies had all proved signal failures as effective Governments, both in war and peace; and entirely for the want of that form of structure and principle of combination that would reconcile absolute sovereignty in the nation with sovereignty in the States, as parts of one nation—as consistent and harmonious parts of one supreme sovereignty. This principle, unexplored and unknown before, was developed and displayed, most happily so, in the structure of our confederate and national republic.

This work now proposed to be published will unfold to us all the steps of that diversified analysis and discovery which lead to this happy and splendid result.

Those who think (if any think) that the result itself—namely, the constitution—of itself and by itself, will be enough for the instruction of mankind on this subject, are much mistaken. For there is a vast difference between the knowledge which is acquired analytically, and that which is acquired synthetically; the latter is but isolated knowledge; the former is knowledge that is the consequence of other knowledge. Synthesis gives to us a general truth, but acquired in a mode that is barren of other fruit; analysis not only gives to us the same general truth, but puts us on the track of invention and discovery, and is always fertile of other and often of better fruit; synthesis carries us to a fountain-head, but never beyond; but analysis carries us beyond, and to the fountain of that fountain; it places us upon an eminence that overtops and overlooks the general truth in the wide survey it commands and gives to us; and as to that general truth, it enables us not only to comprehend it more perfectly, but to apply it more successfully. This is at once a branch and the great instrument of that primal philosophy of which Bacon speaks, and whose cultivation he so highly recommends—the philosophy of philosophy; the common mother of all the sciences, and by which alone their boundaries can be extended. He compares it to the Berecynthia, whom the poets of old fabled to be the mother of all the gods:

"Omnes creolcolas, omnes supera alta Tenentes."

Of such is the nature, and such will be the fruits to mankind, of the work now proposed to be given to the world.

Further to awaken our sensibility on this subject, I need not remind the Senate how much we owe to a name that is to render the name of this country respectable in every other on this globe; the clarum et venerabile nomen. Nations have lived upon the earth who have become extinct, and been lost to the memory of mankind; but never when the clarum et venerabile nomen had illustrated their annals. The clarum et venerabile nomen is the true elixir of national immortality. What has this country, what can she ever have, that would be an equivalent to her in exchange for the name of her Washington? that star of stars in the diadems that sparkle on the brow of nations? Not the diadem that sparkles on the brow of Greece; not the diadem that sparkles on the brow of Rome, has one of equal brilliancy.

No; it stands peerless on the earth, and alone in glory. Though it can never be a contest whose name is to do the most honor to our country, and, more than all others, to carry her name, associated with his, and emblazoned by his, down through all the endless generations of mankind to follow, for all the endless ages of time to come, yet among the names to cluster around his, and to form the constellation (may it multiply to a galaxy) of American worthies, not one will ever shine with a purer, with a brighter, or more inextinguishable lustre than that of Madison.

If, then, this appropriation was merely to express a nation's gratitude to a nation's benefactor, it would be the least it would become her to make. But, besides that, we are to consider that it is to purchase for this country, and for mankind, a treasure of instruction, whose value no money can measure, no figures can express.

Mr. CALHOUN had listened with pleasure and delight to the venerable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. ROBBINS,) and he coincided in opinion with him, that we were indebted to Mr. Madison, at least as much as to any other man, for the form of government under which we live. Indeed, he might be said to have done more for our institutions than any man now living, or that had gone before him.

A great and efficient aid he was, undoubtedly, in forming the Government. But there was another great act which would immortalize him in the eyes of posterity—the profound and glorious views which he took of our Government in his celebrated Virginia report. In his opinion, that was by far the ablest document that issued from the pen of Mr. Madison—one from which Mr. C. had derived more information, and a profounder insight into our Government, than all the other documents he had perused.

Now, if he understood the object in view, it was in direct opposition to the great and fundamental principles of Mr. Madison himself, an adherence to which he (Mr. C.) solemnly believed, would give durability to the Government under which we were now living.

He wished at some other time (as he was not prepared at this time) to be heard on the subject, when he would endeavor to satisfy the Senate that, in giving our assent to the appropriation asked for, we should not honor the name of Madison. Mr. C. would postpone what he had to say until the third reading of the resolution; and, in the mean time, Senators would have an opportunity of coming to a full understanding of the subject.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The United States and Mexico—Redress to be Demanded.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

The United States and Mexico—Redress to be Demanded.

[SENATE.]

was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 6th instant, with the accompanying documents, on the subject of the present state of our relations with Mexico, report :

That they have given to this subject that serious and deliberate consideration which its importance demands, and which any circumstances calculated to interrupt our friendly relations with the Mexican republic would necessarily insure. From the documents submitted to the committee, it appears that, ever since the revolution of 1822, which separated Mexico from Spain, and even for some years before, the United States have had repeated causes of just complaint against the Mexican authorities. From time to time, as these insults and injuries have occurred, demands for satisfaction and redress have been made by our successive public ministers at the city of Mexico ; but almost all these demands have hitherto proved unavailing.

It might have been expected that, after the date of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the two republics on the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, these causes of complaint would have ceased to exist. That treaty so clearly defines the rights and the duties of the respective parties, that it seems almost impossible to misunderstand or to mistake them. The committee, notwithstanding, regret to be compelled to state that all the causes of complaint against Mexico, which have been specially noticed in the correspondence referred to them, have occurred since the conclusion of this treaty.

We forbear from entering into any minute detail of our grievances. The enumeration of each individual case, with its attendant circumstances, even if the committee were in possession of sufficient materials to make such a compilation, is rendered unnecessary, from the view which they have taken of the subject. These cases are all referred to in the document No. 81, entitled "Claims on Mexico," in the letter of instructions from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis, of the 20th of July, 1836, and in the subsequent correspondence between Mr. Ellis and Mr. Monasterio, the acting Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs.

If the Government of the United States were disposed to exact strict and prompt redress from Mexico, your committee might, with justice, recommend an immediate resort to war, or reprisals. On this subject, however, they give their hearty assent to the following sentiments, contained in the message of the President. He says : "The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, and upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided ; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands."

In affording this opportunity to the Mexican Government, the committee would suggest the propriety of pursuing the form required by the 34th article of the treaty with Mexico, in all cases to which it may be applicable. This article provides that "if (what, indeed, cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

After such a demand, should prompt justice be refused by the Mexican Government, we may appeal to all nations, not only for the equity and moderation with which we shall have acted towards a sister republic, but for the necessity which will then compel us to seek redress for our wrongs, either by actual war or by reprisals. The subject will then be presented before Congress at the commencement of the next session, in a clear and distinct form, and the committee cannot doubt but that such measures will be immediately adopted as may be necessary to vindicate the honor of the country, and insure ample reparation to our injured fellow-citizens. They leave the mode and manner of making this demand to the President of the United States.

Before concluding their report, the committee deem it necessary to submit a few remarks upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, the late envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic to the United States. In regard to that functionary, they concur fully in opinion with Mr. Forsyth, that he was under the influence of prejudices which distorted and discolored every object which he saw, whilst in this country. On the 15th of October, 1836, he terminated his mission by demanding his passports. And for what reason? Because the President refused to recall the orders which he had issued to the general commanding the forces of the United States in the vicinity of Texas, directing him to pass the frontier, should it be found a necessary measure of self-defence ; but prohibiting him from pursuing this course unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the citizens of the United States, or he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually preparing within the Mexican territory.

A civil war was then raging in Texas. The Texian troops occupied positions between the forces of Mexico and the warlike and restless tribes of Indians along the frontiers of the United States. It was manifest that Mexico could not possibly restrain by force these tribes within her limits from hostile incursions upon the inhabitants of the United States, as she had engaged to do by the 33d article of the treaty. No matter how strong may have been her inclination, the ability was entirely wanting. Under such circumstances, what became the duty of the President of the United States? If he entertained reasonable apprehensions that these savages meditated an attack from the Mexican territory against the defenceless citizens along our frontier, was he obliged to order our troops to stand upon the line, and wait until the Indians, who know no rule of warfare but indiscriminate carnage and plunder, should actually invade our territory? To state the proposition is to answer the question. Under such circumstances, our forces had a right, both by the law of nations and the great and universal law of self-defence, to take a position in advance of our frontier, in the country inhabited by these savages, for the purpose of preventing and restraining their incursions.

The Sabine is so distant from Washington that it became absolutely necessary to intrust this discretionary power to the commanding general. If the President had not issued such orders in advance, all the evils might have been inflicted before the remedy could have been applied; and in that event he would have been justly responsible for the murders and devastation which might have been committed by the Mexican Indians on citizens of the United States.

When these discretionary orders were issued to General Gaines, they were immediately communicated to Mr. Gorostiza, in the most frank and friendly spirit. The fullest explanations of the whole proceeding were made to him, and he was over and over again assured that this occupation of the Mexican territory, should it become necessary, would be of a limited, temporary, and purely defensive character, and should continue no longer than the danger existed; that the President solemnly disclaimed any intention of occupying the territory beyond the Sabine, with the view of taking possession of it as belonging to the United States; and that this military movement should produce no effect whatever upon the boundary question.

The committee believe that Mr. Gorostiza ought to have been satisfied with these explanations. But they failed to produce any effect upon his mind. Without instructions from his Government, he retired from his mission upon his own responsibility. This was not all. Before he left the United States he published a pamphlet, containing a portion of his correspondence with our Government and with his own, from which latter it appears that, whilst engaged upon the business of his special mission here, he was making charges of bad faith against the United States to the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Relations. The committee will not enlarge upon the glaring impropriety of such conduct. The publication of such a pamphlet, by a foreign minister, in the country to which he has been accredited, before taking his departure, can be considered in no other light than as an appeal to the people against the acts of their own Government. It was a gross violation of that diplomatic courtesy which ought ever to be observed between independent nations, and deserves the severest condemnation. This act was still more extraordinary when we consider that it almost immediately followed the note of Mr. Dickens to him, of the 20th of October, 1836, assuring him that the President would instruct Mr. Ellis to make such explanations to the Mexican Government, of the conduct of that of the United States, as he believed would be satisfactory.

The committee regret to learn, from the note of Mr. Ellis to Mr. Forsyth, of the 9th of December last, that the Mexican Government has publicly approved of the conduct of its minister whilst in the United States. They trust that a returning sense of justice may induce it to reconsider this determination. They are willing to believe that it never could have been made, had that Government previously received the promised explanation of the President, contained in the letter of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis of the 10th December, 1836, which, unfortunately, did not reach Mexico until after the latter had taken his departure. This letter, with the President's message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, cannot fail to convince the Mexican Government how much they have been misled by the representations of their minister.

After a full consideration of all the circumstances, the committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

Ordered, That 2,000 extra copies of the above report be printed.

And then the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, February 20.

Copyright Laws.

Among the memorials presented to-day was one by Mr. CLAY from a very large number of persons, who stated themselves to be American authors and friends of literature, calling the attention of Congress to the subject of copyright laws, and expressing an anxious wish that those laws might be so modified as to extend their benefits to foreign authors. Mr. C. further remarked that the evidences in favor of the measure of granting copyrights to foreign authors were so strong as not to leave a doubt on any mind of its favorable reception by the country. Under these circumstances, he said he should call up the bill granting such rights as soon as convenient. The memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Papers of Mr. Madison.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration (on its third reading) of the following joint resolution:

Resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to contract for and purchase, at the sum of thirty thousand dollars, the manuscripts of the late Mr. Madison, referred to in a letter from Mrs. Madison to the President of the United States, dated the fifteenth of November, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and communicated in his message of the sixth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, conceding to Mrs. Madison the right to use copies of the said manuscript in foreign countries as she may think fit."

[A debate took place on this resolution, wholly turning on the constitutionality of the purchase, in which debate Messrs. Calhoun, Preston, Webster, Crittenden, Rives, and Clay, took part.]

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Land Laws and Decisions.

[SENATE.]

The question on the passage of the resolution was decided by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Lyon, McLean, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tipton—14.

So the resolution was passed.

TUESDAY, February 21.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the credentials of the Hon. FRANKLIN PIERCE, elected United States Senator from New Hampshire, for six years from the 3d of March next.

THURSDAY, February 23.

Reduction of the Tariff.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the duties on certain imports; and the question being on the motion of Mr. DAVIS to strike from the bill the article of common salt, the effect of which is to retain the protecting duty now levied on that article,

After a long and general debate, the question was taken to strike out from the bill the article of salt, and decided in the negative by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, McLean, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Webster—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—28.

Other proposed amendments were afterwards rejected or adopted.

The amendment proposed by Mr. NILES for a gradual reduction of the duty on foreign coal, coal screenings, and coke, was decided in the negative, YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Page, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Linn, McLean, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—20.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and all the amendments agreed to, with the exception of the following :

1. Duty on China and porcelain, earthen and stone ware.

Mr. WRIGHT suggested that, as the Senate was now very thin, although it might happen that a different vote would be obtained from what had been given in committee when the Senate was full, yet it would be better to adhere to the former vote, to avoid a reconsideration or other difficulty when the seats should be full again to-morrow.

To this it was replied, that one Senator (Mr. KNIGHT) had avowedly changed his vote, and another was present now who had not been in committee.

The question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the amendment which struck out these articles from the bill (thereby retaining the protecting duty upon them) was decided,

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker—19.

So China and earthenware were retained in the bill, as free of duty.

2. Blankets chiefly used among the Indians.

On this Mr. DAVIS demanded the yeas and nays. He objected to the amendment, as injurious to the interests of several manufactories of blankets established within the United States.

Mr. BENTON, Mr. LINN, and Mr. NORVELL explained the great difference between Indian blankets and those of a domestic manufacture, and the very decided preference which the Indians expressed for the one over the other, and which precluded all competition from our factories, with what were usually known among them as Mackinac blankets. They were thick, finely woven, and of the finest wool, and impervious to the rain.

The amendment was concurred in by the Senate—yeas 23, nays 14.

SATURDAY, February 25.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the credentials of the Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, re-elected a Senator of the United States, from the State of New York, for six years from and after the 3d of March next.

Land Laws and Decisions.

The following resolutions were offered by Mr. WEBSTER :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared a collection of the instructions which have been issued from time to time, either by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of the Land Office, excepting only such as refer exclusively, both in principle and application, to particular or individual cases, together with the official opinions of the Attorney-General on questions arising under the land laws.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate cause the general public acts of Congress respecting the sale and disposition of the public lands, together with the instructions and opinions mentioned in the foregoing resolution, to be printed for the use of the Senate.

In offering these resolutions, Mr. WEBSTER said it was his object that the general acts, the instructions given under them, and the official opinions of the Attorney-General on questions arising in the administration of these laws, should be collected and published, and made available to all. These instructions and opinions are in manuscript. They are only known at the Land Office, and may govern questions arising there without any means, on the part of those interested, to possess themselves fully of their character and contents. The laws, although contained in the two volumes commonly called the volumes of the Land Laws, were yet mixed up with such a mass of treaties, ordinances, and private acts, that it is not always easy to bring them together, or to get a connected view of their provisions.

The subject was getting to be very important. Interfering claims were constantly arising, especially under preëmption acts; and it was understood that an appeal, in these cases, lay to the Commissioner or to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Land Office was thus becoming an important judicature; and it was essential that its course and its rules of proceeding should be known. Interesting rights were decided by it, and it became Congress to look into its proceedings, and to see that the laws were openly, fairly, and ably executed. The first step to reach this end was to make public, in some accessible form, the instructions and opinions under which the land officers acted. Any further provisions to insure a proper administration could then be adopted, which Congress should judge necessary, if, indeed, any should be thought necessary.

The resolutions were agreed to.

MONDAY, February 27.

United States and Mexico.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take up the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of our relations with Mexico.

Mr. PRESTON moved to postpone the resolution, for the purpose of taking up the resolution on the subject of the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; which motion was negative—yeas 9, nays not counted.

Mr. CLAY supposed the only question which would be presented to the Senate would be upon the resolution. He had risen merely to say that he concurred with the other gentlemen who composed the committee, upon the subject under consideration. He agreed with the rest of his colleagues, that the controversy with Mexico had made out no case justifying a resort to war or for the issuing of reprisals; and he thought that renewed efforts should be made to obtain redress, before it should become necessary to declare war against Mexico to vindicate the honor and interests of the country. He felt himself bound to say, that whilst he concurred with the committee, which he believed was unanimous in adopting the resolution, he did not agree entirely with the body of the report. He thought the case was made out rather stronger against Mexico than the correspondence of the Government with that country justified. And he must say, in all candor and truth, that the departure of our representative from Mexico, under the circumstances, was harsh, abrupt, and unnecessary. A long letter had been addressed, in pursuance of instructions from the Department of State, by the American chargé d'affaires, to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mexico, and which bore date some time in December last, and embraced a great variety of claims in respect to which information was to be procured, and procured, too, from remote parts of Mexico. Some delay, in consequence, took place, on the part of the Mexican minister, in sending his reply to our chargé d'affaires. When we came to examine the reply with candor and fairness, in respect to which some of our claims were admitted, and concerning others more information was required, the Senate would think, he presumed, that there had been more precipitation than was necessary, on the part of our minister. Well, it was in this state of things that he shortly after demanded his passports and came home.

Now, he (Mr. C.) thought that such were the circumstances then existing, that our chargé might have awaited further instructions; and, if he had delayed his departure, the Mexican Government would probably have been able to furnish him with further information. He would have heard what they thought of the letter from our Secretary of State, relative to the final disposition of our Government in regard to the occupation of the Mexican territory near the Sabine, and which had occasioned so much unpleasantness. While up, Mr. C. would take the opportunity of saying that he did not concur in all the reasonings of the committee as to the publication of a pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza, the Mexican envoy extraordinary. He, (Mr. C.,) however, would say that it was a great diplomatic irregularity; but he did not think it made out a case for war, or for any serious disturbance. It was not an unusual case. He recollected an instance which occurred while the American commissioners were at Ghent, in 1814, at a most critical state of the negotiation—when it hung, as it were, on a balance, and when it was extremely doubtful whether there would not be a rupture. Mr. C. here related that while he was at Ghent, treating with Lord Gambier and the other British commissioners, a publication from the United States, containing the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, found its way there. Lord Gambier, having seen it, expressed his surprise to Mr. C. that his Government should have given publicity to this correspondence, and said he could not see how they could justify the act. The other commissioners were equally displeased at the occurrence. Mr. C. then explained to them that the course which had been adopted was one growing out of the peculiar structure of this Government, and which the people here demanded of their servants. He (Mr. C.) mentioned this to show that what Mr. Gorostiza had done was a thing not unexampled. It would be recollected that but the other day, Mr. Pageot, just before embarking for France from New York, published the letter of the Duc de Broglie. Mr. Pageot had since returned to this country, and been received frankly, and without any intimation of dissatisfaction on the part of our Government. And he (Mr. C.) had no more doubt of the fact than of his standing on that floor at that moment, that there had been information conveyed through some channel, official or unofficial, to France that Mr. Pageot's return to the United States would be welcomed, without any displeasure being shown towards him in regard to his having published the letter of the Duc de Broglie; otherwise, the French Government would not have sent him to this country. Had Mr. Gorostiza not known the fact of this publication, he probably would not have pursued the example set him.

Mr. C. admitted that Mr. Gorostiza's conduct, in publishing the pamphlet he did, was decidedly wrong, and highly reprehensible; but, as he before said, it was not, in his opinion, an offence justifying war. The pamphlet had produced an impression, and had done no mischief; and he thought the Secretary of State had acted highly wrong to make it a subject of communication to the Mexican Government. Whilst, however, Mr. C. disagreed with the committee as to some parts of the report, he concurred entirely with them in regard to the resolution, and hoped it would obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had but a few remarks to make upon this subject, in addition to those contained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He felt gratified that the Senator from Kentucky had concurred with the other members of the committee in a large portion of their report, and that he would sustain the resolution with which it concluded. The justice of the Senator's remarks in regard to the withdrawal of Mr. Ellis from Mexico would be palpable, if no demand had ever been made upon the Mexican Government for the redress of our grievances previous to his letter of September, 1836, to Mr. Monasterio. But the case was far different. This demand was not then made for the first time. On the contrary, year after year, time after time, whenever we sustained injuries, we had asked for redress; but our reclamations, in almost every instance, had been evaded, and redress had been withheld. Mr. Ellis's letter of the 26th September was, therefore, but a mere summing up of our causes of complaint—an enumeration of demands which had been previously made against the Mexican Government. That Government ought to have been prepared to yield us prompt redress, or at least to have expressed their willingness to do so, as soon as they possibly could. He thought Mr. Ellis, in withdrawing from Mexico, had obeyed his instructions, both in the spirit and in the letter. His opinion upon this point was very decided. He should not have said another word upon the subject, but for a commentary on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had appeared in a morning paper. This article proceeded from a source which seemed to render a passing notice of it necessary.

The President, in his message, after expressing his opinion of the aggravated wrongs which we had suffered from Mexico, in which the committee entirely concurred, recommended that an act should be passed authorizing reprisals, if, after making another demand, the Mexican Government should refuse to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy. He expressed his entire willingness, however, to co-operate with Congress in any other course which should be deemed honorable and proper. Under any circumstances, it was a matter of extreme delicacy for Congress to confer upon the Executive the power of making reprisals, upon a future contingency. He would not say that cases might not occur which would justify such a proceeding. These, if they should ever happen, would establish a rule for themselves. Unless an immediate and overruling necessity existed, which could brook no delay, it was always safer and more constitutional to take the opinion of Congress upon events after they had happened, than to intrust a power so important to the President alone.

The committee, under all the circumstances, did not believe that our existing relations with Mexico presented such a case. They knew that General Santa Anna, whose life had been justly forfeited, but which had been restored to him by the magnanimity of the Government of Texas, had recently arrived at Washington; that he had been sent home in a Government vessel of the United States; and that there was every reason to believe his arrival would be hailed by the Mexicans with joy, and that he would shortly be restored to the presidency of the Republic. Under such circumstances, it was but reasonable to hope that he would feel disposed to render to this country the justice which was our due; and that, therefore, it was neither expedient nor necessary, at the present moment, to authorize any decisive measure of a hostile character.

Again: The committee were unanimously of opinion that the 34th article of our treaty with Mexico required that a demand should be made, under its provisions, before resorting either to war or to reprisals. This article was one of a peculiar nature. It might have been impolitic to agree to it at first; but it was now a part of our treaty, and its requisitions must be held sacred. Here Mr. B. read from the article, as follows: "Thirdly. If (what indeed cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

This language was too plain to be misunderstood. It was true that it did not extend to direct insults to the national honor—such as violations of our flag, or opprobrious and injurious conduct towards our consuls. But the committee were very clear and unanimous in their opinion, that when pecuniary damages were sought by our citizens, for pecuniary injuries sustained, in violation of any article of the treaty, before we could redress those injuries by reprisals, a previous demand must be made, in pursuance of its provisions. On this point, there could scarcely be two opinions.

The treaty required something more than a mere presentation of the complaints of individuals to the Mexican Government, through the agency of our minister to Mexico. Our Government must be the judge, in the first instance, of the injuries requiring redress. We must decide this question ourselves. We are then bound to present a statement of such injuries and damages to the Mexican Government, verified by competent proofs. That such a demand under the treaty had never been made hitherto, must be apparent to all those who have read the correspondence. Throughout the whole of it, this article does not seem to have attracted any attention. That it was not within the contemplation of Mr. Forsyth, when he addressed the letter of instructions to Mr. Ellis of the 20th of July last, will appear conclusively from that letter itself. After enumerating our causes of complaint against the Mexican Government, he says: "Though the Department is not in possession of proof of all the circumstances of the wrongs done in the above cases, as represented by the aggrieved parties, yet the complaints are such as to entitle them to be listened to, and to justify a demand on the Mexican Government that they shall be promptly and properly examined, and that suitable redress shall be afforded."

The committee believed that it would require several months to enable the Department of State to collect the necessary proofs for the purpose of verifying each of the private claims of our citizens, and to make the demand according to the treaty. All the necessary forms can probably not be complied with until within two or three months of the meeting of the next Congress. They therefore thought it much better to wait this brief space, and refer the whole question to Congress, than to authorize the President immediately to issue letters of marque and reprisal, in case the answer of the Mexican Government should not prove satisfactory. After this demand shall have been made, and the answer of the Mexican Government received, the whole case will then be before Congress in a clear and distinct form. If that Government should refuse to do us justice, he could not doubt but that Congress would adopt prompt measures for vindicating the honor of the American flag and asserting the just rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

He should have been willing to use stronger language in the resolution appended to the report, but he believed it was now presented in the best form. Whilst negotiations continued, it was not politic to use the language of menace. Still he thought, from the report and the resolution, taken together, the Mexican Government could not fail to perceive the determination of that of the United States to enforce, in the most prompt and energetic manner, the redress of all our grievances.

When Mr. BUCHANAN concluded, the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and decided as follows:

So it was Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

Texas Independence.

Mr. WALKER moved the consideration of his resolution for the recognition of the independence of Texas.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to postpone its consideration to Friday; and a desultory conversation took place upon the motion, which was finally modified by inserting Wednesday next, and carried, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton,

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate met, and proceeded to consider the bill to remunerate Captain Francis Allyn for conveying General Lafayette to the United States, in 1824.

This bill proposed to allow $4,000 to the captain and owners of the ship Cadmus, for bringing over General Lafayette to this country. The captain relinquished his place in the Havre line, and procured a ship on his own responsibility, and was at expenses in going to Paris, &c.

The bill was warmly opposed, as opprobrious in its character; it was making a commodity of the honor of having tendered to the General his passage. The owners had had loud praises at the time for their liberality, yet now came to Congress for pay.

It was contended, on the other hand, that this captain had been at large private expenses, for which he ought to be remunerated. It did not appear that the owners had ever requested any thing of the kind.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were taken, and stood—yeas 22, nays 18.

So the bill was laid on the table, but afterwards reconsidered; and, after amendment, was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 28.

Inauguration of President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro. tem. presented a letter from the President elect of the United States, informing the Senate that he would be ready to take the usual oath of office on Saturday, March 4, at 12 o'clock, noon, at such place and in such manner as the Senate might designate.

Mr. GRUNDY offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee of arrangements, to make the requisite preparations for administering the oath to the President elect of the United States.

Mr. CLAY said he would like to inquire whether precedents had been examined on this subject. He was aware that the Senate had always had a peculiar agency in this business; but he was not aware why the Senate should act upon it any more than the House, or why it was not a joint concern. He remembered that, on the first election of Mr. Monroe, the committee of the Senate applied to him, as Speaker of the House, for the use of the chamber of the House; and he had told them that he would put the chamber in order for the use of the Senate, but the control of it he did not feel authorized to surrender. They wished also to bring in the fine red chairs of the Senate, but he told them it could not be done; the plain democratic chairs of the House were more becoming. The consequence was, that Mr. Monroe, instead of taking the oath within doors, took it outside, in the open air, in front of the Capitol. Mr. C. mentioned this for the purpose of making the inquiry, what was the practice, and on what it was founded, and why the Senate had the exclusive care of administering the oath.

Mr. GRUNDY said the committee had found no authority but several precedents, which were in strict accordance with the proposition now proposed to be made. He did not recollect any instance in which the House had participated in it; and, in fact, the House, as such, had no existence, their term having expired on the preceding day. The committee had examined three cases of more modern date, and had found nothing in opposition to the practice proposed. If the committee could not get into the House, they could go out of doors.

The resolution was adopted, and the Chair was authorized to appoint the above-named committee of three members.

The Distribution Question.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the fortification bill; and the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, viz: to strike out the second section of the bill, which contains the provision for the distribution among the States of any surplus which may remain in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838—[Mr. Calhoun's plan—]

Mr. CALHOUN regretted that the committee had not made a written report on so important a recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT explained that the second section of the bill being neither more nor less than the bill formerly introduced by the Senator from South Carolina himself, the case was fully understood by all the Senate, and needed no consumption of time to explain it. As to a written report, there had been no time to prepare one, even had the committee deemed it necessary.

Mr. CALHOUN reminded the Senate of the triumphant majority by which the deposit bill had been adopted at the last session; and as there had occurred nothing since then to change the principle of the measure in any respect, he was content to rest the present question on the principles then so unanswerably established, and the discussion by which they had been defended at the last session.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether it was the intention of the chairman of the Finance Committee and those with whom he acted, that if a surplus arose it was to be left in the hands of the deposit banks, where it drew an interest of two per cent., while in the hands of the States it would yield six. He was anxious to know what was to be the policy of the administration in regard to this matter.

[Mr. WRIGHT interposed, to say that its policy would be to have no surplus.]

(A debate now took place on the general character of the measure involved in the section, and as being a distribution under the name of a deposit, which continued till the evening recess.)

The Senate took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House, making appropriations for fortifications, &c., for the year 1837, the question being on a motion to strike out the section of the bill which provided for a deposit of the surplus revenue, on the 1st of January next, with the several States.

The question was taken on the motion.

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

So the motion to strike out the provision for the distribution among the States of the surplus revenue on the 1st of January next, was decided in the affirmative.

And, thus amended, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Texas Independence.

Mr. WALKER called up his resolution for the recognition of the independence of Texas, on which a debate of much interest arose. Mr. W. advocated his resolution by a speech of much earnestness, in which he pressed the claims of Texas for recognition with much devoted ardor.

He was followed by Mr. PRESTON, on the same side, who went into an extensive review of the history of Mexico, from the period of her recognition by our own Government to the present time, whence he deduced the argument that she never had, in fact, exercised control over Texas, and was in no condition to now enforce her claims of sovereignty. He then went into a similar review of the history of Texas, past and present, and argued to show that she was fully capable of performing the duties and sustaining the responsibilities, both domestic and foreign, which belong to an independent Government.

The original resolution, as offered by Mr. WALKER, was as follows:

"Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in conformity with the laws of nations and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States."

The question on agreeing to this resolution was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker, White—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—19.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The announcement of this vote called forth some applause from the gallery, which was promptly checked by the Chair.

THURSDAY, March 2.

Liberation of American Slaves by British Authorities—Brigs Encomium, Enterprise, and Comet.

Mr. CALHOUN said that it would be remembered that on his motion a resolution was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, in relation to the case of the brigs Encomium and Enterprise. He held in his hand the Message of the President in answer to the resolution, from which he found that there was another case (that of the Comet) of a similar character, of which he was not aware when he made his motion, and which occurred as far back as 1832. He had read with care the correspondence, but, he must say, with very little satisfaction. It was all on one side. Our Executive has been knocking, (no, that is too strong a term,) tapping gently at the door of the British Secretary, to obtain justice, for these five years, without receiving an answer, and this in the plainest case imaginable. It was not his intention to censure those who had been intrusted with the correspondence on our part. They had written enough, and more than enough; but truth compelled him to say the tone was not high enough, considering the injustice to our citizens, and the outrage on the flag and honor of the Union. His remarks were intended more especially for the latter part of the correspondence, after the long delay without an answer from the British Government. At first, in so plain a case, little more could be thought necessary than a plain statement of the facts, which was given in a very clear and satisfactory manner in the letter of the President elect in the case of the Comet.

Without repeating what he said on the introduction of the resolution, he would remind the Senate of the facts of the case in the briefest manner possible.

The three brigs were engaged in the coasting trade, and, among other passengers, had slaves on board, belonging to our citizens, who were sending them to the South-western States, with a view to settlement. The Enterprise was forced, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda, where the slaves on board were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities. The other two were wrecked on the Keys belonging to the Bahama islands, and the passengers and crew taken by wreckers, contrary to their wishes, into Nassau, New Providence, where the slaves shared the same fate as at Bermuda.

These were the essential facts of the case. He did not intend to argue the questions that grew out of them. There was, indeed, little or no ground for argument. No one in the least conversant with the laws of nations can doubt that these vessels were as much under the protection of our flag, while on their voyage, proceeding from one port of the Union to another, as if they were in port, lying at the wharves, within our acknowledged jurisdiction. Nor is it less clear, that forced as the Enterprise was by stress of weather, and taken, under the circumstances that the passengers and crews of the other two were, into the British dominions, they lost none of the rights which belonged to them while on their voyage on the ocean. So far otherwise, so far from losing the protection which our flag gave them while on the ocean, they had superadded, by their misfortunes, the additional rights which the laws of humanity extend to the unfortunate in their situation, and which are regarded by all civilized nations as sacred. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that the municipal laws of the place could not divest the owners of the property which, as citizens of the United States, they had in the slaves who were passengers in the vessels; and yet, as clear as is this conclusion, they were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities of the islands; and the Government of Great Britain, after five years' negotiation, has not only withheld redress, but has not even deigned to answer the often-repeated application of our Government for redress. We are thus left by its silence to conjecture the reason for so extraordinary a course.

On casting his eyes over the whole subject, he could fix on but one that had the least plausibility, and that resting on a principle which it was scarcely credible that a Government so intelligent could assume: he meant the principle that there could not be property in persons. It was not for him to object that Great Britain, or any other country, should assume that or any other principle it might think proper, as applicable to its subjects; but he must protest against the right to adopt it as applicable to our country or citizens. It would strike at the independence of our country, and would not be less insulting than outrageous; while it would ill become a nation that was the greatest slaveholder of any on earth, notwithstanding all cant about emancipation, to apply such a principle in her intercourse with others. It is time to speak out boldly on this subject, and to expose freely the folly and hypocrisy of those who accuse others of what, if there be guilt, they are more guilty themselves.

Ours is not the only mode in which man may have dominion over man. The principle which would abrogate the property of our citizens in their slaves would equally abrogate the dominion of Great Britain over the subject nations under her control. If one individual can have no property in another, how can one nation, which is but an aggregate of individuals, have dominion, which involves the highest right of property, over another? If man has, by nature, the right of self-government, have not nations, on the same principle, an equal right? And if the former forbids one individual from having property in another individual, does not the other equally forbid one nation holding dominion over another? How inconsistent would it be in Great Britain to withhold redress for injustice to our citizens committed in the West Indies, on the ground that persons could not be property, while in the East Indies she exercises unlimited dominion over more than a hundred millions of human beings, whose labor she controls as effectually as our citizens do that of their slaves! It is not to be credited that she will venture to assume, in her relation with us, a principle so utterly indefensible, and which could not but expose her to imputations which would make her sincerity questionable. This she must see, and to the fact that she does he attributed her long and obstinate silence.

But it may be asked, why, then, does she not make reparation at once in so clear a case? Why not restore the slaves, or make ample compensation to their owners? He could imagine but one motive: she had among her subjects many whose fanatical feelings on this subject she was unwilling to offend; but, while respecting the feelings of her subjects, blind and misdirected as they are, she ought not to forget that our Government is also bound to respect the feelings of its citizens. Let her remember that, if to respect the rights which our citizens have over their slaves be offensive to any portion of her subjects, how much more so would it be to our citizens for our Government to acquiesce in her refusal to respect our right to establish the relation which one portion of our population shall have to another, and how unreasonable it would be for her to expect that our Government should be more indifferent to the feelings of its citizens than hers to any portion of her subjects. He, with every lover of his country, on both sides, desired sincerely to see the peace and harmony of the two countries preserved; but he held that the only condition on which they could possibly be preserved was that of perfect equality and a mutual respect for their respective institutions; and he could not but see that a perseverance in withholding redress in these cases must, in the end, disturb the friendly relations which now so happily exist between the two countries.

He hoped, on resuming the correspondence, our Government would press the claim for redress in a manner far more earnest and becoming the importance of the subject than it has heretofore done. It seemed to him that a vast deal too much had been said about the decision of the courts and the acts of the British Government than ought to have been. They have little or nothing to do with the case, and can have no force whatever against the grounds on which our claims for justice stand. However binding on their own subjects, or foreigners voluntarily entering her dominions, they can have no binding effect whatever, where misfortune, such as in these cases, placed our citizens within her jurisdiction.

If they be properly presented, and pressed on the attention of the British Government, he could not doubt but that speedy and ample justice would be done. It could not be withheld but by an open refusal to do justice, which he could not anticipate. As to himself, he should feel bound, as one of the representatives from the slaveholding States, which had a peculiar and deep interest in the question, to bring this case annually before Congress, so long as he held a seat on this floor, if redress shall be so long withheld.

FRIDAY, March 3

Navy Pension Fund.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendments from the House of Representatives to the bill for the more equitable administration of the navy pension funds.

Mr. R. explained the ground of the recommendation. The bill of the Senate went to raise the pensions of the widows of officers before March, 1835, to the level of those since that date, while the amendment of the House proposed to cut down the pensions since 1835 to the level of those before that time.

The recommendation of the committee was assented to, and the Senate disagreed to the amendment from the House.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate that the House adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the fortification bill.

Mr. WRIGHT thereupon moved that the Senate adhere to its amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that this was a very important amendment indeed, and one which he deeply regretted the committee had deemed it proper to report. He could not consent to sit by in silence, and suffer the question to be taken, without at least requesting to hear some reason why an amendment of this character had been reported. If there should be a large surplus in the Treasury, as there was every reason to expect there would be, the natural and proper distribution of it was obviously to return it to the people. He could not but express his surprise that the committee should expect the Senate to strike out an amendment of this importance, simply on their recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT said that it was not his purpose to occupy the time of the Senate at this late period of the session. None knew better than the Senator from South Carolina the nature of the amendment, and the bearings of the whole question. The subject was as well understood by every member of the Senate as it could be by the committee. The section which the House of Representatives had added to this bill was precisely the bill introduced at the commencement of the session by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina himself, which had been referred to the Finance Committee, and long since reported on. Surely, the gentleman did not expect a written report on a bill referred but yesterday, and embracing a subject of such vast magnitude. The amendment involved as important a question as ever had been submitted to Congress; and if this had been the first time the Senate had ever heard of it, there would have been great propriety in requiring either a written report, or at least some verbal explanation in regard to it. But Mr. W. did not feel bound, as the case stood, to make a long report on a matter with which everybody was familiar, and on which he could not suggest a single new idea. A report, under such circumstances, would, if made, change no opinion. This was the simple explanation which he had to make (so far as he was personally concerned) in reply to the call of the honorable Senator from South Carolina.

After some further debate, the Senate determined to adhere to its disagreement.

Extra Session of the Senate.

[SENATE.]

Thanks to the President pro tem.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, the President pro tem., having temporarily left the chair, Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be tendered to the honorable WILLIAM R. KING, President pro tempore, for his late impartial and dignified services as presiding officer.

Adjournment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were now ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and were answered by the President that he had no other official communication to make, but that he had charged him to say that it was the wish of his heart that each member of Congress might enjoy health and prosperity in this world, and happiness in the next.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

The Senate then adjourned sine die.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

"THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

"To ———, Senator for the State of ———.

"By virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution, I hereby convene the Senate of the United States, to meet in the Senate chamber on the 4th day of March next, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to receive any communication the President of the United States may think it his duty to make.

"ANDREW JACKSON.

"DECEMBER 20, 1836."

SATURDAY, March 4.

In conformity with the above-recited summons from the President of the United States, the Senate assembled in their chamber, in the city of Washington, at 10 o'clock A. M. this day.

The Senate was called to order by Mr. KING, of Alabama, the late President pro tem.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, Vice President of the United States, being present, was conducted to the Secretary's table by Mr. GRUNDY, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States having been administered to him, Mr. KING vacated the chair, and Mr. JOHNSON took his seat as President of the Senate and Vice President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT, on taking the chair, addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate: In entering upon the discharge of the duties of the presiding officer of this body, the necessity of addressing its members has been very much lessened, if not superseded, by the opportunity afforded me of presenting some of my sentiments when I accepted the situation.

I cannot, however, permit the present occasion to pass without again tendering to you my grateful acknowledgments for the honor conferred upon me by your choice.

There is not, in my opinion, upon this globe, a legislative body more respectable and more exalted in character than the Senate of the United States; and there is not, perhaps, a deliberative assembly existing where the presiding officer has less difficulty in preserving order. This facility is attributable principally to two causes: the intelligence and patriotism of the members who compose the body, and that personal respect and courtesy which have always been extended from one member to another, in its deliberations. These qualities have a tendency to produce a unity of design, and a mutual confidence, in the ultimate object of all, whatever difference of opinion may exist in relation to the means of gaining the common end; and inculcate that sentiment of equality among the members which constitutes the essential principle of our free institutions, and which will never cease to animate a body so enlightened as this. These reflections have mitigated the intense anxiety of mind, and well-founded apprehensions, arising from a consciousness of my own deficiency of qualifications to preside over this elevated body.

In the exercise of the powers conferred upon me by the constitution, it shall be my effort to pursue that course of conduct which has recommended me to the consideration of my fellow-citizens—a faithful discharge of my public duties, to the extent of my abilities, and in a manner that shall seem best calculated to give satisfaction to all. Contemplating the duties and ceremonies of this day, it might be considered improper in me to consume any more of your time by adverting to other subjects, however relevant to the new position which I now occupy. I shall, therefore, close my remarks by informing the Senate that I am now ready to proceed with the business for which we are assembled.

There were now ascertained to be present every Senator from every State in the Union, except one, (Mr. MCKINLEY, of Alabama,) being fifty-one in number.

The new members present were—

From Indiana, OLIVER H. SMITH; from Illinois, RICHARD M. YOUNG; from Ohio, WILLIAM ALLEN; from Maine, REUEL WILLIAMS; from Connecticut, PERRY SMITH.

The oath prescribed by the constitution was then administered by the VICE PRESIDENT to the new Senators, and those Senators re-elected, except Mr. SEVIER, of Arkansas, the consideration of whose credentials of appointment by the Governor (as to filling the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of his own term) was postponed to Monday.

The Senate continued its sittings on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday following, and were engaged, principally, upon executive business—acting upon the nominations of the President.

On Tuesday, Mr. GRUNDY, from the Judiciary Committee, reported "that the Hon. AMBROSE H. SEVIER is entitled to his seat as a Senator from Arkansas, under the executive appointment of the 17th of January, 1837; and that he now have the oath of office accordingly administered to him." On Wednesday the report was debated, and on the question of agreeing to it the yeas and nays were as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright, Young—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Webster, Williams—19.

Mr. SEVIER then appeared and took the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT having retired from the chair on Tuesday, according to usage, to allow of the choice of a President pro tem. before the adjournment, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a President pro tem., when WILLIAM R. KING, of Alabama, was elected.

At the close of Thursday's sitting, a committee was appointed, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, to announce to the President of the United States that the Senate had got through its business, and was ready to adjourn, if he had no further communication to make to them. Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. LYON were appointed a committee accordingly.

On Friday morning, at 10 o'clock, the committee reported that they had discharged the duty thus confided to them, and had received for answer that the President had no further communication to make them. And then

The Senate adjourned sine die.

Inauguration of President Van Buren.

On Saturday, the 4th of March, Martin Van Buren, Esq., President elect of the United States, was inducted into office with the usual formalities and ceremonies ; and thereupon delivered the following inaugural address :

FELLOW-CITIZENS:—The practice of all my predecessors imposes on me an obligation I cheerfully fulfil, to accompany the first and solemn act of my public trust, with an avowal of the principles that will guide me in performing it, and an expression of my feelings on assuming a charge so responsible and vast. In imitating their example, I tread in the footsteps of illustrious men, whose superiors, it is our happiness to believe, are not found on the executive calendar of any country. Among them we recognize the earliest and firmest pillars of the republic ; those by whom our national independence was first declared ; him who, above all others, contributed to establish it on the field of battle ; and those whose expanded intellect and patriotism constructed, improved, and perfected, the inestimable institutions under which we live. If such men, in the position I now occupy, felt themselves overwhelmed by a sense of gratitude for this, the highest of all marks of their country's confidence, and by a consciousness of their inability adequately to discharge the duties of an office so difficult and exalted, how much more must these considerations affect one who can rely on no such claims for favor or forbearance. Unlike all who have preceded me, the Revolution, that gave us existence as one people, was achieved at the period of my birth ; and, whilst I contemplate with grateful reverence that memorable event, I feel that I belong to a later age, and that I may not expect my countrymen to weigh my actions with the same kind and partial hand.

So sensibly, fellow-citizens, do these circumstances press themselves upon me, that I should not dare to enter upon my path of duty, did I not look for the generous aid of those who will be associated with me in the various and co-ordinate branches of the Government ; did I not repose, with unwavering reliance, on the patriotism, the intelligence, and the kindness, of a people who never yet deserted a public servant honestly laboring in their cause ; and, above all, did I not permit myself humbly to hope for the sustaining support of an ever-watchful and beneficent Providence.

To the confidence and consolation derived from these sources, it would be ungrateful not to add those which spring from our present fortunate condition. Though not altogether exempt from embarrassments that disturb our tranquillity at home and threaten it abroad, yet, in all the attributes of a great, happy, and flourishing people, we stand without a parallel in the world. Abroad, we enjoy the respect and, with scarcely an exception, the friendship of every nation. At home, while our Government quietly, but efficiently, performs the sole legitimate end of political institutions, in doing the greatest good to the greatest number, we present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found.

How imperious, then, is the obligation imposed upon every citizen, in his own sphere of action, whether limited or extended, to exert himself in perpetuating a condition of things so singularly happy. All the lessons of history and experience must be lost upon us, if we are content to trust alone to the peculiar advantages we happen to possess. Position and climate, and the bounteous resources that nature has scattered with so liberal a hand—even the diffused intelligence and elevated character of our people—will avail us nothing, if we fail sacredly to uphold those political institutions that were wisely and deliberately formed with reference to every circumstance that could preserve, or might endanger, the blessings we enjoy. The thoughtful framers of our constitution legislated for our country as they found it. Looking upon it with the eyes of statesmen and of patriots, they saw all the sources of rapid and wonderful prosperity ; but they saw also that various habits, opinions, and institutions, peculiar to the various portions of so vast a region, were deeply fixed. Distinct sovereignties were in actual existence, whose cordial union was essential to the welfare and happiness of all. Between many of them there was, at least to some extent, a real diversity of interests, liable to be exaggerated through sinister designs ; they differed in size, in population, in wealth, and in actual and prospective resources and power ; they varied in the character of their industry and staple productions ; and in some existed domestic institutions which, unwisely disturbed, might endanger the harmony of the whole. Most carefully were all these circumstances weighed, and the foundations of the new Government laid upon principles of reciprocal concession and equitable compromise. The jealousies which the smaller States might entertain of the power of the rest were allayed by a rule of representation, confessedly unequal at that time, and designed forever to remain so. A natural fear that the broad scope of general legislation might bear upon, and unwisely control, particular interests, was counteracted by limits strictly drawn around the action of the federal authority; and to the people and the States was left unimpaired their sovereign power over the innumerable subjects embraced in the internal government of a just republic, excepting such only as necessarily appertain to the concerns of the whole confederacy, or its intercourse, as a united community, with the other nations of the world.

This provident forecast has been verified by time. Half a century, teeming with extraordinary events, and elsewhere producing astonishing results, has passed along, but on our institutions it has left no injurious mark. From a small community we have risen to a people powerful in numbers and in strength; but with our increase has gone, hand in hand, the progress of just principles; the privileges, civil and religious, of the humblest individual are still sacredly protected at home; and, while the valor and fortitude of our people have removed far from us the slightest apprehension of foreign power, they have not yet induced us, in a single instance, to forget what is right. Our commerce has been extended to the remotest nations; the value and even nature of our productions has been greatly changed; a wide difference has arisen in the relative wealth and resources of every portion of our country; yet the spirit of mutual regard and of faithful adherence to existing compacts has continued to prevail in our councils, and never long been absent from our conduct. We have learned by experience a fruitful lesson: that an implicit and undeviating adherence to the principles on which we set out can carry us prosperously onward, through all the conflicts of circumstances and the vicissitudes inseparable from the lapse of years.

The success that has thus attended our great experiment is, in itself, a sufficient cause for gratitude, on account of the happiness it has actually conferred, and the example it has unanswerably given. But to me, my fellow-citizens, looking forward to the far-distant future, with ardent prayers and confiding hopes, this retrospect presents a ground for still deeper delight. It impresses on my mind a firm belief that the perpetuity of our institutions depends upon ourselves; that, if we maintain the principles on which they were established, they are destined to confer their benefits on countless generations yet to come; and that America will present to every friend of mankind the cheering proof that a popular Government, wisely formed, is wanting in no element of endurance or strength. Fifty years ago, its rapid failure was boldly predicted. Latent and uncontrollable causes of dissolution were supposed to exist, even by the wise and good; and not only did unfriendly or speculative theorists anticipate for us the fate of past republics, but the fears of many an honest patriot overbalanced his sanguine hopes. Look back on these forebodings, not hastily, but reluctantly made, and see how, in every instance, they have completely failed.

An imperfect experience, during the struggles of the Revolution, was supposed to warrant the belief that the people would not bear the taxation requisite to discharge an immense public debt already incurred, and to defray the necessary expenses of the Government. The cost of two wars has been paid, not only without a murmur, but with unequalled alacrity. No one is now left to doubt that every burden will be cheerfully borne that may be necessary to sustain our civil institutions, or guard our honor or our welfare. Indeed, all experience has shown that the willingness of the people to contribute to these ends, in cases of emergency, has uniformly outrun the confidence of their representatives.

In the early stages of the new Government, when all felt the imposing influence as they recognized the unequalled services of the first President, it was a common sentiment, that the great weight of his character could alone bind the discordant materials of our Government together, and save us from the violence of contending factions. Since his death nearly forty years are gone. Party exasperation has been often carried to its highest point; the virtue and the fortitude of the people have sometimes been greatly tried; yet our system, purified and enhanced in value by all it has encountered, still preserves its spirit of free and fearless discussion, blended with unimpaired fraternal feeling.

The capacity of the people for self-government, and their willingness, from a high sense of duty, and without those exhibitions of coercive power so generally employed in other countries, to submit to all needful restraints and exactions of the municipal law, have also been favorably exemplified in the history of the American States. Occasionally, it is true, the ardor of public sentiment, outrunning the regular progress of the judicial tribunals, or seeking to reach cases not denounced as criminal by the existing law, has displayed itself in a manner calculated to give pain to the friends of free government, and to encourage the hopes of those who wish for its overthrow. These occurrences, however, have been far less frequent in our country than in any other of equal population on the globe; and, with the diffusion of intelligence, it may well be hoped that they will constantly diminish in frequency and violence. The generous patriotism and sound common sense of the great mass of our fellow-citizens will assuredly, in time, produce this result; for as every assumption of illegal power not only wounds the majesty of the law, but furnishes a pretext for abridging the liberties of the people, the latter have the most direct and permanent interest in preserving the landmarks of social order, and maintaining, on all occasions, the inviolability of those constitutional and legal provisions which they themselves have made.

In a supposed unfitness of our institutions for those hostile emergencies which no country can always avoid, their friends found a fruitful source of apprehension, their enemies of hope. While they foresaw less promptness of action than in Governments differently formed, they overlooked the far more important consideration that, with us, war could never be the result of individual or irresponsible will; but must be a measure of redress for injuries sustained, voluntarily resorted to by those who were to bear the necessary sacrifice, who would consequently feel an individual interest in the contest, and whose energy would, be commensurate with the difficulties to be encountered. Actual events have proved their error; the last war, far from impairing, gave new confidence to our Government; and, amid recent apprehensions of a similar conflict, we saw that the energies of our country would not be wanting in ample season to vindicate its rights. We may not possess, as we should not desire to possess, the extended and ever-ready military organization of other nations; we may occasionally suffer in the outset for the want of it; but among ourselves, all doubt upon this great point has ceased, while a salutary experience will prevent a contrary opinion from inviting aggression from abroad.

Certain danger was foretold from the extension of our territory, the multiplication of States, and the increase of population. Our system was supposed to be adapted only to boundaries comparatively narrow. These have been widened beyond conjecture; the members of our confederacy are already doubled; and the numbers of our people are incredibly augmented. The alleged causes of danger have long surpassed anticipation, but none of the consequences have followed. The power and influence of the republic have risen to a height obvious to all mankind; respect for its authority was not more apparent at its ancient than it is at its present limits; new and inexhaustible sources of general prosperity have been opened; the effects of distance have been averted by the inventive genius of our people, developed and fostered by the spirit of our institutions, and the enlarged variety and amount of interests, productions, and pursuits, have strengthened the chain of mutual dependence, and formed a circle of mutual benefits too apparent ever to be overlooked.

In justly balancing the powers of the Federal and State authorities, difficulties nearly insurmountable arose at the outset, and subsequent collisions were deemed inevitable. Amid these, it was scarcely believed possible that a scheme of government, so complex in construction, could remain uninjured. From time to time embarrassments have certainly occurred; but how just is the confidence in future safety imparted by the knowledge that each in succession has been happily removed. Overlooking partial and temporary evils, as inseparable from the practical operation of all human institutions, and looking only to the general result, every patriot has reason to be satisfied. While the Federal Government has successfully performed its appropriate functions in relation to foreign affairs and concerns evidently national, that of every State has remarkably improved in protecting and developing local interests and individual welfare; and if the vibrations of authority have occasionally tended too much towards one or the other, it is unquestionably certain that the ultimate operation of the entire system has been to strengthen all the existing institutions, and to elevate our whole country in prosperity and renown.

The last, perhaps the greatest, of the prominent sources of discord and disaster supposed to lurk in our political condition, was the institution of domestic slavery. Our forefathers were deeply impressed with the delicacy of this subject, and they treated it with a forbearance so evidently wise, that, in spite of every sinister foreboding, it never, until the present period, disturbed the tranquillity of our common country. Such a result is sufficient evidence of the justice and the patriotism of their course: it is evidence, not to be mistaken, that an adherence to it can prevent all embarrassment from this, as well as from every other anticipated cause of difficulty or danger. Have not recent events made it obvious to the slightest reflection, that the least deviation from this spirit of forbearance is injurious to every interest, that of humanity included? Amidst the violence of excited passions, this generous and fraternal feeling has been sometimes disregarded; and, standing as I now do before my countrymen in this high place of honor and of trust, I cannot refrain from anxiously invoking my fellow-citizens never to be deaf to its dictates. Perceiving, before my election, the deep interest this subject was beginning to excite, I believed it a solemn duty fully to make known my sentiments in regard to it; and now, when every motive for misrepresentation has passed away, I trust that they will be candidly weighed and understood. At least, they will be my standard of conduct in the path before me. I then declared that, if the desire of those of my countrymen who were favorable to my election was gratified, "I must go into the presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt, on the part of Congress, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and also with a determination equally decided to resist the slightest interference with it in the States where it exists." I submitted also to my fellow-citizens, with fulness and frankness, the reasons which led me to this determination. The result authorizes me to believe that they have been approved, and are confided in, by a majority of the people of the United States, including those whom they most immediately affect. It now only remains to add, that no bill conflicting with these views can ever receive my constitutional sanction. These opinions have been adopted in the firm belief that they are in accordance with the spirit that actuated the venerated fathers of the republic, and that succeeding experience has proved them to be humane, patriotic, expedient, honorable, and just. If the agitation of this subject was intended to reach the stability of our institutions, enough has occurred to show that it has signally failed; and that in this, as in every other instance, the apprehensions of the timid and the hopes of the wicked for the destruction of our Government are again destined to be disappointed. Here and there, indeed, scenes of dangerous excitement have occurred; terrifying instances of local violence have been witnessed; and a reckless disregard of the consequences of their conduct has exposed individuals to popular indignation; but neither masses of the people, nor sections of the country, have been swerved from their devotion to the bond of union, and the principles it has made sacred. It will be ever thus. Such attempts at dangerous agitation may periodically return, but with each the object will be better understood. That predominating affection for our political system which prevails throughout our territorial limits; that calm and enlightened judgment which ultimately governs our people as one vast body, will always be at hand to resist and control every effort, foreign or domestic, which aims or would lead to overthrow our institutions.

What can be more gratifying than such a retrospect as this! We look back on obstacles avoided, and dangers overcome; on expectations more than realized, and prosperity perfectly secured. To the hopes of the hostile, the fears of the timid, and the doubts of the anxious, actual experience has given the conclusive reply. We have seen time gradually dispel every unfavorable foreboding, and our constitution surmount every adverse circumstance, dreaded at the outset as beyond control. Present excitement will, at all times, magnify present dangers; but true philosophy must teach us that none more threatening than the past can remain to be overcome; and we ought, for we have just reason, to entertain an abiding confidence in the stability of our institutions, and an entire conviction that, if administered in the true form, character, and spirit, in which they were established, they are abundantly adequate to preserve to us and our children the rich blessings already derived from them ; to make our beloved land, for a thousand generations, that chosen spot where happiness springs from a perfect equality of political rights.

For myself, therefore, I desire to declare, that the principle that will govern me, in the high duty to which my country calls me, is a strict adherence to the letter and spirit of the constitution, as it was designed by those who framed it. Looking back to it as a sacred instrument, carefully and not easily framed ; remembering that it was throughout a work of concession and compromise ; viewing it as limited to national objects ; regarding it as leaving to the people and the States all power not explicitly parted with ; I shall endeavor to preserve, protect, and defend it, by anxiously referring to its provision for direction in every action. To matters of domestic concernment which it has intrusted to the Federal Government, and to such as relate to our intercourse with foreign nations, I shall zealously devote myself ; beyond those limits I shall never pass.

To enter, on this occasion, into a further or more minute exposition of my views on the various questions of domestic policy, would be as obtrusive as it is probably unexpected. Before the suffrages of my countrymen were conferred upon me, I submitted to them, with great precision, my opinions on all the most prominent of these subjects. These opinions I shall endeavor to carry out with my utmost ability.

Our course of foreign policy has been so uniform and intelligible as to constitute a rule of executive conduct which leaves little to my discretion, unless, indeed, I were willing to run counter to the lights of experience and the known opinions of my constituents. We sedulously cultivate the friendship of all nations, as the condition most compatible with our welfare and the principles of our Government. We decline alliances, as adverse to our peace. We desire commercial relations on equal terms, being ever willing to give a fair equivalent for advantages received. We endeavor to conduct our intercourse with openness and sincerity ; promptly avowing our objects, and seeking to establish that mutual frankness which is as beneficial in the dealings of nations as of men. We have no disposition, and we disclaim all right, to meddle in disputes, whether internal or foreign, that may molest other countries ; regarding them, in their actual state, as social communities, and preserving a strict neutrality in all their controversies. Well knowing the tried valor of our people, and our exhaustless resources, we neither anticipate nor fear any designed aggression ; and, in the consciousness of our own just conduct, we feel a security that we shall never be called upon to exert our determination, never to permit an invasion of our rights without punishment or redress.

In approaching, then, in the presence of my assembled countrymen, to make the solemn promise that yet remains, and to pledge myself that I will faithfully execute the office I am about to fill, I bring with me a settled purpose to maintain the institutions of my country, which, I trust, will atone for the errors I commit.

In receiving from the people the sacred trust twice confided to my illustrious predecessor, and which he has discharged so faithfully and so well, I know that I cannot expect to perform the arduous task with equal ability and success. But, united as I have been in his councils, a daily witness of his exclusive and unsurpassed devotion to his country's welfare, agreeing with him in sentiments which his countrymen have warmly supported, and permitted to partake largely of his confidence, I may hope that somewhat of the same cheering approbation will be found to attend upon my path. For him I but express, with my own, the wishes of all—that he may yet long live to enjoy the brilliant evening of his well-spent life ; and, for myself, conscious of but one desire, faithfully to serve my country, I throw myself, without fear, on its justice and its kindness. Beyond that I only look to the gracious protection of the Divine Being, whose strengthening support I humbly solicit, and whom I fervently pray to look down upon us all. May it be among the dispensations of His providence to bless our beloved country with honors and with length of days ; may her ways be ways of pleasantness, and all her paths be peace.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 5, 1836.

At twelve o'clock the SPEAKER (Hon. JAMES K. POLK of Tennessee) took the chair, and called the House to order.

The roll of members having been called over by the Clerk, (WALTER S. FRANKLIN Esq.,) and a quorum being found in attendance, the House proceeded to business, and appointed a committee, jointly with a committee of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of the organization of the two Houses, and their readiness to receive any communication from him.

TUESDAY, December 6.

The Hon. JOHN YOUNG, elected a member from the State of New York, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Philo C. Fuller, appeared this day, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE informed the House that the joint committee appointed on yesterday to wait on the President of the United States, had performed their duty; and that they had been directed by the President to say that, at 12 o'clock this day, he would make a communication, in writing, to both Houses. (See Senate proceedings of this date.)

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Death of Mr. Dickson.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It is only a few years since I witnessed from that gallery the affecting honors paid to the remains of a distinguished Representative from the State of Mississippi.*

Since that period, she has lost two sons,* eminent for talents in the public service, and you are now called on to render the last homage to the memory of another. The time that has intervened since the death of my lamented colleague saves me the painful duty of being the first to communicate it to his friends, now present. He died, sir, as he had lived, through a life of extraordinary vicissitudes, with characteristic fortitude, with but one wish ungratified—a wish so natural to the human heart—that, in his dark hour of dissolution, he might be supported by his nearest and best beloved, and the cherished beings that grew up and clustered around his fireside.

Sir, let death come when it will, in what shape it may, in the battle or the shipwreck, or in the solitude of the cloister, it is appalling to human contemplation. But when it overtakes us in a distant land, and we know that our last moments of agony and infirmity are to be witnessed by stranger eyes, and are conscious that we must be carried down to an unwept grave, where no kindred dust shall mingle with ours forever, and the last hope of home and of family fades from our filmed view, oh! sir, this is death! this it is to die. Such was the destiny of my colleague, "by strangers honored and by strangers mourned." His dying message was for those broken-hearted ones, now in widowhood and orphanage—his expiring sigh a prayer for them!

Mr Speaker, I shall pronounce no eulogy on the dead. Let his history speak it. For twenty years he preserved a high position in the public service, and died poorer than when he entered it, leaving to his children the riches of an honorable name. If it be praise to have lived beloved and die unapproached, then it is due to him.

* Hon. Christopher Rankin.

* Thomas B. Read and Robert H. Adams, of the U. S. Senate.

DECEMBER, 1836.]

Death of Mr. Kinnard.

[H. OF R.]

It now only remains for us to pay the final honors to his memory—sad, because it seems like breaking the last link that binds the living to the dead; solemn, when we reflect how soon, how very soon, some friend now present may invoke the same tribute for ourselves!

I offer you, sir, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in testimony of their respect for the memory of DAVID DICKSON, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi, the members of this House will wear crape for one month.

This resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Death of General Coffee, of Georgia.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, addressed the chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: On me has devolved the mournful duty of announcing to this House the death of one of its members, my friend and colleague, the Hon. JOHN COFFEE, of Georgia. For a considerable portion of the last session of Congress he labored under severe indisposition, which at different periods detained him from the service of the House. Although his symptoms were so mitigated before the adjournment as to enable him to resume the regular discharge of his official duties, no radical amendment had taken place, and with gradually increasing force his disease closed his existence, in the bosom of his family, in the month of September last.

In speaking of a departed friend and colleague, the language of eulogy might be excused; but to those who have been associated with General COFFEE in the labors of this House, for the last three years, such language would be unnecessary.

Suffice it to say that, in his domestic and social relations, he was eminently characterized by affectionate kindness and courtesy, and that public duties were discharged with honor to himself and fidelity to his country. As the usual mark of respect, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with the liveliest sensibility the annunciation of the death of the Hon. JOHN COFFEE, a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, unanimously, That this House tenders to the relatives of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this mournful event; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

These resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and then, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 8.

The Madison Papers.

The following Message in writing was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the revolutionary Congress, and of the conventions that formed the Constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject-matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared—long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow-men until he and all who had been participators with him in the scenes he describes have passed away—well deserves to become the property of the nation; and cannot fail, if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their Government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, and imbedded in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Message, having been read, was, on motion of Mr. PATTON, referred to the proposed Joint Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Death of Mr. Kinnard.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Painful as the duty may be, it is mine of this morning to announce to the House the decease of another of its members.

My friend and colleague, the Hon. GEORGE L. KINNARD, died at Cincinnati on the 25th ult., after a few days of suffering much more severe than ordinarily falls to the lot of mankind in passing that dread ordeal. The immediate cause of his death is perhaps well known to this House and to the country. It was his misfortune to suffer from one of those appalling accidents which are of but too frequent recurrence upon our steamboats, by the bursting of their machinery. He, too, like one of our associates whose death was announced on yesterday, died among strangers, yet among friends. At the hospitable mansion of the Hon. Robert T. Lytle, (where he paid the great debt of nature,) he received the most unremitting attention and kindness, as also the most unwearied services of those who rank among the first in the profession of medicine; but all would not do; the omnipotent fiat had gone forth by which he was called from the service of his country to the service of his God. Had I studied by set phrase to pass a eulogy upon his character, I should find words too cold, language too inexpressive, to do justice to his virtues. It was my good fortune to be favored for many years with his acquaintance, and to share largely in his friendship. With a clear and discriminating mind, an honest heart, and an untiring industry, he had elevated himself to the highest seat in the affections of those who knew him best. In all the varied relations of life, (to which he was about to add another of a sacred and responsible character,) he sustained the most unsullied reputation, leaving to the world indubitable evidence, not only that he was a man of high attainments, but that he was emphatically one of God's noblest works—an honest man.

Mr. D. then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted :

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the Hon. GEORGE L. KINNARD, late a member of this House from the State of Indiana, the members of this body will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the connections and constituents of Mr. KINNARD are joined in the sincerest condolence for the loss of that intestimable man to them, to us, and to the country.

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, December 12.

Deposit with the States—Motion to release them from its Restoration.

Mr. MERCER moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to amend the 13th section of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," by releasing the several States who may receive any part of the surplus revenue of the United States, in pursuance of that act, from any obligation to return the same.

Mr. MERCER, after a few observations upon the object of this proposition, moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution till Wednesday week next, and make it the special order of the day for that day.

Mr. DUNLAP remarked : Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the gentleman's resolution being made the special order of this House. The resolution involves a very important question, to wit, the power of Congress to distribute the surplus revenue. This important constitutional question was avoided at the last session, and now it is intended to be brought up, to the exclusion of all other business. The States have the money, and may do what they please with it, and I wish the discussion of this subject to be postponed until a long session of Congress. This will be a very short session, and should be a business session. I am opposed to all unnecessary discussion at this session ; and I desire that the business of the American people should be attended to. I therefore move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays on the question of laying his resolution on the table ; which were ordered ; and being taken without debate, (the rules not admitting debate on a motion to lay any proposition on the table,) stood—yeas 126, nays 73.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 13.

The President's Message.

On motion of Mr. LOYALL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair,) on the annual Message of the President of the United States.

Executive Administration.

Mr. WISE offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation, be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their business or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured or impaired the public service and interest ; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. WISE then addressed the House as follows :

Mr. Chairman : In submitting the resolution of reference which I have sent to the Chair, I deem it my duty to offer some reflections to the House and to the country.

Sir, this paper is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson. The contemplation of it as such is deeply affecting to the sincere lover of him, and solemnly mournful to the honest lover of his country.

What should the last annual message of Andrew Jackson have been? Who is he, what has he been? The answer to this question ought to determine what this last act of its kind of his should have been.

A man of humble but respectable origin, he was born in the times of his country's travail for independence. His precocious spirit of resistance to oppression marked his infant body with the scars of the Revolution. After the times which tried men's souls had passed away ;

Executive Administration—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

after the blessings of freedom had been secured by all the muniments of the institutions of our fathers, the fruits of peace, and virtue, and wisdom, and jealous patriotism; after varied and chequered scenes of private and public life, under a destiny adverse only so far as it was full of dangers, in games not olympic, in contests not heroic, we find him in the midst of his country's second troubles a citizen soldier, a major-general of the army of the republic.

He "was ambitious of fame; and as long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters." A bold, energetic, and dauntless commander, he carried conquest, in spite of all dangers and difficulties, into the wilderness of the savage tribes of the Southern frontier; was the daring but successful and justified invader of a neutral territory, and finally "filled the measure of his country's glory" in defence of Orleans, where he assumed to be the arbiter of martial law, the judge advocate of men's allegiance—where he conquered the conquerors of Napoleon—where he professed and practised submission to the civil authority, and where he acquired the title of Hero. And there was created, I will say, "a dear-bought debt of gratitude" from his country.

"Hail, second Saviour!" was shouted from the lips of every grateful heart, and echoed from every hill and valley; his name was emblazoned high on the rolls of imperishable military fame, and peace was quick to hallow his victory. With peace his warlike occupations were gone, but civil honors were showered and thickened around him. From the camp he rose to a seat in the Senate chamber—for then the Senate chamber was higher than the camp. He bore, or seemed to bear, his honors patiently; but all that had been done or could be done, it seemed, was not enough for him, in the estimation of a generous people. He was nominated for the first place on earth—the presidency of these united, sovereign, and independent States of America; for then these States were united, sovereign, and independent. Civilians and statesmen, of proudest names and stations, were his competitors; but he was the people's candidate, against men in office, against the powers that were, against their intrigues, their patronage, and their caucuses; and in consideration thereof, and of his just appellation of Hero, he was most popular and strongest in the plurality of votes. He was defeated—defeated here, in this hall, in the House of Representatives, by men such as we are—and what we, the representatives of the people, are, I will not name—by means I will not describe. It is sufficient to say that the manner of his defeat was not only enough to insure his subsequent triumph, but to rivet him immovably, right or wrong, in the hearts of his countrymen forever. He became the champion of popular rights and the elective franchise, against office-holders and office-seekers—the favorite pet of the people, who was to scourge bribery and corruption, whose name was to be terror to all evil-doers, whose policy was to be retrenchment and reform, by whom the independence of Congress of executive patronage was to be maintained, by whom that patronage was to be curtailed to harmlessness, and in whom "the line of safe precedents" was to be broken and destroyed. He was swept and rushed along on the roaring tide of an overwhelming popularity high up into office, on the second flood, and that popularity has never deserted him—no fickleness in it, it has never retired for a moment; notwithstanding strong winds which have blown from every point of the compass, and opposing currents in every direction, it has continued to swell and swell, until it has become a flood—I will not say which threatens the dry land. He came into power professing and proclaiming the most severe, aye, stoical democratic principles; the people confided in him, were bound to him the closer, and have never wavered yet in their confidence—I will not say, though he has tried it to the uttermost. Unfortunately for him, when he was crowned with the reward of his military services, and was inducted into office, he not only found "competitors to be removed, enemies to be punished," but he was beset by friends from whom he should have put up prayers to be saved. I will not say that he was lacking in those magnanimous qualifications of a truly great man, which alone could rid him and guard him from these misfortunes—for man, poor feeble man, is weak under the most ordinary temptations, and his virtue must be strong who presides in a palace—but misfortunes they were.

So it was, he was buoyed up in the affections of the sovereign people. Has he done wrong? He was popular. Has he done worse than wrong? He was popular, and he was the President who could do no wrong, in whom popularity was joined with power and patronage. Has ruthless proscription for opinion's sake turned faithful public servants out of their employment, and snatched from the mouths of their families their bread? We are told the President ordered the removals, and the people had sanctioned proscription! Has favoritism filled the vacancies which proscription has made with the servile tools of party, to do the bidding of power? We are told that the President had need of his own friends, and that the people have sanctioned the maxim, "that to the victors belong the spoils!" Have the highest and richest offices, worth more than half of a million, been bestowed as rewards upon members of Congress, and has "corruption become the order of the day?" We are told that the President was the best judge of the selection of high functionaries, and that the people have sanctioned the "order of the day!" As "till the reign of Severus, the virtue and even the good sense of the Emperors had been distinguished by their zeal or affected reverence for the Roman Senate, and by a tender regard to the nice frame of civil policy instituted by Augustus," so had the virtue and even the good sense of preceding Presidents, till the reign of Andrew Jackson, been distinguished by their zeal and reverence for the American Senate, and by a tender regard for the nice frame of civil policy instituted by the fathers of our republic! Had "his youth," like that of Severus, "been trained in the implicit obedience of camps, and his riper years spent in the despotism of military command! could not his haughty and inflexible spirit discover, or would he not acknowledge, the advantage of preserving an intermediate power, however imaginary, between the Emperor and the army?" As in the reign of Severus, was "the Senate filled with polished and eloquent slaves from the eastern (and I may add southern) provinces, who justified personal flattery by speculative principles of servitude?" Have the lawyers of his reign, whom I will not call Papinians or Pauluses, or Ulpian, "concurred in teaching that the imperial authority was held not by the delegated commission, but by the irrevocable resignation of the Senate? and that the Emperor might destroy vested rights and the incorporations of law by his sic volo?" We are told that the aristocratic Senate had dared to offend the majesty of the President, and that the people have sanctioned the word "expunge!" Has the independence of Congress been totally destroyed by corrupt bribes and the power of appointing members to office? We are told that the representatives of the people are selected to do the will of the President, and that the people have sanctioned the creed that there can be no treason to the country so long as there is fidelity to "the party." Has the President "assumed the responsibility," seized the custody and the control of the public money, in defiance of all law and precedent, and placed them in the hands of a traitor and a perjured knave? We are told that the monster bank was his enemy, and that the people have sanctioned the "union of the purse and sword." Has he assumed to himself judicial powers, and the prerogative to administer the laws and the constitution according to his own interpretation and his own irresponsible will? We are told that the President's conscience alone is concerned in their execution, and that the people have sanctioned in him the power of imperial magistrate. As imperial magistrate, has he "assumed the conduct and style of sovereign and conqueror, and exercised, without disguise, the whole legislative as well as executive power?" We are told that the President is "the Government," and that the people have sanctioned the pretension that all offices and their powers are his! Have the expenditures of his administration increased and grown enormously beyond all example, to thirty-eight millions from fifteen millions, without a cent of public debt to be paid? We are told that the President is the best judge of the wants of the country, and that the people have sanctioned wasteful and profligate extravagance! Have thousands and hundreds of thousands been expended on east rooms, and gravel walks, and all the regalia of a palace, in fact, for a republican officer in form? We are told that the President's court should be as splendid as any King's, and that the people have sanctioned royalty! Has the patronage of the Federal Government been tremendously increased, and exerted in conflict with the freedom of elections? We are told that the reign of the President should be perpetuated, and that the people have sanctioned the interference of office-holders with the elective franchise! Has the currency of the country been totally deranged, and is there danger of a universal crash in trade and finance? We are told that the President's golden experiment must be fully tested to our hearts' content, and that the people have sanctioned the "inverted pyramid" of local bank paper rags, which threatens to totter over our heads! Has "the fine theory of a republic insensibly vanished, and made way for the more natural and substantial feelings of a monarchy?" We are told that the President may be a king by the will of the people, and that the people have already consented to the change! Has the President been "freed from the restraint of civil laws? can he command by his arbitrary will the lives and fortunes of his subjects, and," finally, "has he disposed of the empire, as of his private patrimony," by nominating and electing his successor? We are told that the President was entitled to his right of election as well as other men, and that the people have sanctioned and submitted to his dictation!

Sir, let me not be misunderstood. Let no one infer that I am indulging in any tirade against the President, or that I am venting any spleen whatever. No, sir; no. Far, far be it from me now, now when it is too late, if ever it was right and proper, to indulge in stronger invective against a Chief Magistrate than truth and patriotism required. He of whom I speak is, I deeply regret, now lying on the couch of human suffering, the last, I fear, from what I am told, of his sufferings in this world of sorrow. I too have served him with more than half the zeal I ever served a more omnipotent master. He will, if he lives, soon retire from the palace of power, and resign all the pomp and circumstance of state and station into other hands, which are to reign after him. God grant, sir, that his retirement may be that peaceful and calm and blessed retirement from the harassing cares of office, which belongs to wisdom, virtue, and the consciousness of being a public benefactor—such as was illustrated in the examples of a Washington and a Madison. My prayer fervently is, that he may yet live long at his beloved Hermitage, in the holy retreat of his own private sanctuary, and spend the decline of his days in solemn reflections upon the scenes and events of a long life, most actively spent in deeds big with the fate of a country he has defended, and of its institutions "hallowed by the wisdom of sages, and consecrated by the blood of heroes." May he live long to witness the effects of his errors, if errors he has committed, to acknowledge and repent of them, and in like manner to enjoy the blessings of his administration, if of any blessings it has been fruitful. No, sir; my meaning is not now to condemn the President, but to defend the people. This is the sole object of the questions I have put. I do not mean to accuse the President of all these enormities against civil liberty, of which I have asked—is he guilty? Nor do I admit, if he is guilty of them, that the people have sanctioned all or any which I have enumerated. But, sir, I merely state the fact, that the party who claim to hold him in keeping, and to hold on to his power after him, claim and tell us that the people have yielded every thing worth preserving, and have sanctioned all these enormities, and more, and worse. What their object may be in admitting these encroachments, and in claiming that the people have sanctioned and approved them, I know not, unless they mean hereafter to rely upon most "unsafe precedents!" The fact is alarmingly so, that these claims are now set up, going so far as to asperse the people whom they affect so much to reverence with approving and sanctioning proscription, corruption, arbitrary power, the destruction of the checks and balances of the Government, profligate extravagance in its administration, executive dictation, royalty itself, and a caucous succession in an elective monarchy? In advance, I warn them that I now deny the fact that the people have sanctioned or approved of any such unpardonable sins against them for their only bulwarks of safety. If this people have yielded already what "the party" claim, they would have yielded all for which their fathers fought; and those fathers would rise, if the mighty dead could rise, from their very graves to reproach their debased degeneracy, and their cruel injustice, alike to them and all posterity.

Executive Administration—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

I have done no wrong to Jackson, then, as all candid minds will bear me witness; I have given him credit for "every captive he has brought to Rome." At the same time, I do not mean to say he has not committed many grievous errors. For many of them I can well account, though I cannot pardon. We are taught in history that "suspicious princes often promote the last of mankind, from a vain persuasion that those who have no dependence, except on their favor, will have no attachment, except to the person of their benefactor." Thus were the Perennises and Cleanders prompted by a Commodus; and such ministers were well qualified to drive from the esteem of such a prince the "faithful counselors to whom a Marcus had recommended his son"—the one "a servile and ambitious minister, who had obtained his post by the murder of his predecessor, but who possessed a considerable share of vigor and ability;" the other "was a Phrygian by birth, of a nation over whose stubborn but servile temper blows only could prevail. He had been sent from his native country to Rome in the capacity of a slave. As a slave he entered the imperial palace, rendered himself useful to his master's passions, and rapidly ascended to the most exalted station which a subject could enjoy. His influence over the mind of Commodus was much greater than that of his predecessor. Avarice was the reigning passion of his soul, and the great principle of his administration. The rank of consul, of patrician, of senator, was exposed to public sale. In the lucrative provincial employments the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary."

Is it astonishing that, with ministers like those of Commodus, tempted as they were by the public money in deposit, and by the vast public domain of this nation, stretching over rivers and lakes, and prairies of unbounded extent and inexhaustible fertility, Jackson was duped, and the public deposits were removed within reach of Perennis and Cleander? Again, sir, an incident in the history of this same emperor, very similar to the one in the history of our own President, accounts for his hostility to the Roman Senate: "One evening, as the Emperor was returning to the palace through a dark and narrow portico in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his passage, rushed upon him with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, 'The Senate sends you this.' The conspiracy was proved to have been formed not in the Senate, but within the walls of the palace." But "the words of the assassin sunk deep into the mind of Commodus, and left an indelible impression of fear and hatred against the whole body of the Senate. The Delators, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished under the former reigns, again became formidable as soon as they discovered that the Emperor was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the Senate." Sir, we all know that in the snapping of a percussion cap the President heard distinctly the words, "The Senate sends you this"—that that detestable race of men called Delators were ready to swear that the conspiracy was formed in the Senate; and, if there was not a better reason, perhaps to the act of a madman now confined in prison might be ascribed the President's past hostility to the Senate. But there is a better reason. "By declaring themselves the protectors of the people, Marius and Cæsar subverted the constitution of their country." And, perhaps, in the histories of Marius and Cæsar, our modern Cleanders learned that an "humble and disarmed" Senate is always "found a tractable and useful instrument of dominion."

In a certain event, if the election of President had failed in this House, an "humbled and disarmed Senate" might have been found —a "tractable and useful instrument," indeed, to elect an Elagabalus, under whom another Hierocles might have enjoyed the honor of being "empress, husband;" and under whom "a dancer might have been made præfect of the city, a charioteer præfect of the watch, a barber præfect of the provisions," and all "recommended as fit officers—enormitate membrorum!" Sir, I might enumerate numberless such excuses for numberless such errors of the President, or rather of the President's ministers. But enough has been said; and I mean not to condemn or accuse him, I repeat, but to defend the people, whom "the party" accuse and condemn.

If it be true, as we are told, and I do not say it is not true, that the President has made and unmade men in office, has proscribed the faithful, has corrupted the pure, has humbled and disarmed the Senate, has made the House of Representatives servile and dependent, has seized and squandered the public money, has deranged the currency and endangered every man's estate, has controlled elections, has assumed royal prerogatives, made himself a king and a king his successor; and if it be also true, which I utterly deny, that the people have sanctioned all this exercise of absolute power, I ask gentlemen of all parties, those even who claim to be the exclusive keepers of the king's conscience, if this does not prove one virtue—the virtue of constancy, at least, in the people? Have they not been constant and confiding beyond measure in their attachment to him? Has their fault not been in too much confidence and constancy?

If what they say be true, and it is a main argument with them, that "the voice of the people is the voice of God;" that whatever Jackson has done they have sanctioned; that he spake, and they willed it; that he vetoed, and they voted with him; that he dictated, and they obeyed; is this not proof positive that their affections and their voices have ever sustained, have ever animated, have ever indulged, have ever justified and excused him? Such unexampled confidence, such unexampled constancy, such unexampled attachment and affection, were never witnessed before in any people towards any ruler; and I put it to the candor and sense of justice of all men to say, whether what the people have yielded to their favorite has not been more, trebly more, than reward enough for all his services and sacrifices, however great? Admitting the debt of their gratitude to him to have been ever so great, I ask if the debt has not been more than paid? Whether the President does not now owe more than he can ever pay to a generous people, who have confidingly, to a criminal degree, intrusted him with their all—their honors, their rights, their liberties, their sovereign power? Sir, what can one aged man, fast hurrying to the grave, pay to a people in consideration of what all the treasures of earth, and all the blood of them and their children, may not buy? Nothing! Nothing! Yes, yes, there is one boon, one sacred legacy, of inestimable value, which, in parting from them and the world, he might have left them. He might have left them the legacy of a patriot's advice. He might have left them the truth, and solemnly imprinted it upon their minds and memories forever, that "they had trusted him too much," and his advice to them, "never, never in their history, to trust another man as they had trusted him;" and he might have returned to them their trust, and have restored them to their senses. This, and this only, would have repaid them. It would have restored to them what has been taken from them, which alone can compensate for itself.

The last Message of such a President to such a people should have been the "farewell" of a father to his children. It should have been deep in wisdom, profound in its philosophy, hallowed in its lessons of virtue, calm in its tone and temper of reason, eloquent in its appeals, sublime in its moral, and passionate only in its fervent affection. It should have been the legacy of Augustus to his successors, the "farewell" address of Washington to his countrymen!

But this is the last annual Message of Andrew Jackson! I would, for him and his country, that it was any thing but what it is. And why is it what it is? Gentlemen will pardon me—I mean nothing disrespectful to the President—when I say they know it is due to candor and truth to say—it is what it is, because it is not the Message at all of Andrew Jackson! They know that, immediately upon the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the President and his prime ministers were dispersed from their duties at the seat of Government, and from the cares of public business, on their respective missions to the States of this Union. He of State bore despatches to Georgia, and "the Old Chief himself" was lugged along through Western Virginia, over "Ruts and ridges,

And bridges
Made of planks
In open ranks," to Tennessee and Alabama. It is a pity, sir, that more of the people had not witnessed the executive electioneering tour; for then, perhaps, more of the States would have followed the example of Georgia and Tennessee, neither of which could be seduced or intimidated into the support of "the man"—a Tennessee toast said, "the dog"—as well as "the master." I am told that they carried him about like a lion for show, and made him roar like a lion. They had catechisms prepared for him, and the negotiations of the mission were conducted by pre-concerted questions and answers. A crowd would collect—on the highway or in the bar-rooms, no matter which—and some "village politician" of "the party" would inquire—"What think you, General, of such a man?" In a loud tone, much too stentorian for those lungs which are now lacerated, the answer rung—"He is a traitor, sir." "There, there!" repeated the demagogues to the crowd—"did you not hear that?" "What think you of another, General?" "He is a liar, sir!" "What of another?" "He is a black-cockade federalist!" Of another? "He made a speech for which he paid some stenographer five dollars!" And another was—"Of no account—no account, sir, and ought to be sent home to have his place supplied by a more efficient man;" and another was—"Upon the fence, sir—upon the fence!" "But, General, what think you of—Mr. (the first time Reuben was ever called mister!) Reuben M. Whitney?" "There is no just cause of complaint against Mr. Whitney, sir; he is as true a patriot as ever was; they are all liars who accuse him of aught wrong, and the official documents prove them to be so!" All the while these responses were repeated by the deacons of the service, and the people were called to give heed to them. Those who saw the farce and the frauds did heed them, sir—did heed them.

My friend (Mr. Perron) told them that they would kill him; that there was too much travel and fatigue; too much standing and talking; too much bustle and excitement for a weak and infirm old man to bear. But still they showed him about, in the heat of summer, and still they made him roar, until he frightened the people, who at last began to apprehend he was a lion come to devour their freedom of elections, and all else they valued as dear. Defeated in his mission, he at length became disgusted himself, chagrined and mortified. He returned to Washington through Ohio, and, by the Guyandotte route, through Virginia again, and has been sick and disabled ever since. The loss of Tennessee, particularly the Hermitage, excited him still more, and this renewed excitement may have caused that hemorrhage at the lungs which has been pouring out the current of his life. At no moment since his return has he been able to write or dictate a message. There he has been lying, as it were, a dead lion, who could not even "shake the dew drop from his mane;" and his couch of infirmity has been haunted by the Perennises and Cleanders of his palace as by vampyres. In their hands has he fallen; and it is because this "last annual Message" comes to us and the country reeking with the fumes of the kitchen cabinet that it is what it is!

What is it? The worst as well as the last annual Message which Andrew Jackson ever wrote—I had like to have said, ever sent to both Houses of Congress. Its vanity and egotism—its profane hypocrisy and solemn mockery of the good man's supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe—its sophistical nonsense, showing its duplicity to a foreign power, and concealing its real policy from ourselves—its low, ad captandum arguments, addressed to all the prejudices of ignorance and passion, to justify the most shameless attacks upon the currency for the vile purposes of licensed depredators on the public lands—its glaring falsehoods as to the most important facts of trade, currency, banks of deposit, and finance—its electioneering, continually harping upon an institution dead in fact, and thrice wounded since dead—its oft-repeated homily against one good bank, and its unblushing recommendation, in the same breath, of nearly half one hundred bad and irresponsible banks—its disingenuous attempts to reconcile glaring inconsistencies of the President on the deposit and distribution measures—its pitiful apologies for the disgrace of our arms by Osceola—its bold recommendation of an increase of the standing army—its unjust attempt to cast censure, due to the errors and blunders of the administration itself, upon the shoulders of an innocent State officer, and then calling for an appropriation to repair these same errors, which it says are not those of this Government—its false claim of a national policy, founded in humanity towards the Indians—its reiterated jesuitical recommendation of an amendment of the constitution as to the election of President, which was never meant to be carried into effect by "the party," or to be any thing more than a topic with which to prejudice the people's minds against an election by the House—its impudent boast of the intelligence and patriotism of the successor, whom executive patronage and dictation have succeeded in electing—its shallow political economy—its demagoguism—its arts of vile deception and humbuggery—its rankling venom of party spirit—its miserable rhetoric, sinking below criticism—its grovelling moral sentiment—its total want of all sage counsel or advice, and of all pathos and feeling—are all equalled only by its false certificate in chief to "the prosperous condition of all the various executive departments," to "the ability and integrity" with which they have been conducted, and to the fact of the President's belief "that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation!"

Now, sir, complaints have been loudly made from various quarters, in this House and by the press, by responsible persons, as to the condition of most of the executive departments, and as to the want of ability and integrity with which they have been conducted; and investigations by us of the truth or falsehood, justice or injustice, of these complaints, have heretofore been doggedly and repeatedly refused. "The party" were content with the mere affirmation by the President to the crowd of their innocence and purity, when he knew no more about their guilt than he knew of the facts of a certain event in this Capitol last winter, of which you and I, Mr. Chairman, knew all, and more than we wanted to know; about which, if the Tennessee papers are to be believed, the President has given another certificate, though he was more than a mile off, and there were at least seven fathoms of bricks and mortar and stone between him and the place of the occurrence. They have made him a witness in both cases, where it was impossible for him to be a witness; and in giving his testimony he has been compelled to resort to his "imagination for his facts." I cared nothing for the certificates of the President, so long as they abided in the ephemeral form of heated partisan declarations along the public roads, or so long as they were read from the stump merely, a thousand miles off. But, sir, this "certificate in chief" is no longer a mere tavern ipse dixit on the highway, but it is to be filed in the archives of this Government, as a part and parcel of the "last annual Message" of the Greatest and Best! Perennis and Cleander have certified to their own good behavior, innocence, and purity, have incorporated their certificate in the "last annual Message," and have affixed to it the official sign manual of Andrew Jackson!

Is this certificate true? I put it to gentlemen if it be not true, whether injustice has not been done to Andrew Jackson, to those who have uttered just complaints, and to the public service, by this audacious forged self-acquittal?

Is it true or false, that the various executive departments have been conducted with ability and integrity, and that they are in a prosperous condition? That is the issue. How is it to be tried? Will gentlemen tell me that the President has tried the issue already, and that they are content with his certificate in form? Sir, I begin this session as I ended the last session, by asking the opportunity and power, and by claiming the right of an investigation by a committee, an efficient, able, and fair committee, with full powers to eviscerate the truth. The truth is all I desire. I make no accusations, no complaints, except of the denial of investigation.

If all have been conducted with ability and integrity, the departments have nothing to fear, and investigation may do great good. If it does not find and expose past fraud and corruption, it may prevent much evil hereafter, by the fear of scrutiny. I do sincerely, from the best of motives, earnestly desire to see the doors of the Treasury Department, of the Land offices, of the Indian bureau, and of other departments and offices, thrown open to full and fair investigation. We then can have the facts, of which to judge for ourselves, and on which to make up our own verdict. It is the duty of the grand inquest to find or ignore a bill for itself, and of the venire to try the issue and find a verdict for itself. No judge, much more no party, shall find a bill, true or false, or render a verdict for them. Cleanse the Augean stables, say I; and I say more. The Numidian king, when he was carried a captive to Rome, and saw the corruptions of her citizens, returned from the city with contempt, and said, "Give me wealth, and I will buy up the whole republic." Fanny Wright, I believe, uttered a truth, that whenever you see two men talking together, there are ten chances to one they are talking on one of three subjects—"trade, politics, or religion." The three subjects have, since she wrote the remark, entirely amalgamated into two. Trade and politics have now become one. Some of the priests, I am told, are offering to join the union, and mammon is the god of this day's worship. Trade, sir, trade swallows up every thing!

Tell me not this is the short session. Investigation was refused last winter, when the session was long. I know, sir, that this is an inauspicious period, perhaps, to expect gentlemen to look back at the past, or to pause a moment on the present. I know that every eye is turned, and every mind of gentlemen is bent towards the future. "Coming events, which cast their shadows before," are much more dazzling to their hopes and fancies than painful truths of the past or the present are to their memories or their wills. They know, sir, that some of the swarm of "conservatives" which are now fat and full of the blood of the Treasury, must be driven off for some of the lank and hungry "locofoco" flies, who are voraciously eager to light upon this poor body politic of ours. All things may not become new, but there must be some changes; and for every change there will be a chance for some impatient expectant. I know that General Jackson has been made to say, in this "last annual Message," "He that cometh after me is mightier than I;" but he has not been made to add—"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor." Sir, lest he may not purge his floor, I wish it to be swept clean for him before he comes in, so that Jackson may not be blamed after he is gone.

Certain it is I cannot anticipate; time must develop the course and the policy of the coming administration. And let no one accuse me of commencing an attack upon it in advance. No, sir; so far from it, though I hold Mr. Van Buren responsible for most mischief that has been done, and most that is now doing; though he has been the caucus candidate for the presidency, and was the nominated successor; though he is elected by executive patronage, corruption, and dictation; though he succeeds at the expense of the elective franchise; though he is a minority President, and has promised to follow generally in the footsteps of this kitchen-cabinet administration: yet, if he bravely dares to falsify that promise, "more honored in the breach than in the observance," if he will kick away the base ladders by which he has climbed to the height of his ambition, if he will now leave Falstaff where he found him, and array around him the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the country, and base his administration on a sound, elevated, and enlightened policy, free from corruption, and purely patriotic, uncontaminated by party, I will pledge my humble support to his measures, though I never can support the man, or pardon the past examples he has set. And why cannot I support the man whilst I approve his measures? For the very reason that he has not "entered in at the straight gate." I shall always eschew the example which has been set in 1836, as I did that of 1825, in the election of President of these United States. The one example has been rebuked with a vengeance—the other will not be forgiven by me.

Sir, in this contest, one great battle only has been fought between power and the people. The result is known. The conflict was not decisive, and must, as long as there is an honest heart to hope for freedom—shall go on until constitutional liberty, law, the independence of the people and their representatives, honesty, truth, and justice, are triumphant, or all are fettered in a despot's chains! Defeated, but not conquered; checked by the pratorian bands of patronage, but not arrested in their onward march, the patriot army is not discouraged or dismayed; smitten, but not struck down; the flag of the country is still flying! Defeat may drive some, the craven or the cormorant of spoils, from the standard of the true and the brave; but to the firm and proud spirits of the patriot band I would say, "Who shall separate us from the love of country?" Shall defeat? Another such defeat will be a glorious victory! In this "we are more than conquerors," for I am persuaded that neither office, nor bribe, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of our country, its laws, and its liberties! God only knows in whose name this victory shall be achieved: it matters not; but this I know, be he who he may, his cause will be consecrated by the toils, the prayers, the sacrifices, and the hopes, of the unsubdued and unfrightened freeman. No, sir; let no man despair of the republic. The fight is not yet ended. The people are not yet vanquished. Their hosts are withdrawn only for the moment, to recruit their forces and to repair their broken weapons. The weapons of our warfare are the weapons of truth. It shall be my duty to assist in pointing anew its spears and its lances.

The question on the resolution was then taken without further debate, and carried—ayes 86, noes 78.

So the resolution was adopted.

THURSDAY, December 15.

The President's Message.

The House resumed the consideration of the fifteenth of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the whole House on the 13th instant, on the President's Message:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of times as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, went into an argument in opposition to the resolution. The resolution, he said, was predicated on a clause in the President's Message which was not usual, and perhaps its was gratuitous on the part of the President. The question was, whether it was necessary, because the President, in his last annual Message, with an overflow of feeling towards the heads of the executive departments—as he believed him to have the kindest feelings toward all men living—had thought proper to compliment them, it was necessary to have an investigating committee to ascertain whether he spoke the truth. Although it was not the usual course, still the President had a precedent. Many years ago, Mr. Monroe stepped out of the usual course to compliment the then head of the War Department, (Mr. CALHOUN.) But because he did this, no committee was raised to ascertain whether or not the compliment was deserved. He was opposed to the resolution, because the direct object of it was to ascertain whether the President spoke the truth or not. He then went on to show that all the subjects contemplated to be investigated by this proposed select committee, were provided for by the House in the appointment of the standing committees. Among these committees was that of Ways and Means; and it was the duty of that committee to take into consideration and report upon all "such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as might be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue and of the expenditures, and to report from time to time their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers." That committee was required to do all that any select committee, however raised, could do. Besides this, there were other committees, whose duty it was to examine into the condition of the departments, and the expenditures thereof. Every gentleman must recollect that, at the last session of Congress, a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. SHEPPERD,) chairman of one of these committees, investigated the affairs of some of these departments, made a report, and the report was acted on by the House; and could not that heretofore done be again done? He submitted to the House, then, to say whether this resolution was not gratuitous, uncalled for, and had nothing to justify it, except the paragraph alluded to in the President's Message. Another objection he had to it was, that gentlemen said it was not intended to be raised, out of any hostile feeling to the President of the United States. Well, what were the Secretary of State, Treasury, War, Navy, &c.? They were the mere mouth-pieces of the President; men selected to do what he could not do himself. Mr. P. read the law relating to the Department of State, showing its duties, and showing that the head of that Department was created to do for the President, under the law, that which the President could not do in person. How, then, could gentlemen say that the President was not implicated, when the acts of his ministers were nothing more nor less than his acts? Let gentlemen take the bull by the horns. If they had any allegations to make against the President, let them do so in form. While passing on the acts of his principal public officers, they necessarily passed on the acts of the President himself. He then proceeded to show that the laws of the land threw around individuals certain guards; they were not to be arraigned without notice, &c. But how were the heads of these departments to be heard and tried under the resolution? They were to have no hearing and no trial, and were to be disfranchised and divested of their rights, upon the mere rumors of newspapers and gossip of old women. There never was a committee raised upon mere suggestion and gossip, without something like a charge or an allegation. Then let the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) or any other gentleman, make out a charge against the President, and he might have as large a committee, and have it clothed with what powers he pleased; but until this course should be adopted, he was, and should be, opposed to the adoption of the resolution. Who could tell what powers this committee might assume? It might require the departments to submit to it all matters connected with removal, or it might assume any authority it pleased. The resolution claimed a greater scope for the committee than was ever granted to a committee of that House, or any other legislative tribunal. When were its powers to cease? Who could tell this? From the form of the resolution, never; because they were to take cognizance of all matters, from all quarters of the Union; from every town, village, city, and hamlet; all causes of complaint, from responsible and irresponsible sources; of all the ten thousand charges which an old lady, who had charge of a paper in this city, had made, and the ten thousand more which she probably would make.

But, sir, said Mr. P., this was to be somewhat an ex parte proceeding. Suppose the heads of some of these departments shall have done some commendable acts. The committee will not be bound or required to look into it. No, sir, their object will be to arraign them and bring them to trial, and inflict punishment upon them. Perhaps the committee might wish to inquire into the causes which take some of the heads of the departments home to their native States, to ascertain whether they want to operate on the politics of such States. Well, sir, the Secretary of State went home during the last summer; and if his object was to operate on the politics of Georgia, he met with but poor success. The Secretary of the Navy also went home; but his going, if he did go for political effect, only added to the strength of the party opposed to him. If the results in those States were the consequence of their visits, it would have been much better they had not gone. But suppose as the President has said, that all of the heads of these departments shall have faithfully done their duty, we shall have no report from this committee on the subject. It was to be a fault-finding committee; their object was to condemn, and not to compliment, the President or his ministers. If there was want of fidelity in the departments, you would have no report from this committee. Although the Secretary of the Treasury may have his Department in such a condition that any thing which is brought against it, either from ghost or goblin damned, could not effect it; although the Postmaster General may have produced order out of chaos, and although the Secretary of War may have discharged with the greatest ability two offices, not a word will be said in their favor by this committee: their object, ex vi termini, will be to undo what the President has done; or, failing in that, they will do nothing. Committees of that House were raised for special causes, for causes shown. What were the causes shown why this committee should be raised? What were the specifications? Then, unless they were to innovate on the rules of the House, they could not adopt this resolution in its present form. Let a resolution be introduced in due form, and he imagined no friend of the Executive on that floor would shrink from an investigation. Let the charges be made against the Executive and his ministers, jointly and severally, and he thought he could safely say none would shrink from the investigation. It was not his business to go into Roman history, from the age of Augustus to that of Tiberius, for the purpose of finding out examples of men who had waded through blood to power; and if he did so, it was only for instruction, and to make him the more happy that he lived in a country where none of those scenes were enacted.

Many men, Mr. P. said, changed their minds and opinions of men, and got to disapprove the course of those they used to admire.

[Mr. Wise said, if the gentleman alluded to him, he must inform him that he never was in the situation of the gentleman from Rhode Island in his life.]

Mr. PEARCE proceeded. The character of a nation depended very much on the character of the individuals at the head of the Government. No nation was rendered more valuable by its resources than by the character and the reputation of the individual who presided over it. Why did Virginia hold herself so high? It might be somewhat on account of her soil, climate, and resources, but more because of her Washington, her Henrys, her Jeffersons, and her Madisons. Their characters not only gave character to Virginia, but to all the States. Why was he (Mr. P.) proud of the little State he had the honor, in part, to represent. He, to be sure, might be proud of her great resources; but more proud, because it was the land of Greene and Perry. Seven cities contended for the honor of giving birth to Homer; and tyrannical as Napoleon might have been, his name was revered by most of the French nation. What would England, the fast-anchored isle of the ocean, have been, if it were not for her poets, her philosophers, and her statesmen?

Mr. P. concluded by repeating that he could not vote for the resolution in its present form; and at the same time said he would not shrink from the responsibility of an investigation, if a proper committee was raised. He submitted to the House the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That so much of the President's Message as is in the following words, to wit: 'Before concluding this paper, I think it is due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to inquire into any specific causes of complaint which may be alleged against the integrity of the administration of any of the departments or their bureaus, or the vigilance and fidelity with which their duties have been discharged; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. PEYTON said: I was, at first, somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) should be found in opposition to this investigation. That gentleman was once the zealous advocate of rigid scrutiny into all abuses committed by public functionaries. In an elaborate speech upon this floor, he once sustained an investigation similar to the one now proposed by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise.) I allude to the case of the Wiscasset collector. But, sir, the gentleman announces the fact that he has changed. He was then opposed to General Jackson—violently and bitterly opposed to him—and he manifested that opposition in every conceivable way, and upon every subject that arose. But having now become a Jackson man, he has undergone, it seems, a complete political transformation. And what a change! his old principles discarded, his mental vision in total and disastrous eclipse, he has closed his eyes upon fraud, and speculation, and plunder!

But, sir, has it come to this, that the gentleman from Rhode Island is put forward as the champion of Andrew Jackson? Has that distinguished citizen already sunk so low that his fame and reputation are committed to the keeping of such hands. Oh, spectacle, mortifying and humiliating, to the honest friends and original supporters of Andrew Jackson! those who fought with him, and voted for him! who advocated his first election upon principle! and who, unlike the gentleman, yet stand up the dauntless advocates of the same principles. What must they think, how must they feel, when they are informed that the President's reputation as a statesman has fallen into the custody of that gentleman, who, formerly a violent, loathed, and detested assailant, has thrown himself into the current of the President's popularity, strong enough to bear even him along, and is now become his pretended fulsome eulogist and defender?

But, sir, to the gentleman's objections, or rather his pretended objections, to the proposed inquiry. He has given a striking specimen of the cunning and tact of the sect to which he belongs, by the issue which he has made up—a false, hypocritical issue. What is it? Why, forsooth, that it involves the President's veracity!—that it will be, does the President speak the truth when he says that all the officers are "honest" as well as capable? and that he, good, tender-hearted man, cannot endure to hear any thing which infringes, in the slightest degree, upon the veracity of that high functionary. Under this false and fraudulent issue, the gentleman takes shelter, and expects to escape all inquiry, all investigation. Is argument required to expose a position so monstrous? Will not every high-minded man in the nation look upon it with scorn and indignation? Sir, I deny and denounce this as that false issue which has so long been the shield of the party, and behind which they always skulk at the slightest approach of danger. The President says they are honest, and the gentleman says you are not to prove them rogues, because that would be to make out the President a liar. What a position!

Did the President write the paragraph in his Message, laudatory of these officers, which the gentleman himself admits is unusual in such a document, and which, I am sure, has no precedent or parallel? No, sir, not one word of it; and he does not know at this moment, that it is there? What is it, sir, which these gentlemen, so able and so honest, have introduced into the Message, and now claim that it is evidence of so high and sacred a nature that it cannot be examined or impeached? Here it is:

"Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

Did Andrew Jackson write this sweeping certificate of moral character for these gentlemen? No, sir, no. I plead non est factum. It is not his deed. They have fraudulently smuggled it into his Message, to evade scrutiny into their conduct. Instead of stifling inquiry, it is of itself a cause of suspicion. I say, sir, that the President did not write it; in support of which averment, I have evidence satisfactory, at least to my own mind, and such as should be made known to this House, to the country at large, and to posterity. It should thus be made known, in order to shield the name and fame of the President from that imputation which, in all time to come, would attach to them, in consequence of this flagrant abuse of the confidence reposed by him in others. The committee on the part of the Senate, which, according to usage, was appointed to wait upon the President at the commencement of the session, and inform him of the readiness of Congress to receive the very Message in question, found him extended on a sick couch, scarcely able to raise his hand. On the eve of their departure he urged the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) to come back soon, and talk with him; that he was lonesome, wanted company, and wished to have his friends about him. The Senator (alas! that it should be necessary for him to invoke the attendance of friends, and of such friends!) did return and remained with the President more than an hour, during which time he never alluded to the subject of politics. He spoke of dying, of the Hermitage, of his hope that he might be spared till he could reach it in the spring. His thoughts were with his heart, "and that was far away," dwelling upon other and doubtless holier meditations than writing eulogies upon public functionaries, whose conduct he was in no situation to examine, and who, if they were honest, needed not his testimony to the fact.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island has another objection to the mode of proceeding proposed by my friend from Virginia. He says that it is unnecessary, because, by the standing rules of the House, the investigation into all such matters is enjoined, as a duty, upon the Committee of Ways and Means. The rule alluded to by the gentleman reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House, &c.; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements, as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and to the accountability of their officers." And yet the gentleman, in a subsequent part of his argument, contended that the exercise, by the House, of such a power as is hereby enjoined upon one of its standing committees, would be a disfranchisement of the heads of departments! An ex parte trial and conviction, according to the rules of the common law! The rule referred to by the gentleman shows the sense entertained by the House in relation to the necessity of such investigations as the one proposed into the state and condition of the several departments, with a view to the rigid accountability of public officers, and the legal disbursement of the public moneys.

But, sir, is the Committee of Ways and Means the appropriate committee to make such examinations? Look at the past. How long have complaints of malversation in office been ringing in the ears of gentlemen? Look at the formation of that committee. Its chairman (Mr. CAMBRELENG) labors under a political, if not a legal, disability to institute and conduct them with efficiency. Dare he move in such a cause? No, sir; he would seal his fate forever. But if that committee were forced by the House into the investigation, with what hope of success could we rely upon it! The head of each department would hand over to the chairman of that committee such a statement as he might choose to send here.

Why, sir, it would be like the trial of Reuben M. Whitney. Reuben has been tried, and, as you will be glad to hear, acquitted, since the last session. But how tried? Not by a committee of this House? No sir; he was tried on the other side of the Alleghanies, while the witnesses and the prosecutor were a thousand miles off. He was tried at Jonesborough, Tennessee, before the President of the United States; the prosecutor not my friend from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) but one John Kennedy, who prosecuted Reuben so handsomely, that he has since been rewarded by an appointment. Reuben was arraigned before the President in a large crowd; the charges against him so drawn up that they could all be answered in his favor, without touching the true issues which involved his guilt or innocence. They, in effect, asked the President—is Reuben a saint, or is he a sinner? “He is a persecuted patriot, sir; persecuted on account of his opposition to the United States Bank.” “There!” said they, “do you hear that?” and the shout, hurra for Reuben, was loud and long. But, sir, the gentleman chose to wander from the subject before the House, and carry this political war into Tennessee. This is contrary to the policy of his State during the late war with Great Britain. She then had a higher regard for State lines and State sovereignty; her patriotism was only commensurate with her small limits.

The President's Message—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

He represents the President as going to the Hermitage on private business, and seems to justify all which his party attempted to achieve by the President's visit to Tennessee. A private visit to the Hermitage! They scarcely gave him time to shake hands with the old family servants at the Hermitage. He was hurried from place to place, dragged along through dust and heat to public meetings, at towns, and villages, and cross-roads, and country stores; carried through Tennessee and Alabama; brought back and taken through Kentucky, by the way of Cincinnati, to Washington. The friends of Mr. Van Buren resorted to every art to excite and induce him to take an active part in the election; and they now talk of a private visit to the Hermitage! Sir, I was told this morning, as I entered the Capitol, that some one of the members from Tennessee denied certain facts which every one there knows to be true. I hope, sir, that no such denial has been made. But, if it has, I stand ready to meet the gentleman, and maintain the truth of those facts anywhere. The President assailed me for the course which he said I had pursued in relation to the bill which contained the appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty before he left the city, which complaint he frequently repeated on his way to the Hermitage. At Knoxville, a gentleman produced the Globe newspaper, which showed that I had voted and spoken in support of that measure. But it had no effect, for he continued to speak of it as he had done before. At Sparta, he denounced my friend from Virginia (Mr. Wise) as a liar. At the house of Mrs. Saunders, in Sumner county, Tennessee, he stated that my colleague (Mr. BELL) “told twenty lies in one speech, and knew them to be lies at the time;” and that Peyton was a greater liar than Bell. In passing through the district of my colleague, (Mr. FORESTER,) his very able speech at the last session of Congress having been mentioned, the President stated that “any man could get as good a speech as that written at Washington for five dollars.” When asked how Mr. Huntsman was, in relation to political parties, “He is on the fence,” said the General, “and no one knows which side he will fall.”

The constituents of another one of my colleagues inquired, “Well, General, what do you think of our representative, Mr. Shields?” “Oh!” said he, “he is of no account, sir, no account; turn him out, and send some one in his place who is of some account.” I have repeated these things, sir, not on account of any pleasure they afford me, but because those very gentlemen who were the cause of these exhibitions are now denying them. Let any man deny this statement who dare.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island calls upon us to take “the bull by the horns;” “to move an impeachment against the President at once;” says that “he is accountable for the acts of his ministers, and any attack upon them is in effect an impeachment of him.” This is strange doctrine to me, sir. We wish to rope these calves, and drag them, bleating as they go, from the Treasury, for they have been sucking too long already; and the gentleman says no, “take the bull by the horns.” Move an impeachment against the President, indeed! He accountable, criminally accountable, for the want of integrity on the part of his ministers! Was there ever any thing more impudent than this? Because General Jackson is a patriot, does it follow that Reuben M. Whitney is any thing but what the world knows him to be? Because General Jackson is an honest man, does it follow that Amos Kendall, and all the other “hirelings,” as he calls them, are honest too? This, sir, is the doctrine of the party—the doctrine of men into whose hands the government of the country has fallen. But, sir, the gentleman, in thus shuffling himself under the protecting mantle of the President, but displays the usual tact of the party to which he belongs. They are all patriots, if the President be a patriot. They are all honest men, if the President be an honest man. Sir, let me put a case in common life to illustrate this doctrine; one which every farmer will understand. Take any man of seventy years of age, put him on a farm with sixty hands to control, give him a full crop—corn, tobacco, and small grain—can he manage them so that no part of the crop will suffer? Suppose his foremen are faithless and roguish, that they are detected marauding the country of nights, taken with their pigs and turkeys, their chickens and potatoes, upon them, could they plead the virtues of their master as a justification of their crimes? Could you not lynch them without meaning to inflict blows upon the good old man whose confidence they had abused? There is no man amongst them who can stand one moment upon his own merits. No, sir; they have crowded and huddled together under the mantle of General Jackson, until that is not broad enough to cover them; they have worn it threadbare, stretched and torn it into tatters. You may occasionally get a glimpse of Van's bald pate popped out here, Amos's sharp face there, Felix's red eyes yonder, Blair's shank at one place, and Reuben's pockets filled with Treasury receipts at another; and now, sir, we have the gentleman from Rhode Island squealing around like an odd pig, for whom there is no teat, hunting a place to crawl in at. Now, sir, what I wish is, to strip the Jackson mantle off these gentlemen, and let them stand up for themselves. Every one knows that no gentleman upon this floor has any motive, any wish, to make an issue with General Jackson; that he cannot be the object of this resolution. His course is run, his day is past, his power is in other hands; and we wish to hold those gentlemen accountable for the manner in which they exercise it. There has been no investigation into the departments, which we propose to examine, for the last eight years. We wish to see a settlement of their accounts at the bar of the public, and the balance fairly struck between them and the people. They may be honest, very honest; if so, it is due to themselves that they show it. It may be otherwise; and, in that event, it is due to the country that we should have a committee of the House to show that. How is it proposed that they shall come to trial? Upon the certificate contained in the Message, and upon that alone. The gentleman himself admits that these sweeping certificates are unusual. I detest the whole system of certifying, which pervades every department of the Government, and can be traced from Reuben M. Whitney up, (I believe you cannot go from Reuben down.) Yes, sir, a coward, who shrinks and runs from an adversary whom he has injured, will get a certificate of his courage to use upon the stump; a traitor will get a certificate of patriotism; a rogue of his honesty; and a perjured witness of his veracity; and if you attempt to fix upon either of these his true character, he will ensconce himself behind his certificate. We ask permission to go into the various departments, and see what their true condition is.

But, says the gentleman, that is equivalent to an impeachment of the President, for here is his statement that all is well; "that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter;" and the argument is, that if you find just cause of complaint, it will show that what the President has said is not true; and, therefore, if you do not mean to attack the President, there must be no examination whatever. We hold those officers, whose conduct we propose to examine, to be trustees; and we have reason to believe that they have abused their trust, and abused the confidence of the President, and demand that they shall give an account of their own conduct to the representatives of the people, and are met at once, and told that you are putting the President upon his trial; it is an impeachment against him; make out your specifications and summon him to the bar of the Senate. All we ask, sir, is, that the representatives of the American people shall send a committee and examine the archives, records, and papers of their own Government, in any and all of its departments, and make their report of the facts to this House. We propose no criminal prosecution against any one, but an investigation into the condition of the departments, and the honesty and fidelity of the public agents; and this the gentleman calls disfranchisement under the common law. He was eloquent and extravagant in his eulogiums upon the heads of these departments; he spouted their praises in poetry, and I suppose he means they shall live in song and story. He says the Secretary of the Treasury has not slept upon his arms. No, sir, he has not slept; and the party should feel under the highest obligations to him, for he has so contrived as to make the Treasury and the public lands a powerful auxiliary to Mr. Van Buren in the late election. By the celebrated Treasury order, which he issued, requiring specie in payment for the public lands, with an exception in favor of citizens of the States in which those lands are situated, he in effect offered a bribe of one hundred dollars a head for votes in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and Michigan, which was then looked upon as a State. For, sir, at the sale of public lands in Mississippi last fall, specie was worth at one time twenty per cent.; and, while the citizens of Tennessee, then considered in rebellion against Mr. Van Buren, were required to pay this enormous tax, the citizens of Mississippi, a doubtful State in the election, were exempt from it. At Government price, three hundred and twenty acres of land would cost the Mississippian four hundred dollars, while the Tennessean, for the same quantity, was compelled to pay the sum of five hundred dollars, from the necessity he was placed under, by this order, of raising specie. And, sir, this was not confined to the poor and needy, but extended to the nabob, with his hundreds of hands and thousands of bales, while the specie was exacted from the most indigent and meritorious Tennessean. This, sir, is what I call high-handed oppression on the one side, and wholesale bribery and corruption on the other. Philip of Macedon never made a more unblushing use of money to corrupt and enslave the people of Greece. This Secretary must be entitled to the praise, and something more substantial still, to a portion of the spoils of the party. The gentleman alluded, also, to the visit of the Secretary of State (Mr. Forsyth) to Georgia, which he calls unfortunate; true, his visit was unfortunate; and of the visit of the Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Dickerson) to New Jersey, which was also unfortunate. He seems unwilling to give them any credit for well-meant exertions, and "wishes to God they had stayed at home." This appears rather ungrateful, as they used their best exertions in the cause. It is true the gentleman attempts to conceal the fact; but it is notorious that the Secretary of State went to Georgia, and used every effort to rally his shattered forces; that he was openly electioneering for Mr. Van Buren. Amos, too, if I was correctly informed, made an excursion, for a like purpose, into New England. I am sure that I saw it stated that he had his face lithographed, and copies sent through the country, so that those who could not see "the divine original, might at least gaze on love's counterfeit."

But, sir, the gentleman assumes another ground in defence of these "ministers," as he calls them. He says the appointment of this committee would amount to a disfranchisement of those officers whose conduct it is proposed to scrutinize, by denying to them a trial according to the strict rules of the criminal law. This principle holds only where a man is on trial for crime. All laws are to be liberally expounded, so as to detect fraud, but strictly construed when you come to punish a criminal. The gentleman goes too fast; he leaps to the conclusion, leaving us at the beginning of this matter; while we are commencing the development of fraud and corruption, which the law abhors, he anticipates the awful result which may be brought about, and is appealing to your sympathy on behalf of the culprit. Now, if he will be patient, we will go on with him, and in due season we will lean to the side of mercy, and acquit wherever there is reasonable doubt. This is strange doctrine to come from that side of the House. These officers are the trustees of the people, and accountable to the people. They have been long in office, and are about entering upon a new lease; and now, when called upon to make an exhibition of their fidelity and ability, their friends upon this floor raise the cry of disfranchisement and summary punishment. I deny and utterly repudiate this doctrine. Sir, in private life, no one denies the right of a principal to look into the conduct of his agent. What would that principal think of an agent who would shut his books and say, I claim protection under the criminal code; you cannot examine these books, lest it may lead to a prosecution against me? What honest man would not say at once he was guilty? What judge would sustain the objection for an instant? Take the case of a guardian: a motion is made in court, a committee is appointed, and he is brought forthwith to a settlement; could he object, on the ground that the examination of his accounts might develop crime, and lead to punishment? And, sir, have not the American people the same power over these keepers of their treasure, and guardians of their constitution, laws, and liberties, which a court of justice can exercise over the guardian of an estate and the children who own it? Sir, because investigation may lead to such a discovery, it does not preclude investigation altogether. The gentleman's fancy seems to be haunted by the idea of criminal prosecutions and penitentiary punishments. Well, sir, his fancies may be realized; he may know something calculated to excite his alarm; it may lead to that, and I would not be surprised if, in some instances, it did; but we move no impeachment, no indictment, no presentment, at this time. We merely ask that this House, as the great inquest of the nation, shall inquire into the state of the departments; and upon a report of facts, by a committee, it will then be able to determine what steps are proper to be taken. If crime is developed in any quarter, then it will be the proper time to bring offenders to trial, and they shall have all the benefits of the strict rules of common law, and criminal law, and the benefit of clergy likewise. Sir, there is something "rotten in Denmark," or we would not have this resolute and continued opposition to all investigation, which is calculated to show mismanagement on the part of agents and officers of Government. At the adjournment of the last session of Congress there were pending motions and resolutions calculated to effect objects similar to those contemplated by this resolution, and they were all smothered by the party to which the gentleman belongs, and, I believe, with his assistance. The gentleman dreads a select committee, while he is willing to go to trial upon the certificate of the President, and seems to have full confidence in the result, if the matter be intrusted to the Committee of Ways and Means. Yet, sir, he is alarmed at the idea of a select committee, and says it will be a "fault-finding, censorious committee." Have the gentleman and his friends any thing to dread in the appointment of this committee? Is the Speaker subject to the suspicion of doing injustice to any of the party in the appointment of committees? Sir, is it not a matter of absolute certainty that a majority of this committee, if appointed, will be composed of the friends of these officers? Cannot those gentlemen meet their own friends without fear and trembling? Is there not virtue and talent in this House sufficient to guaranty protection to the innocent, as well as to insure the detection and exposure of the guilty? Are gentlemen willing that it shall be understood, and go abroad to the country, that they cannot face such a committee, composed of gentlemen of the highest honor and purest principle, even though they are their own friends? And these, too, are the men in whose hands the Government of the country is placed, and who claim to be above suspicion, beyond the power of this House, fortified in upon all sides by the ramparts of the President's certificate.

There is one other position assumed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, which is quite original, and merits particular attention; it is this, sir: that the direction given at the last session to the bill commonly called the executive patronage bill, is conclusive as to the views of this House upon the subject of executive patronage. And he seems to draw an inference that the House then gave its sanction to all that had been or would be done in the way of executive patronage, in all its departments. What are the facts in relation to that case? A gentleman from New York, (Mr. MANN,) on the 25th February, 1836, moved "that said bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary." My colleague (Mr. BELL) moved "it should be referred to a select committee;" and, pending these motions, a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. DROMGOOLE) moved "that the executive patronage bill be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union," which motion took precedence of the others, and prevailed, and there the bill has slept ever since. The question of executive patronage was not taken up for consideration afterwards; and now the gentleman contends that the House having failed to act upon the subject, it was therefore against the bill, and in favor of executive patronage, to the fullest extent. Sir, during the last summer, in Tennessee, I endeavored to inculcate this doctrine, so far as to hold a majority of this House accountable for its failing to act upon this as well as some other important questions; but this doctrine was controverted by you and your friends. How would it hold upon another great question—the question of amending the Constitution of the United States so as to secure the election of President and Vice President to the people, at all events and under all circumstances? For the last two sessions of Congress this has been a leading question, and afforded a fair opportunity for the party to show their zeal in carrying out the measures of General Jackson. I, and the friends with whom I act, have ever been in favor of that measure. At the session before the last, soon after it was known that Judge White was a candidate for the presidency, and while we were urging the House to take up the resolutions upon that subject, the present Speaker (Mr. JAMES K. POLK) made a speech, in which, after professing a willingness to go for the measure, objected to acting upon the subject then, alleging a want of time, and also some imperfection in the resolutions. I followed in a few remarks, in which I urged the importance of speedy action on the subject, and reminded the Speaker of his former course in relation to the matter; and, though he spoke against us, he voted with us to take up the resolutions. His friends, however, took their cue, and followed his precept instead of his example, and the resolutions were postponed. At the last session of Congress the same subject came up, with no better fate than before. It was with great difficulty we could get a report from the committee at all. They all professed to be in favor of the amendment. Oh! yes; but they seemed to agree to differ as to the mode of effecting it; and, at last, when the report came in, it took the same direction with the executive patronage bill, or something like it. We could not bring the gentlemen to a vote on either. And is it to be understood, now the election is over, (I know that it would not have been admitted before,) that all those who voted to give those important measures the go-by are to be set down as voting against them? If so, how do the party stand upon the great leading measures of General Jackson's administration? If we call upon gentlemen to walk in the footsteps of the President upon that oft-repeated but never heeded recommendation in regard to the election of President and Vice President, are we to be told that the House has already decided that question against the President's recommendations, by refusing to vote on the question? Are we to be told, if we propose to limit executive patronage, that the House has already decided that question in the same manner, and has sanctioned the full extent to which executive measures have been recently carried? And, sir, what is that extent? It is sufficient, if not checked, and grows into a settled precedent, to rivet chains upon us and our children forever. Such a precedent will authorize a President to make the nomination of his successor a cabinet measure, issue his proclamation calling a convention to confirm that nomination, and denounce, in advance, all who dare oppose the nominees before or after the convention acts, as "assailing public virtue, and opposing the right of the people to govern." For, sir, this has been done in the late nomination of the "Government" candidates, as they are called in the English journals. Was that ticket so remarkable for its purity and virtue, that to oppose it was to assail the virtue of the people? Mr. Van Buren had promised to walk in the footsteps of General Jackson, and is, consequently, bound in due time to nominate his colleague (Colonel Johnson) for the presidency, order a convention to ratify his nomination, take the field, and secure his election by the use of all the ways and means in the power of the Executive. This, sir, is the extent to which executive patronage has already gone, and which the gentleman contends has beforehand been sanctioned by this House. This, sir, is what I deny. Whatever this House may be destined to do, it has not come to that yet.

Sir, I was not prepared for such doctrines, and I must say that I was not prepared for the opposition to the proposed investigation. I had hoped that gentlemen would have become ashamed of screening these officers, who, instead of running to General Jackson for certificates of moral character, should be the first to demand an investigation. But, sir, will the people of the United States be satisfied forever that they shall shrink from responsibility, hold up General Jackson's character as their shield, and thereby escape a scrutiny of their conduct? If they have acted honorably, we wish them to show it; if those suspicious, so common, so universal, are groundless, we wish the country to know it. Innocence never seeks for safety in flight, in concealment; but rather courts investigation and defies scrutiny. How can gentlemen reconcile innocence with this trembling and shrinking—this shielding themselves under the numerical strength of their friends in this House? This was their course at the last session of Congress. Remember, sir, what fatality attended every effort to obtain a committee of investigation then. Recollect the extraordinary and obstinate protection extended to that darling Treasury-pet, Reuben Whitney. Let it also be remembered that the Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously recommended an inquiry into the abuses of that bureau, which would have developed the causes of the late and present Indian wars in the South. That committee reported a resolution authorizing any two of its members to prosecute the inquiry by taking testimony for the information of the House at this session. But, sir, this resolution, reported by a committee a majority of whom were in favor of Mr. Van Buren, was rejected in the House. The citizens of Georgia and Alabama petitioned and implored the House to investigate that subject, alleging the most unheard-of frauds and abuses. Upon this application the vote stood: Ayes 77, noes 77—a tie; and the Speaker gave the casting vote against the investigation. Sir, men high in favor and high in office were suspected. The agent of the Government, John B. Hogan, gave the Department official information of the greatest outrages practised upon the Indians which were ever perpetrated upon any people, savage or civilized. He was very soon removed, or rather promoted, from Indian agent to be collector at the port of Mobile. And yet, sir, we have no account of prosecutions, convictions, and punishments, which have followed his disclosures. Why, sir, those speculators, or rather Indian robbers, would find an old chief upon his patrimonial estate, where the chiefs and kings of his race had lived for centuries before him, with his slaves and his farm around him, smoking his pipe amidst his own forest trees, spurning any offer to purchase his home; and they would bribe some vagabond Indian to personate him in a trade to sell his land, forging his name; and the first intimation that he would have of the transaction, would be his expulsion, by force, from his house! This was common; and not only so, but, under the pretext of reclaiming fugitive slaves, the wives and children (of mixed blood) of the Indians were seized and carried off in bondage. The famous Osceola himself had his wife taken from him, and that, too, it has been said, by a Government officer, and was chained by the same officer to a log. Sir, what else could be expected but that these scourged, plundered, starving savages would glut their vengeance by the indiscriminate slaughter of the innocent and helpless families of the frontier, whose blood has cried to us in vain? This has caused the Florida war, which has produced such a waste of treasure, the loss of so much national and individual honor, and of so many valuable lives! This has called the gallant volunteers from my own State, and from my own district, who have traversed a thousand miles to fight a battle of strangers; to contend with a savage foe, while drinking those stagnant waters, whose malaria is death, many of whom are left in the wild woods of Florida, where "the foe and the stranger will tread o'er their heads," while their fellow-soldiers are far away, happy at home with their friends and families. One—ah! sir, any one of those noble youths, who now sleep under a foreign sod, was worth more than the whole army of plunderers who have caused the mischief. And yet, sir, such men as these were shielded at the last session of Congress by the casting vote of the Speaker. And now, according to the argument of the gentleman from Rhode Island, the House has sanctioned all they did.

The President's Message—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

I think, sir, it is time for this course of things to cease. It is time for the people to know something of the conduct of those in whose hands the public business is intrusted, and who really administer the Government. They have been behind General Jackson long enough. I was present when Mr. Van Buren took his position there. It was a striking display of that paternal care which the President has extended over Mr. Van Buren. In the spring of 1834, the President, Mr. Van Buren, and a few other gentlemen, I amongst the number, rode out to the Washington course to witness a trial of speed, (an amusement of which I am very fond, and for which the President had not altogether lost his taste at that day.) It was a trial run between the celebrated Busiris and Emily. The horses were brought on the course; all was calm and quiet until the rider of Busiris mounted, when the old courser began to rear and plunge; this seemed to stir the mettle of Old Hickory; he reared upon his stirrups and took command: "Hold him," (said he to the boy,) "don't let him run against the fence." "You must break him of that, sir," (to the trainer,) "I could do it in an hour." Turning to me, he said: "Take your stand there," (pointing to a position on the side of the course;) "there is but one place from which a horse can be correctly timed." I took my station with lever in hand. "Now," said he, "come up, and give them a fair start." At this moment he discovered the Vice President, who had come up and taken his position near me; he exclaimed with great emphasis and earnestness of manner, as he flashed his eye from the excited animals to the Vice President, "Mr. Van Buren, get behind me; they will run over you, sir." It would have done you good to see how natural and easy it was for Van to slope off behind the old chief. And, sir, there he has been ever since. Old Hickory would not get out of the way for us to run over him; if he had given us a fair chance, on any stretch or turn during the whole race, we would have run over him or made him fly the track. But, sir, we have got him on the repeat; the General will be out of the way; he is no game-horse, and we will make a case of him on the repeat. I do not complain so much that the President has fallen in love with Mr.

Van Buren, but I claim the privilege of falling in love with whom I please; and this, sir, is the last privilege which will ever be surrendered by man, or woman either. But, sir, Mr. Van Buren is in love with the President, too; and he accidentally found it out. The manner of this discovery is somewhat curious. I do not know this to be true, but it was much talked of and universally believed in this city. Mr. Van Buren was in conversation with a lady, an intimate friend of the President, amiable, interesting, and remarkable for communicating to him whatever she thought would be agreeable for him to hear. Mr. Van Buren said to this lady "that he had been reading much, and thinking deeply, of late, upon the characters of great men, and had come to the conclusion that General Jackson was the greatest man that had ever lived in the tide of time; that he was the only man among them all who was without a fault." The fair friend of the President was delighted. "But," said he, "whatever you do, don't tell General Jackson what I have said. I would not have him to know it for the world." You see, sir, that he was afraid she might forget it, and therefore thought it safest to jog her memory. But, sir, he might have saved himself that trouble, for the excellent lady flew to the President, and told him all that had passed. "Ah! madam," said he, with tears in his eyes, "that man loves me; he tries to conceal it, but there is always some way fixed by which I can tell my friends from my enemies." Now, sir, Van was like the Frenchman, (though I want it distinctly understood that I differ with him about this, as well as about many other things.) A Frenchman began to write his deed thus: "Know one woman by these presents." "Why," said the other party, "do you not put it, know all men by these presents?" "Vell," said he, "is it it not de same ting? If vone woman know it, will not all de mens find it out?"

Mr. RIPLEY said: Had this been a proposition to inquire into the condition of the Department of State, of the Treasury, of the Navy and War Departments, and the General Post Office, with a view to investigate abuses, if they exist, no person would be more willing to join in the inquiry than myself. No individual would be more anxious to enforce the responsibility of subordinate officers. There are none who will go farther to ferret out any malpractices; and, if they really exist, to punish them with the high constitutional power of this House. Had the resolution for inquiry had these objects solely and honestly in view, I should have been the last to oppose it. But, sir, the President is constitutionally responsible for the whole of the executive department; the various radii of its powers concentrate as well its responsibilities as its honors upon him; and when I take these circumstances into view, and consider also the spirit in which this debate has been conducted, the position of the President cannot be observed without exciting our share of sympathy. Shall we, at a moment when his connection with the people of the United States is about to terminate forever, and all the aspirations of ambition are to be dissolved by age, infirmities, and sickness; when the consciousness of his high and devoted services, which we all know he must possess, and the enthusiastic affection of the American people, were about to cheer the evening of his life, and to gild his expiring lamp, is it right or proper for the representatives of the people, whom he has succored and saved, to cut off this departing solace, and to imbitter his last days, by adopting a resolution which, if adopted, will sanction an opinion of this House, that corruption and Andrew Jackson have been coupled together? Will they do this without some specific charge, without some definite allegation, sustained at least by the endorsement of one individual in the House, who will be willing to give his name to posterity as the author of the allegation. In the speech of the honorable member from Tennessee, marked with so much wit and pungency of satire, the allegations are made against Andrew Jackson, as the object who is to be convicted of the corruption which is so broadly insinuated in the resolution to exist in the executive department. I am not willing to exercise the high constitutional powers of this House, in the least degree, in sanctioning such an allegation.

General Jackson, after a life spent in the service of his country, is about retiring from the elevated position he holds as presiding executive officer of these States, at an advanced age, and worn down by the labors spent in that service. He is now, sir, on the bed of sickness, which may prove his bed of death. God grant that it may not, but that he may live many, many years amongst that people whose rights he has so bravely and honestly defended, and whose prosperity under his successful administration, has excited the astonishment of the whole civilized world.

What, sir, is the relation that Andrew Jackson bears to the representatives of the people of the United States? From the period of your revolutionary war to the present moment, he has been the lofty, indefatigable defender of his country. In war and in peace, on the battle field and in your councils, his exertions, his toils, and unceasing energy and integrity, have done as much as any other man, not excepting your Washington in the field, and your Jefferson and Madison in the cabinet, to elevate the character of this republic, to advance its prosperity, and to preserve its peace. His name has been a tower of strength, and under his administration the character of an American citizen, as was that formerly of a Roman citizen, is a passport throughout the world. Aye, sir, in foreign lands, wherever your star-spangled banner displays, from the high and giddy mast, the character of our republic, under the aegis of the lofty virtues of the President, has that wall of strength that feels ever conscious of the protection of a great and powerful nation. And would you, sir, would this House, after a life thus spent, and which impartial history is about to take charge of for the benefit of his country; would they at the eve of his long life, so worthily spent in all that is patriotic and virtuous in the public service; would they pursue him with insinuations that corruption, with its blighting mildew, had found entrance into the bosom of Jackson's more than Roman virtue? If this House institutes the inquiry, it sanctions the charge; and will they, without any specific allegations, just at the close of General Jackson's career, hold the fatal chalice to his lips, which should poison and imbitter with the stings of ingratitude the evening of his life? We have had no precedent to justify such a measure. Party spirit has raged and misrepresented all your Presidents during their term of office; but they have passed and are passing off the stage, all with the award of official and personal integrity. Some have not been re-elected by the people, but against them no charge of corruption is found imbedded in the annals of the country. Nor does any American citizen, at even this lapse of time, impeach their integrity; no one charges them with wilful or wanton corruption, while administering the affairs of the Commonwealth. The only allegations made against them, as they quit the scene of their labors, of their glories, and their services, were, that a distinguished member, formerly from Virginia, accused Mr. Jefferson of retiring with a political falsehood in his mouth; and an equally distinguished member from Massachusetts moved his solitary vote to impeach Mr. Madison. I have no doubt, sir, after the excitement of party was over, both of these gentlemen regretted these allegations. The charges never have and never will affect the great patriarch of liberty, the author of the declaration of independence, or his equally illustrious friend, the founder and champion of our constitution. The one unfurled to the world the principles of popular government; the other, more than any man, connected liberty with law—secured an equality of political rights, by securing to society the fruits of labor. Wherever oppressed man rises to resist the oppressor, the declaration drawn up by Thomas Jefferson is invoked. Wherever constitutional law is appealed to, to secure those rights, the political writings of James Madison form the pure fountains of living water which diffuse liberty and tranquillity amongst the nations. Together, locked hand in hand, they are working their silent way, and they have planted that school of political liberty, of which this republic may arrogate to itself, through their exertions, the being the founder.

Republics have been accused of being ungrateful. Aristides was ostracized for being called the Just, and Themistocles banished, after saving his country from desolation. The authors of these acts have not transmitted their names to posterity. How keen would be the reproaches of the history of the last two thousand years, how withering their infamy, if they had not escaped by this silence of history. General Jackson has been doomed to meet the same ingratitude, after preventing the dismemberment of our republic, after rescuing the fair and fertile fields of the State which I have the honor to represent. There, sir, helpless age and tender youth, and all the charms of refinement and beauty, were protected by his hand. There, sir, was effected one of those signal deliverances of a people which has already caused the plains of New Orleans to rank with Marathon and Platea, reflecting all its bright lustre upon the army of liberty that fought under him, and sending all its glowing light throughout the world, to elevate the character of this republic. Sir, almost at the moment this was effecting, and while painting, history, poetry, music, and sculpture, were giving greenness to his immortality, the Senate of the United States were denouncing him in the Seminole war. Sickening with the same feelings that were pained at hearing Aristides called the Just, the detractors of Andrew Jackson loathed the beau ideal of his character. Again, during the panic, that same body have impeached and condemned him, without a trial, for an alleged violation of the Constitution of the United States. How, sir, have the people met these charges? They have almost by acclamation elected him President on each occasion. They have rallied to defend him. Where, sir, are his accusers? I ask again, where are they? And, sir, permit me to predict that if the present resolution passes, it will only reflect disgrace upon the present House of Representatives. The people will come to the rescue, and expunge the resolution from this House, as I trust they are about expunging a former one from the Senate. The whole future history of the country will hold up in proud relief their old chief, sans peur and sans reproche, and the ingratitude of this House in pursuing him with the odious charge of corruption, even upon the bed of sickness and of death, when I do not believe there can be a member here who conscientiously believes that Andrew Jackson ever was, in thought, word, or deed, unfaithful or inimical to the interests of this country.

I regret that the honorable member from Tennessee should have been so excited by a warm election contest as to urge, upon such trivial grounds as he has alleged, so grave an inquiry into the corrupt conduct of the executive departments. The State of Tennessee has been reared under the fostering and paternal care of Andrew Jackson. He has done more than any other man to elevate and form its character. Intelligent, chivalric, patriotic, and virtuous, they will be the last portion of the people of the United States to sanction allegations, either personal or as the constitutional head of the Government, against their veteran chief. Those brave men who followed his banner through the Creek nation, and on the plains of New Orleans, with the citizen soldiers of Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana, are not to prove so recreant to Andrew Jackson, and so unfaithful to themselves, as to imbitter the remnant of his days with so unjust an accusation. And what are all the allegations that the honorable member adduces to justify the exercise of the high constitutional power of this House? That the President, in a conversation with a friend, had remarked that Mr. Bell, another member from Tennessee, had stated lies about him, and that "Peyton could tell twenty lies to Bell's one." Now, sir, what were the facts in the case? The honorable members from Tennessee at the last session had indulged in pretty severe censures upon the President's administration. In conversation with his neighbors, according to this statement, in naturally vindicating himself, he had pretty warmly recriminated. I think the language that he made use of, as is usual on such occasions, must have undergone, in the course of its gossip, some version before it reached the ears of the honorable member; for it is not the language of that delicate and manly bearing which all know mark the character of Andrew Jackson. At any rate, is a mere controversy in an election, where the President and the honorable members from Tennessee, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, supported different candidates, to be the basis of an inquisitorial examination, on the part of this House, into the conduct of the executive departments?

Again: the honorable member alleges that this House refused to institute an inquiry into frauds that were perpetrated upon the Indians of Alabama, by the citizens of that State, in the sales of their lands to individuals. When that resolution was introduced into the House, I had the honor of proposing an amendment to it, referring the subject to the President of the United States. The motive for this amendment was, that this House had no constitutional power to order the investigation by their authority; and, if it had been done, it would have been one of the most fatal precedents to the rights of the States. It was alleged that the Indians had been swindled out of their reserved lands, in many cases, by residents of Georgia and Alabama. Of course, if offences had been committed, as I know of no law of the United States providing for such cases, they were common law or statute law offences against those States, not cognizable by the United States tribunal. In a case where the State of Alabama secures a speedy trial by jury, and a cross-examination of witnesses, would any person arrogate to this House the power to send its committee to make an ex parte investigation, to hold up its citizens as malefactors, without being heard, without the privilege of counsel, and the cross-examining of witnesses? Suppose, sir, that, in obtaining the charter of a bank in a neighboring State, respectable citizens should be accused of fraud and bribery, an offence that is punishable by the common law of that State, does this House, sir, possess the power to trample upon State rights, and send its committee of inquisition into the halls of the State Legislature, to hunt up ex parte testimony as its basis, and to hunt down all that is respectable and venerable in the character of its citizens, to condemn them unheard, without grand juries or petit juries, and draw up a withering report, that would blast them as far as our language extended, before they had an opportunity of defending themselves? If this power had been exercised by the original resolutions of last session, like the Council of Ten at Venice, or the Holy Inquisition of Spain, it would have sung the requiem of public liberty, and broken down the whole penal jurisdiction of the independent States. And I feel peculiar personal consolation in being the means of arresting the progress of a measure so fraught with disastrous consequences. The subject was referred to the President, who was directed to investigate into the cases of fraud. From the character of the agent employed by the President, (General Hogan,) I feel confident, from my knowledge of the man, that the duty has been faithfully attended to; and if, as the honorable member suggests, he has received the collectorship of Mobile, it cannot have been conferred upon a more deserving or more intelligent citizen, or one who has more gallantly defended his country during the gloomiest period of the late war.*

The honorable member has also referred to the Secretary of the Treasury as being embraced in the general allegation of corruption. Sir, the lofty character of Levi Woodbury is too well known to this House and to this nation to require any comment from me. Born, reared, and educated, amidst the granite mountains of my native State, his stern and sterling virtues had already carried him to the highest honors of New Hampshire, when, in the midst of the panic battle, he was called to the arduous duties of the Treasury of the United States. New England may justly feel proud of the high character which he has reflected back upon his native land. And let me ask, what inducement to corruption can there be on the part of Levi Woodbury? There has been no specific charge against him; not a whisper of prejudice that he has done any thing to forfeit his exalted character. He is affluent in his personal situation, with every thing to make him happy in domestic life; and, above all, principles of the most stern and unbending integrity are interwoven with his nature. The only allegation insinuated against him is, that in the exercise of his duty, imposed by a law passed by this House, he is compelled to transact official business with the agent of the deposit banks. That agent is no officer of this Government; we have no constitutional power over him. He has been assailed by the severest epithets of party. He has been employed by the deposit banks, many of them in opposition to the administration, to attend to their business with the Treasury. For my own part, I do not learn any specific charges with which he is accused. And I have no doubt that the President, when he gave him the character which the honorable member states that he did at Jonesborough, came to the honest and conscientious conviction that such a torrent of anathemas from the opposition in this House, assailing the character of this man for more than four years, would have annihilated him, had not his reputation been founded upon the rock of integrity. High-sounding epithets and bold denunciations cannot, thank God, blast the character of any American citizen, unless they are accompanied with specific allegations and specific proofs. On the contrary, they raise in the generous minds of the American people that spirit of sympathy for unmerited persecution, which is sure to protect its intended victim, and roll back the current upon the author.

The President's Message—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

I feel, sir, that I should have but unworthily discharged my duty as a Representative of Louisiana, had I not raised my voice in opposition to this resolution. Whatever may be the personal or political predilections of my constituents, gratitude to Andrew Jackson for the inestimable benefits he has conferred upon the citizens of our State, is an almost pervading sentiment. It is, like the vestal flame, guarded with intense care, and faithfully transmitted from one generation to another. As the 8th of January revolves its annual rounds, so often does the hoary veteran who shared in the memorable campaign repair to the grass-grown hillock which marks the battle field, and recite the eventful story to his children. Often are time and space annihilated, and the years of his pilgrimage recalled to the desperate conflict; and in those rural fêtes, which none know better how to grace with refinement and beauty than the gallant Frank of our sunny clime, the revered name of Andrew Jackson is never forgotten, and the choicest of Heaven's blessings are invoked upon the patriot's head.

Mr. A. MANN said that, of all the debates to which he had ever listened, this was the most useless. The cry of corruption had been raised against the heads of these departments for two or three years, without there ever having been any specific charge of corruption or maladministration. He, for one, should be well pleased to see the accuser come face to face with the accused. If there was corruption anywhere, let it come out. But these general charges were made to extend to every nook and corner of our Government. Why was this? The cry of corruption was raised, but why did not the gentlemen show the act and point to the man who was guilty of it? Who was he in whom corruption had been found? He, Mr. M., would assert, on behalf of the executive departments of this administration, that their officers courted investigation, and were desirous that your committees should be sent amongst them. He was in favor of investigation, but the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia contained merely general charges of corruption. He was in favor of Mr. PEARCE's amendment, and would give power to a committee to investigate any specific charge which any member might make on this floor, or which any individual of a respectable character might make elsewhere. But let the investigation of the committee be confined to the particular charge which might be made. If there was corruption, let it be made known; if not, let not gentlemen be convicted upon mere general charges, having no proof to sustain them.

In reply to a question from Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. MANN explained, that he did not say that he should vote against the original resolution, if the amendment be not adopted, but that he preferred the latter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, the true question is, whether we have a right to make the examination before charging any offence; or must we specify offences at random, and then call for a committee to ascertain their truth? If it was a mere copartnership between the heads of the departments and the representatives of the people, we should have the right to inspect their books and papers; and a refusal on their part to let us do it would be just cause for dissolving the concern. But, sir, it is not a copartnership in political trade, where each member of the firm shares the profits according to the capital of intrigue and management he contributes. Such a doctrine is only current with those whose motto is, "to the victors belong the spoils." The people of this nation, in whose place we stand, do not admit the existence of any partnership with their rulers. It is no joint-stock company. Those who rule in the executive departments are the mere agents of the people, the trustees for their use; and we, temporarily clothed with the power of the people, as their representatives, have the same right to call upon those agents and trustees to exhibit all their books, records, and accounts, touching the affairs of the Government, that the merchant has to call upon his factor, or the landlord upon his steward. Sir, this right is the true basis of American liberty; it is the essence of responsibility; and if it be not practically exercised, the people can never settle their accounts, or know how they stand with their rulers; and when the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. RIPLEY) seemed to deny the very existence of such a right, I felt that he was uttering sentiments and opinions more congenial to the monarchical atmosphere of Europe than the republican expanse which encircles the States of this Union. If there is no such right, liberty is dead, and despotism reigns.

But, sir, the abstract right has not been positively denied, although it has been treated as if it did not exist; and the manner proposed for its exercise, by the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island, rather implies a want of right or authority to send out a committee to make a general examination. The gentleman from Rhode Island is an astute lawyer; and, if he will reflect a moment, he must be sensible that the course indicated by his amendment is a departure from the settled practice in courts of justice, designed to bring the violators of the penal code to punishment. By their practice, the grand jury is first empanelled and sworn to inquire; and, sir, the grand jury is unrestricted in its inquiries. It has no limits, but may take a range of investigation coextensive with the penal laws of the land. The grand jury indicts and presents, and gives shape and form to the charge. After the grand jury has specified the time, place, circumstances, and manner of the crime, then comes the venire, and the accused is put upon his trial. The gentleman's amendment reverses the order of things. He would have the prosecutor to state the charge by guessing, and without the examination of any witness before the grand jury, or a court of inquiry, and then he would forthwith enter upon the trial. Only indulge the gentleman in such a course—a course which subverts the settled wisdom of the country, growing out of the experience of ages—and I will venture to say that no culprit ever could be convicted, with the gentleman's talents employed in the defence. This House is the grand inquest of this nation, and I, for one, Mr. Speaker, will never consent to trammel its investigations by adopting a limited rule, such as the amendment proposes.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. RIPLEY) seems to consider the original resolution, which contemplates an examination of the departments in all their ramifications, as an insinuation against the integrity of the President. He (Mr. R.) will not look into the condition of the departments, because the President has certified that all is well; and to look for himself and his constituents after that, would be to suspect the truth and honesty of the President.

I was astonished to hear such sentiments avowed on this floor. They are, in my opinion, exotic, plants which should never be permitted to take root in American soil. It is the doctrine of passive obedience, of quiet acquiescence in the will of a master. Sir, the gentleman forgets that eternal vigilance is the condition upon which public liberty depends. We should receive nothing without examination, without sifting it thoroughly, and ascertaining for ourselves and our constituents all its properties and qualities. If we are to take things on trust, our presence here might as well be dispensed with, and we had better surrender at once all the powers of government into the hands of a truthful and honest President. Sir, I have nothing to do with the truth or honesty of the President. I shall neither concede nor deny him these qualities upon this occasion. By his "fruits" I know him. But as he is soon to retire from his station, and as it does not affect the principles for which I am contending, whether he is truthful and honest or otherwise, I shall not stop to inquire into such personal qualities. But suppose it were conceded that his character for truth and honesty stands as high as his warmest admirers would place it, are we to abstain from an examination into the conduct of our public functionaries, and the situation of their offices, merely because the President is of opinion they have done their duty? The President's certificate in their behalf is nothing more than his opinion; he does not inform us that he has made a minute and personal examination into the condition of the departments, and that his opinion is the result of such examination. We know that the President's official duties have required a great deal of his time. His absence last summer, and his recent illness, connected with his official engagements, have allowed him very little time to devote to the examination of the departments; and hence, sir, this House and this nation may form a very different opinion in regard to the heads of the departments and their conduct, from that expressed by the President; and all this may be done without assailing his personal character.

The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) seemed to oppose the proposed investigation because he apprehended there was a lurking purpose to depreciate, if not slander, the characters of those who are at the head of the executive departments. I am equally sensible, with that gentleman, of the value to this nation of the reputation of our public men, and I have had cause to regret the unmerited reproaches and vile calumnies which are often cast upon them by a corrupt partisan press; but I cannot perceive any good reason for opposing the original resolution, lest the characters of those high in office might suffer by its adoption. We must take it for granted that the committee will report nothing but facts. If the facts are of such a nature as to produce censure, degradation of character, and expulsion from office, it will be much more creditable to the nation and its institutions to expose the base motives and bad acts of exalted functionaries, than to leave them unmolested in their high places, presenting a fair exterior to dupe the world, while all is disgusting filth and rotteness within. I admit there is a diminution of national character whenever any of our high officers are shown to be unworthy of their stations; but we had better lose in this respect than to wink at corruption for the sake of appearances. By detecting, exposing, and punishing, political criminals, those who offend against the statutes and principles of liberty, there is a national gain of reputation, which more than counterbalances the loss I have mentioned. The gain consists in the manifestation of a sound state of moral and political sentiment, which will not allow offenders to escape with impunity; and the assurance we find in the stern political virtue which condemns the official knave, that our free institutions are destined to last forever. Now, sir, let us test those principles of loss and gain, by instituting the fullest and most unlimited inquiry; and if the result is, as some predict, that the characters of our cabinet ministers will shine the brighter from having passed the ordeal, the nation will gain much by the conviction that existing suspicions are not well founded, and by the increase of the reputations of those high functionaries.

It has been said that the original resolution proposes a new thing, for which there is no precedent in the history of this Government. Grant it, and what of that? Is not the President's laudatory certificate in behalf of all the executive departments and their officers a new thing in the history of this Government? What former President ever did the like? If the President introduces a new practice, may we not meet it by an appropriate novelty? If the original resolution is amended, it should be done by providing for the appointment of a separate committee to examine each department. One committee, I fear, cannot go through the whole. If such a practice had prevailed, as I think it ought to have done, from the commencement of the Government, I have no doubt that many things which have been improperly done would not have taken place. Early impressions, Mr. Speaker, are never forgotten. The first lesson taught me, as a member of the Kentucky Legislature, many years since, was the propriety of appointing annually a committee to examine each department of the Government of that State, and to report upon its condition. The offices of our State—Auditor, Treasurer, Register, &c.—are annually examined by a separate committee, and reported on. We do not take the Governor's word that all things are going on well; but the representatives of the people investigate for themselves and their constituents; and the same practice should prevail in this Government, henceforth and forever.

If, Mr. Speaker, I have satisfied the House that we possess the power to make a general examination into the condition of the departments, without stating beforehand any specific abuse or malfeasance as the object of inquiry; if such power necessarily results from the legislative powers vested in us by the constitution, and from the power of impeachment, then there is nothing left to be considered but the propriety of exercising the power at this time. It is nothing more nor less than an exercise of the right to examine a department when this House calls for a report. We have as much right to appoint a committee to ascertain a fact by inspecting the records of a department, as to require the head of the same department, or the chief of any bureau, to report as to the particular fact, upon his inspection. Suppose a question should arise whether the fact is truly reported, how can you decide unless you have the power to examine? I dismiss the argument in regard to the right of a general examination, and will proceed to show the propriety of its exercise.

Will it interest the people of this country, and of the whole civilized world, to know whether there are corrupt combinations existing among the officers of this Government, to aid and assist each other in procuring and retaining for themselves and their relatives offices and the emoluments thereof? Is it advisable to ascertain, in this the freest Government on earth, how far the spirit of despotism can or has obtained power to proscribe and punish those who dare to assert with boldness, and to maintain with independence, their principles of policy, and their opinions in regard to men? Will it have a salutary influence among the lovers of justice and votaries of freedom, to expose the wicked schemes of self-aggrandizement, which sometimes corrupt the wholesome administration of the laws, and infuse a deadly poison into the legislation of a country? If these questions are affirmatively answered, then, sir, we ought now to raise a committee and require an examination according to the original resolution. Whether the committee would find, by their investigation, facts to alarm the nation, or to cheer it on its forward march to greatness in population, in wealth, in resources, need not be anticipated. The committee would certainly find facts of the one kind or the other; and the investigation would necessarily result in pointing out dangers which threaten our destruction, or in confirming our hopes of the durability of our institutions. Either result is desirable, and hence we should not hesitate to adopt the original resolution.

TUESDAY, December 22.

Message from the President—Texas Independence.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives U. S.:

During the last session, information was given to Congress, by the Executive, that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military, and civil condition of Texas." I now submit, for your consideration, extracts from the report of the agent who had been appointed to collect it, relative to the condition of that country.

No steps have been taken by the Executive towards the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; and the whole subject would have been left without further remark, on the information now given to Congress, were it not that the two Houses, at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power." This mark of interest in the question of the independence of Texas, and indication of the views of Congress, make it proper that I should, somewhat in detail, present the considerations that have governed the Executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas.

The acknowledgment of a new State as independent, and entitled to a place in the family of nations, is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so when such State has forcibly separated itself from another, of which it had formed an integral part, and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition, under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the old or new world, have been treated by the United States as questions of fact only; and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from deciding upon them until the clearest evidence was in their possession, to enable them not only to decide correctly, but to shield their decisions from every unworthy imputation. In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the revolutionary movements in those kingdoms, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European Governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America, so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our Government, that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure, and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been, by force of evidence, compelled to decide.

It has thus been made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is, to avoid all interference in disputes which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognize the authority of the prevailing party, without reference to our particular interests and views, or to the merits of the original controversy. Public opinion here is so firmly established and so well understood in favor of this policy, that no serious disagreement has ever arisen among ourselves in relation to it, although brought under review in a variety of forms, and at periods when the minds of the people were greatly excited by the agitation of topics purely domestic in their character. Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in Congress, or in any of our legislative bodies, as to whom belonged the power of originally recognizing a new State—a power the exercise of which is equivalent, under some circumstances, to a declaration of war—a power nowhere expressly delegated, and only granted in the constitution, as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to Congress; in that given to the President and Senate to form treaties with foreign powers, and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; and in that conferred upon the President to receive ministers from foreign nations.

In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives, it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore, consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and Legislature, in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and most safe, that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union, and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country, and a perfect guarantee to all other nations, of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.

In making these suggestions, it is not my purpose to relieve myself from the responsibility of expressing my own opinions of the course the interests of our country prescribe, and its honor permits us to follow.

It is scarcely to be imagined that a question of this character could be presented, in relation to which it would be more difficult for the United States to avoid exciting the suspicion and jealousy of other powers, and maintain their established character for fair and impartial dealing. But on this, as on every trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.

In the contest between Spain and her revolted colonies we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new States to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not till then, were they recognized. Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. The same policy was observed in all the disputes growing out of the separation into distinct Governments of those Spanish American States who began or carried on the contest with the parent country, united under one form of government. We acknowledged the separate independence of New Granada, of Venezuela, and of Ecuador, only after their independent existence was no longer a subject of dispute, or was actually acquiesced in by those with whom they had been previously united. It is true that, with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, and the chief of the republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized Government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico. The Mexican republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion.

Upon the issue of this threatened invasion, the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions. But there are circumstances in the relations of the two countries which require us to act, on this occasion, with even more than our wonted caution. Texas was once claimed as a part of our property, and there are those among our citizens who, always reluctant to abandon that claim, cannot but regard with solicitude the prospect of the reunion of the territory to this country. A large proportion of its civilized inhabitants are emigrants from the United States; speak the same language with ourselves; cherish the same principles, political and religious; and are bound to many of our citizens by ties of friendship and kindred blood; and, more than all, it is known that the people of that country have instituted the same form of government with our own; and have, since the close of your last session, openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek admission into the Union as one of the Federal States. This last circumstance is a matter of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character. The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence; she asks us to acknowledge that title to the territory, with an avowed design to treat immediately of its transfer to the United States. It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof, and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign powers, shall recognize the independence of the new Government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved, beyond cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty, and to uphold the Government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can justly complain of this course. By pursuing it, we are but carrying out the long established policy of our Government—a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad, and inspired confidence at home.

Having thus discharged my duty, by presenting with simplicity and directness the views which, after much reflection, I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence that, if Congress shall differ with me upon it, their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent, and wise deliberation; with the assurance that, during the short time I shall continue connected with the Government, I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measures as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1836.

The reading of the Message having been concluded,

Mr. HOWARD moved that the same, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that they be printed; which motion prevailed.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that 10,000 extra copies of the Message and documents be printed.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE moved 20,000.

The question was then taken on the motion to print 20,000 extra copies, which was agreed to.

MONDAY, December 26.

WILLIAM C. DAWSON, elected from Georgia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of General COFFEE, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Geological Reconnoissance.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. HENDERSON on the 20th instant, was then taken up:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the Senate document No. 333, entitled "Report of a Geological Reconnoissance made in 1835, from the seat of Government, by the way of Green Bay and the Wisconsin Territory, to the Coteau De Prairie, by G. W. Featherstonhaugh, United States geologist," be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion of Mr. H., the resolution was modified by the addition of the following words: "under the direction of Mr. Featherstonhaugh."

Mr. PARKER objected to the resolution, unless some gentleman would give good reasons for its adoption.

Mr. G. LEE said he had voted uniformly for motions to print the public documents; the people were entitled to the knowledge of all the proceedings of the Government; they desire this knowledge, and he had seen no document which was not proper and useful for the people to read and discuss.

The gentleman from New Jersey asks who wants the document—who will read it? and expresses an opinion that not one in one hundred thousand will read it. I will inform the gentleman that several scientific gentlemen have written to me for copies. I have this day applied at the document office for them, and am informed that not a single copy remains. The subject of the geology of our country is an interesting subject to all classes, and especially the geology of our wide spread, hitherto unexplored regions; and I believe the very reverse of the opinion of the gentleman from New Jersey would be nearer the truth. I believe that not one in one hundred thousand of the reading community would fail to read it, if they had the document; and I believe, moreover, that the printing and the distribution by Congress is the most convenient and the cheapest mode of disseminating information that can be devised.

Mr. BELL wished to know if this work had been examined by any one competent to judge of its merits; for they had often ordered books to be printed which turned out to be worthless. He moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HENDERSON accepted this as a modification; and, so modified, the resolution was agreed to.

TUESDAY, December 27.

Michigan.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

By the second section of the act "to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15th, 1836, the constitution and State Government which the people of Michigan had formed for themselves was ratified and confirmed, and the State of Michigan declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, but on the express condition that the said State should consist of, and have jurisdiction over, all the territory included within certain boundaries described in the act, and over none other. It was further enacted, by the third section of the same law, that, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission, the boundaries of the State of Michigan, as thus described, declared, and established, should "receive the assent of a convention of delegates, elected by the people of said State for the sole purpose of giving the assent therein required; that, as soon as such assent should be given, the President of the United States should announce the same by proclamation; and that, thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, should be considered as complete, and her Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States entitled to take their seats without further delay.

In the month of November last, I received a communication, enclosing the official proceedings of a convention at Ann Arbor, in Michigan, on the 26th of September, 1836, all which are herewith laid before you. It will be seen, by these papers, that the convention, therein referred to, was elected by the people of Michigan, pursuant to an act of the State Legislature, passed on the 25th of July last, in consequence of the above mentioned act of Congress, and that it declined giving its assent to the fundamental condition prescribed by Congress, and rejected the same.

On the 24th instant, the accompanying paper, with its enclosure, containing the proceedings of a convention of delegates subsequently elected, and held in the State of Michigan, was presented to me. By these papers, which are also herewith submitted for your consideration, it appears that elections were held in all the counties of the State except two, on the 5th and 6th day of December, instant, for the purpose of electing a convention of delegates to give the assent required by Congress; that the delegates then elected assembled in convention on the 14th day of December, instant; and that on the following day the assent of the body to the fundamental condition above stated was formally given.

This latter convention was not held or elected by virtue of any act of the Territorial or State Legislature; it originated from the people themselves, and was chosen by them in pursuance of resolutions adopted in primary assemblies, held in the respective counties. The act of Congress, however, does not prescribe by what authority the convention shall be ordered, or the time when or the manner in which it shall be chosen. Had these latter proceedings come to me during the recess of Congress, I should therefore have felt it my duty, on being satisfied that they emanated from a convention of delegates elected in point of fact by the people of the State, for the purpose required, to have issued my proclamation thereon, as provided by law. But as the authority conferred on the President was evidently given to him under the expectation that the assent of the convention might be laid before him during the recess of Congress, and to avoid the delay of a postponement until the meeting of that body, and as the circumstances which now attend the case are in other respects peculiar, and such as could not have been foreseen when the act of June 15, 1836, was passed, I deem it most agreeable to the intent of that law, and proper for other reasons, that the whole subject should be submitted to the decision of Congress. The importance of your early action upon it is too obvious to need remark.

Extension of the Pension System.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third section of the act entitled "An act granting half pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands or fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1836, so as to extend the provisions of that section to all widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose husbands were entitled to a pension, excepting cases of second marriage after the termination of the war.

The resolution was then agreed to, nem. dis.

Paper Money vs. the Constitutional Currency.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following memorial, presented at the last session of Congress, and laid on the table, and again brought to the attention of the House yesterday by Mr. GALBRAITH:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents: That we, in common with a large portion of our fellow-citizens, have, for some time past, viewed with some degree of alarm the rapid encroachments of incorporated companies upon the liberties and rights of the people, particularly those established for the purpose of banking. As the system now exists in the several States incorporating companies for that purpose, it destroys, as we conceive, the design of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, &c. The notes or bills of those banking companies, incorporated by the States, are rapidly taking the place of the constitutional currency of the country—gold and silver—and a continued fluctuation and uncertainty produced in the circulating medium, which the constitution intended should be steady and permanent. Under these circumstances, we beg leave, respectfully, to suggest to the consideration of Congress the propriety of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, for the adoption of the several States, restricting the incorporation of banking companies, and limiting them in their issues of bank notes. We wish not to be considered as asking for any powers being given to Congress to incorporate companies of this description, but simply the restricting of the States. We are opposed to the increase of power in the National Government, or a consolidated Government; but if the system before mentioned be permitted to progress as it has for the last few years, we apprehend the consequences to the community may be serious, and dangerous to the stability of our republican institutions.

Your memorialists beg leave further to represent, that they have understood that the new Bank of the United States, chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, is now reissuing the notes of the old Bank of the United States, in which the United States was a stockholder to the amount of one-fifth of the stock; thus unwarrantably and fraudulently, as we believe, involving the faith and credit of the United States, bringing this State into collision with the other sisters of the confederacy, and calculated to produce confusion and disorder in the circulating medium of the country. Your memorialists, therefore, beg leave to call the attention of Congress to the subject, to inquire whether the fact be as has been reported; and if so, if there are any means in the power of Congress, to prevent such gross and improper practices upon the Government. And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

This memorial Mr. GALBRAITH having moved to refer to a select committee, and the question upon that disposition of it having been stated from the Chair, a debate arose, in which Messrs. GALBRAITH, LINCOLN, HARPER, DENNY, CHAMBERS, VANDERPOEL, and EVERETT took part; when Mr. GALBRAITH's motion was adopted and a committee of nine appointed.

[The committee was of the following gentlemen: MESSRS. GALBRAITH, of Pennsylvania; SPEIGHT, of North Carolina; EVERETT, of Vermont; MASON, of Maine; LINCOLN, of Massachusetts; MANN, of New York; JENIFER, of Maryland; HOLSEY, of Georgia; and CRAIG, of Virginia.]

THURSDAY, January 5, 1837.

Executive Administration—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. WISE, together with the pending amendment of Mr. D. J. PEARCE, providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments.

Mr. HANNEGAN said: I shall vote for the resolution as proposed by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. WISE.) The vote, however, will not be given for the same reasons assigned a day or two since by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS,) or for those given in the main by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ROBERTSON.) So far as the latter gentleman's assignment was based upon the spirit of inquiry, or the right and power of this House to investigate fully and freely, and at any moment, the affairs of the different departments and bureaus of the Government, he concurred with him to the uttermost. It was a right upon which might be said emphatically to hang the purity of the Government and the liberties of the people; a right for the exercise of which he had ever contended, in its fullest and broadest sense, and which he could not now surrender; a power which, when denied by the Bank of the United States, and its friends on that floor and elsewhere, he should, to the last hour of his life, consider as a denial of the essential principle of popular Government.

So far, however, as the gentleman's argument concerned the existence of corruption, and the practice of abuses in the different departments, the improper or unjust exercise of executive or other official influence on the politics of the day or the recent elections, and the necessity of the proposed investigation for these purposes, he differed with him in the widest sense of the word.

Neither abuses nor corruptions would, as Mr. H. believed, be found existing in any of the departments; and the fuller and more open the investigation should be, the more complete, in his opinion, would be the vindication of those against whom the charges are to be levelled. That vindication was what no correct man could feel inclined to deny, if based upon justice and innocence. Regarding them in that light, he had no fears of the consequences; and should they be found otherwise, it was due to the country, to those who had been deceived, to the venerable Chief Magistrate, against whom he believed no man had ever yet directed the charge of corruption, dishonor, or dishonesty, that the guilt should be exposed, and the guilty brought to punishment. With the honorable mover of the resolution, he was willing to go every length in pursuit of the speculator and the plunderer. The cry that such were abroad, that they were fattening on the public crib, that they were hidden in the recesses of the departments, had been resounding through the hall every day since the commencement of the present, and indeed during the greater part of the last session. The public mind was constantly turned by gentlemen here to this one theme; and it seemed to him high time that all this corruption, none of which, however, he had yet heard specified, should be looked into, probed, corrected.

There was an individual, too, connected with this business, whose name, from its frequent repetition by honorable gentlemen in their places, the very parrots themselves, had they been present, would have learned to utter ere this; an individual whom he knew in private life, and knew there without reproach, yet whose name here was daily connected with the worst practices. This individual common justice entitled at least to trial, before condemnation. Mr. H., as everybody would understand, alluded to Reuben M. Whitney, the sum and substance of the charge against whom, so far as specifications went, amounted to the fact that he was employed as an agent by some of the deposit banks, his employment as an agent of the Government being presumed solely from the appearance of his name affixed to a sign before one of the rooms in the building occupied by the Treasury Department. This fact alone might, with a jury predetermined to hang both him and Mr. Woodbury, be sufficient proof; but certainly, if no such prior determination existed, it could not be construed into proof positive of a knowledge on either part that the other existed.

Justice to this individual himself, to his family, to the country, demanded an exposé of the attitude which he occupied officially towards the Government.

Mr. H. said, throughout the period of this session, there was one thing he had observed with pain; a course which he believed had no precedent in the past history of the country, and the memory of which he hoped might be buried forever at the termination of this Congress. He alluded to the fact of the determined spirit of animosity, the same relentless opposition, which, during the past seven years, had been exhibited in the House against the President, continuing to evince itself up to the hour when he was retiring finally from the public stage. Whatever might have been the rancor of party, he believed, from all the information he had, that the last session of an Executive had hitherto been permitted to pass, if not entirely in calmness and peace, shorn, at least, of the virulence and rancor of cherished hate. He presumed not to be a conscience-keeper for others, nor would he dictate any man's course; but were he now the enemy of the venerable man who had so long occupied a distinguished place in the eyes of his own country and the world, he could not find it in his heart, at this period, to imbitter a single breath of his allotted existence. Whatever feelings of hostility he might have cherished against the Executive himself, the policy and propriety of his administration, he would at this hour stand silently by, and permit the curtain to drop quietly and decently over the last scene. What, he asked, was that scene, and who the great actor, that the curtain was about to fall upon? It was the last retiring view which the world could have of a man whose eventful life had furnished a whole, a heavy volume for the history of his country; of a man whose imperishable deeds were to be written in other languages, and read in other tongues, and never read in any land, under any sky where human liberty had a votary, without the heartfelt tribute of glowing admiration; a man upon whom his country, almost with acclamation, had delighted to bestow the highest honors of the State, and who wore those honors as became them both—his only aim her glory, her prosperity, her happiness, her liberty.

Let the records of his renown be sought where they may, whether emanating from the closet or achieved in the field, they will be found alike stamped with the impress of a mighty mind, a patriotic and devoted heart. No matter in what manner he may be talked of here, what obloquy may be cast upon his acts, it will turn to nothing in the end. The glories of New Orleans, of Talladega, of the Horse-shoe, cannot be stricken from the annals of American history. Posterity will read; and, in aftertimes, when patriots war for liberty, amid the strife, the hurry, and the carnage, the name of Andrew Jackson shall be the talisman,

"To stir the hearts of men,
As though 'twere the battle-drum."

Long hence, when the rank grass shall have grown, and withered again and again, over the whole "animated warm motion" now filling this hall, when perhaps none will be found to tell where most of us lie; in this very hall, if liberty and union remain, the name he had just uttered would be heard resounding, as the preserver, in a trying hour, of his country's political freedom and the pure principles of her constitution.

Mr. H. said he was not speaking with a courtier's tongue, for such a language he had yet to learn, or such a feeling to cherish, towards created man. It was not the part he had played in his intercourse with the President; but whenever, as had sometimes been the case, a difference of opinion existed between them on subjects in which he himself had felt an interest, his own opinions had been spoken to the President promptly and warmly—it might be at times too warmly for the disparity of years. In speaking of the Executive now, he had spoken of him as one about to be numbered with the past; as one with whom his own age was on the eve of exchanging mournful adieus, and upon whose ear the voice alike of flattery and of friendship, of low detraction and of manly enmity, would soon fall with the same heavy, cold, senseless effect.

From first to last, since his entry into the hall, he had sat and silently heard the President denounced as a tyrant, branded, almost in the same breath, with the opposite epithets of usurper and dotard. Fortunately, the feelings which inspired such language could not be communicated to posterity; they would sink into the same grave, they would lie buried in the same oblivion, assigned to most of those who cherished them.

History, in her long-drawn gallery, will present to coming time no portrait that can occupy a higher place than his who in life has been so traduced—none that shall stand forth in more simple, beautiful, living relief.

As to the character of Mr. Van Buren's administration, not having the gift of prescience, it was impossible for him to say what might be its results. He looked forward, however, with perfect confidence, to a continuance of the principles upon which the Government was now administered, and felt satisfied that, in this expectation, there would be no disappointment. That violence could be offered, that a blow could be inflicted upon the fundamental principles of the constitution, by the present head of the Government, was a state of things which he could not conceive within the range of possibility. It would argue an unhallowed love of power, and a misapprehension or a hatred of the free institutions of his native soil, in the bosom of the man. Is it, he would ask, likely that such feelings could now tenant the heart of Andrew Jackson? He would let the terms in which his friend from Tennessee (Mr. PEYTON) had spoken of the President, a few days back, answer the question. He alluded to the interview described by his friend between the President and one of the Tennessee Senators. Was he planning schemes of power for himself or another, then? Was their talk of treason or unholy stratagem? No, sir, no; the gentleman from Tennessee told us it was of the grave—of dying—of his loved Hermitage, which he wished once more to see, and where he hoped his eyes might close. Can it be that such a man, after having toiled in the cause of liberty his whole life, should, when the grave and all its mysteries are drawing nigh, seek, as the last act of a glorious career, to impair the principles for which in boyhood he bled; the institutions which in riper years he aided to strengthen and perfect; and the free Government which, in the full maturity of manhood, he triumphantly sustained? Let it not be borne upon the winds: before such things can exist, the moral order of nature must be reversed.

Mr. HAMER said: We are charged with being influenced by the "spoils," and with relying upon them to insure our success. By "spoils" they mean either office or money. In regard to the former, the opposition claim a remarkable share of disinterested patriotism. If we believe their account of it, they have a great aversion to office; and yet, when did they ever let a good one pass by without grasping at it? I can imagine I almost see their "mouths water" sometimes for a taste of the "Treasury pap."

If it had so happened that Mr. Van Buren had not received quite votes enough to elect him, and the three highest candidates had come before the House for our decision, we should have had great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. There would have been no intrigue or bargain, of course! But when all the difficulties had been surmounted, as they no doubt would have been, and an opposition man elected, then we should have seen the beginning of troubles. What would have been the policy of his administration, no man living can tell. His supporters would have been of all political creeds and complexions under heaven; as opposite to each other as the poles, and wholly irreconcilable. He could not have pleased one set of them without displeasing the others; and if he had compromised, and gone sometimes a little with one side, and then leaned a little to the other, he would have been doing precisely what they charge upon General Jackson; and would therefore have displeased them all!

But this is not the grand difficulty. We are told that professions and practice ought to go together. Now, the opposition profess to believe that our friends who are in office are unworthy to remain there; so they shall be turned out forthwith. Again, they profess to have a mortal hatred for office-holders; and, of course, none of them would be willing to fill the vacancies! Here would be one of the greatest calamities that ever befel a free people—all the offices of the country vacant, and no one to fill them! One portion of the country would be too bad, and the other too good, to have any thing to do with public office, honor, or emolument!

But upon the subject of money, of mercenary motives and influences, who has shown the strongest inclination to resort to such means to control public sentiment? Who are the friends of banks, of the Bank of the United States? Who are willing to sell extraordinary privileges for bonuses payable in money? Who are the supporters of land bills and distribution bills? I do not speak of the deposit bill of the last session. That was sustained by a majority of my own political friends, driven to it, in some measure, by the force of circumstances, which they could not fully control; but I allude to a permanent system, by which money for which the Government has no use, is to be drawn from the pockets of the people; and, after paying four or five sets of public men for collecting it, for legislating upon the subject, and for distributing it again, we return to the State Governments the balance, to be expended in such manner as they may direct. The General Government has no right to do this—it is a fraud upon the people. The revenue should be cut down so as to meet the wants of the Government and nothing more; leaving all the fruits of individual industry beyond that in the people's pockets, to be disposed of as each man may think proper. Such is the democratic doctrine; but the opposition will not go for this.

The indications have been already given to the country. There is to be a coalition between a portion of the South and the manufacturing interests of the North. The preservation of the "public faith" is to be the pretext for collecting a surplus. The "compromise bill" is said to have pledged the public faith! What an absurdity is this! Sir, I would regard a violation of the faith of the nation with as much horror as any gentleman in or out of this House. A nation without faith is like an individual whose reputation has been totally destroyed: they are both very properly excluded from all honorable associations. But how has public faith been pledged in this case? Can two or three prominent members of Congress make an arrangement, and obtain the passage of a law which is to bind all posterity? Have they any more power than their successors? and, if so, whence did they obtain it? The idea is preposterous. If they could bind us for ten years, they can do so for fifty or a hundred; and what becomes of popular liberty? The "compromise act" is of no more authority than any other law of Congress, and can be repealed or modified at any time we may think proper. It will be sustained, however, I have no doubt, and an enormous amount of taxes thus levied upon the people, to be divided out again; keeping up swarms of unnecessary officers, and enriching one portion of the community at the expense of another. The money is never returned to the men who earned it.

Again: it is charged upon this administration that it has increased the annual expenditures to a large amount. Why do not gentlemen have the candor to tell the people the cause of this increase? It is to be found in the increased population, offices, and wants of the Government; in the appropriations for various national objects, fortifications, navy, &c. The removal of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, the purchase of their lands, and the wars we have had with them, are some of the principal items. Has there been any unnecessary expenditure? If so, point it out. Let us know what it is; and then we will ask ourselves why we appropriated the money.

So of the corruption of which we hear so much. In what does it consist? Who has been guilty of it? In what department or bureau is it to be found? What is its character? General charges are easily made; but they are too indefinite. Let gentlemen assume the responsibility of making a distinct charge. In private life, if one man instigates a prosecution against another for an offence, and it turns out, upon investigation, that there is no foundation for it, and not even a probable cause for its commencement, the prosecutor is liable to an action of damages for the injury done to individual reputation. Are the characters of public men less valuable to them than those of private citizens? Are they not equally under the protection of the law? True, the prosecutor here might not be liable to an action; but if there should turn out to be neither ground for the charge, nor good reason for instituting the inquiry, public sentiment would render that justice, to all concerned, that is administered in the other case by the Judiciary of the country.

If any gentleman will rise in his place, and state that he has good reason to believe, from information upon which he can rely, that fraud and corruption do exist in a particular department, either naming his informant or stating that it is improper to name him, I, for one, will vote for a committee, with ample powers to make a thorough investigation. If one committee is not enough, I will vote for more—for as many as are necessary to develop the true condition of the public offices, and to expose all the defaulters who may be found in them. This, I think, ought to satisfy the most fastidious.

This House has been assailed. It has been denominated a mere "bed of justice, to register the decrees of royalty!" It seems that we sit here, without any opinions of our own, merely to register the edicts of the President! What is the pretext for this charge? Why, forsooth, we agree in sentiment with the President, and therefore sustain his measures! Was ever argument more futile? Who elected the President? The people. Who elected the members of this House? The same people. Do they not vote for both because they approve of their political opinions? Undoubtedly. Are not the President and the majority of the members of this House of the same political party? Is it strange that they should agree in regard to great leading measures of policy? Who would anticipate any thing else than an agreement? I desire to speak respectfully of arguments advanced here, and will, therefore, not say that this is childish; but really it is one of the strangest specimens of parliamentary logic that I have ever heard.

Pray, who rules the opposition? Whose edicts do they register? Do they sit here to register the edicts of a distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, of another from Massachusetts, and of a third from South Carolina? If not, how does it happen that they agree so cordially and entirely with the three great leaders in all their political opinions? The fact cannot be denied, that this agreement does exist; and if the argument is good with respect to us, it applies equally to the opposition. If we are the President's "slaves," they are "slaves" to the opposition leaders.

Executive Administration—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

The President, it is said, is popular; that he rules the country and guides public sentiment by the aid of this personal popularity. What a lame and impotent conclusion! True, he is popular, but it is because he deserves to be so, from his eminent talents, his democratic principles, and his faithful and extraordinary public services. If other gentlemen wish to be popular, let them pursue his footsteps, adopt his principles, and render such services, and then they will attain the object of their wishes. The people of this country have but one desire in regard to public affairs—it is to see their Government well administered. They elected Andrew Jackson because they believed he would thus administer the Government; and they have not been disappointed.

Who is it that complains of him? They are the men who told us, in 1824 and in 1828, that if Jackson succeeded, the country would be ruined; the men who told us the same thing in 1832; men who invoke war, pestilence, and famine, rather than devotion to military glory; but who, during the late campaign, huzzaed for military chieftains louder than ever we did at any period. They are now endeavoring to convince us that they were right; that we have been ruined; and that all their predictions have been verified. Do they think we will believe their declamations in opposition to the evidence of our own senses? When was this country ever more happy and prosperous than at this moment? Never since the Government was first organized. The laboring classes of the community—the farmer, the planter, the mechanic, the manufacturer—are all growing rich. Land, and all its products, bear a higher price than they have for many years; yet gentlemen will have it that we are ruined. The laws protect every man in the enjoyment of all his rights—personal liberty, personal security, and private property; in all his immunities and privileges—religious, civil, and political; still gentlemen insist that we are ruined. Sir, the people will not believe them. When they feel themselves happy at home, and learn from every intelligent American, of every party, that our country now stands higher abroad, on account of the manner in which our intercourse has been conducted by this administration with foreign nations (France included) than it ever did in any former period, they will not believe any man who asserts that they have been injured by those who have held the reins of power for the last eight years.

Having said thus much in explanation, I will now proceed with my discourse. When we adjourned the other day, I was remarking that the nation had approved of the conduct of the present Executive. The late elections prove that beyond all dispute. A successor has been elected by a large majority, who has been associated with the Executive for many years; who approves of his leading measures, and is pledged to carry out his policy. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) who I regret to see is not in his seat, particularly as I understand he is detained from it by the illness of his family, told us the other day that he was advocating the cause of the people, and did not wish to be understood as assailing the President. That gentleman and several others have been advocating the cause of the people in the same way for years; yet, whenever the people come to the polls, they uniformly decide against their own advocates, and in favor of Andrew Jackson. This proves their approbation of his principles and policy.

I do not stand here to eulogize the President; but this much I will say: when the passions which enter into party conflicts in this country shall have subsided, when the prejudices created by such controversies shall have passed away, then, and not till then, will justice be done to the fame and character of Andrew Jackson. And when his enemies shall have floated down the stream of time into that oblivion which is the inevitable destiny of almost their whole number, his memory will survive and flourish in the hearts of a just, a grateful, and an intelligent people.

The history of America up to this period will present three Presidents standing out boldly upon her pages as great public benefactors. They are—George Washington, who harmonized the conflicting elements, and put our Government in motion; Thomas Jefferson, who arrested it in its downhill career towards monarchy, and restored it to its pristine purity; and Andrew Jackson, who gave it the "republican tuck," brought it back to the point where Jefferson left it, and where it always ought to remain.

I come now to speak of the future. It has been boldly proclaimed here by several gentlemen, that, in regard to the administration of Mr. Van Buren, we are to have "war in advance," and "war to the knife!" This is a most extraordinary position for gentlemen to assume, before the principles or policy of the Chief Magistrate are made known,—nay, before he has taken the oath of office; to declare war, and that, too, a war of extermination? They inform us that he is not to be judged by his acts; that they may possibly support his measures, but they will wage an interminable warfare against the man! Why, sir, we go for measures, and men to carry them out; we support men, because they are in favor of certain doctrines and measures, not because we like the man. Any other system than this must degenerate into mere "man-worship."

This may be a very patriotic opposition; but it appears to me to be an impolitic one for the gentlemen themselves. When one man is determined beforehand to be displeased, or to quarrel with another, we know how easy it is to find an opportunity of doing so. Now, if it should so happen, in the progress of events, that these gentlemen find it necessary at some future time to make an assault upon the administration, will not the people be inclined to reply: "Ah! we did not expect you to be satisfied, for you were determined to be displeased, let the President do as he might." But the course which gentlemen choose to pursue is somewhat a matter of taste; and I have not the least desire to dictate to any one upon this subject.

If the opposition have solemnly resolved that we shall have another four years' war; if they will agree to no cessation of hostilities; if we cannot be permitted even to go into winter quarters for three months; if war, and war to the knife, is to be their motto, for one, I say, "come on, Macduff!" Let us hear the roar of your cannon, gentlemen. Show us the size of your balls; the length and diameter of your calibres. Let us hear the trampling of the horses' hoofs, the neighing of the steeds, and the clangor of your trumpets. Do not annoy us by the random shots of single riflemen, from behind the scattering trees, nor by the flanking and scouting parties that belong to your army; but charge with all your forces. Danger is always increased, in appearance, by the distance. The enemy presents a much more terrifying aspect when he first bursts upon the view than when you grapple with him, man to man, and test the power of his muscle and the fierceness of his spirit. Give us a general fire, along your whole line. The suspense which precedes a great battle is the most dreadful period of the whole affair. I am told that even cowards will fight after the first discharge; and I promise you that all of us who survive the first shock will stand up and give you a fair fight in the open plain.

The reason assigned for making war upon Mr. Van Buren is, that he is a usurper! Yes, sir, although elected by the people of the United States, he is a usurper. Language is changing its meaning now-a-days, and we shall soon be unable to understand each other. Let us look into this charge.

We all know there were many persons in the democratic party who did not prefer Mr. Van Buren to all others as the successor of General Jackson. Some of us preferred Judge McLean; some were for Colonel Benton; others were for Judge White; and many were in favor of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Colonel Johnson.) He was not my first choice. Thousands of us in Ohio preferred a distinguished citizen of our own State. We knew him personally; we had seen the zeal, industry, and ability, displayed by him in the management of an important Department of the Government, and in the discharge of every duty devolving upon him in the various stations he had held, both under the State and Federal authorities. We believed he would make an excellent Chief Magistrate; whilst, on the other hand, some of us had been induced to believe that, although Mr. Van Buren possessed great abilities and experience, still he was an intriguing politician. We believed so, because we heard these things said, day after day, for years, and scarcely ever heard a word said in his defence. How could any one expect us, under such circumstances, to come to a favorable conclusion in regard to him? I must here beg pardon of the House for speaking particularly of myself. When I was first elected to Congress, I was elected as a McLean man. Myself and one of my colleagues were well known, both at home and at this place, to be favorable to the Judge; whilst the other friends of the administration from Ohio were either for Mr. Van Buren, or uncommitted.

Sir, the opposition may thank themselves, in some degree, for the election of Mr. Van Buren. They contributed very much to make him the candidate of the democratic party. Notwithstanding his eminent qualifications for the office, his claims might possibly have been postponed to a future election, had it not been for the rancorous persecution of his political enemies. The first step taken by them, to render him a favorite with the people, was the wanton rejection of his nomination as minister to England. This exhibited so much ill nature, so strong a desire to crush a supposed rival, and to gratify individual and partisan hatred at the hazard of sacrificing the public interest, that the friends of the administration rose up as one man, and, as an act of retributive justice, elevated the rejected minister to the presiding chair of that very Senate who had attempted to destroy him.

The next step taken by the opposition to make the Vice President popular with his own party, was the daily abuse they bestowed upon him during the "panic session." They constantly connected "Jackson, Van Buren, and the party" together, to make up a triumvirate. This very naturally excited kind feelings towards him among those who were abused in common with the President and himself; in this manner, they made him thousands of friends, and he was finally adopted as the candidate of the democratic party.

The gentleman tells us that the President nominated him as his successor, and that to this nomination he owes his election. I should be glad to know when, where, and under what circumstances, this nomination was made.

[Mr. PEYTON arose, and said he could tell the gentleman from Ohio, and could do so then, if he desired it; or would do it after he got through, whichever he pleased. Mr. HAMER remarked that it would be better, perhaps, for Mr. P. to give his sentiments after he had closed.]

I presume, sir, (said Mr. H.) the gentleman from Tennessee refers to the Gwinn letter, written by the President in defence of some charge made against him in a Nashville paper. It is some time since I saw that letter, but such is the tenor of it, according to my recollection.

[Mr. PEYTON again arose, and made some remarks respecting this letter, contending that the article in the Nashville paper was not an attack upon General Jackson, but that it had been made a pretext for writing the letter, which denounced everybody in advance who would not support Mr. Van Buren.]

Mr. H. proceeded. Let the nature of the article be what it might, one thing is certain—the letter was neither in form nor in substance a “nomination” of Mr. Van Buren. It advised union and harmony in the party, and spoke favorably of the proposed convention at Baltimore.

Suppose the President was favorable to him, was there any thing wrong in this? Does a Chief Magistrate lose the freedom of thought by his election to that office? This would be a new doctrine in our country.

It is not unnatural that he should be favorable to Mr. Van Buren. He knew him well. The latter had been associated with him for years in the administration of the Government. They agreed in opinion with respect to all the leading measures of the administration, and Mr. Van Buren was pledged, if elected, to carry them out, and pursue the policy of General Jackson. To such a candidate he could not well be opposed; but how did this influence the election? Where was the President's influence effectually exerted in favor of his successor? Not in Tennessee, for that State went against him. If there was any one State in the Union which could be influenced by him, it must be Tennessee; and yet that went for Judge White! Where, then, is the evidence of this “appointment of his successor,” so confidently charged upon all concerned? Nowhere but in the imagination of those who have asserted it so often, that I dare say they begin to believe it themselves. Suppose the President had been for Judge White or for General Harrison, would there have been any complaints then? Not a word. They would have said: “Well, the President has got his eyes open at last to the true character of Mr. Van Buren; he can be deceived no longer; he has detected the imposition, and, with his characteristic independence, the noble old General has come out openly against him.” He would have been “glorified,” from one end of the continent to the other, by those who now abuse him.

The Baltimore convention nominated the Vice President, and made him the candidate of our party. This, too, is a grievous offence, and smacks of dictation too strongly to please the opposition. Pray, who first resorted to national conventions for such purposes? Who held the conventions at Baltimore that nominated Mr. Clay and Mr. Wirt, in the campaign of 1832? Who held the young men's national convention in this District, in the same year? We all know it was the whigs and the anti-masons. Yet those are the men who now abuse us in unmeasured terms for merely following their example.

But his locality greatly displeases some gentlemen, and they have abused New York in almost every debate that has occurred here for the last three years; and she is treated in the same manner in all their newspapers. And why may not New York have the honor of giving us a President? The South has given us four, New England has furnished two, and the West one; whilst New York and Pennsylvania, two great States, occupying a central position in the confederacy, each of them a nation within itself, have never furnished us one. What has New York done, that she is to be proscribed? Has she not signalized herself by a devotion to liberty, and an attachment to democratic principles, in all the great emergencies which the country has seen? Where was she in the revolutionary war? Battling among the foremost for independence. What was her position in the great political revolution that brought Mr. Jefferson into power? She stood side by side with her democratic sisters, struggling for the rights of the States against federal usurpation and monarchical principles. And in the war of 1812, where was she found? Sustaining the cause of the country as efficiently as any State in the Union, and holding at bay the Hartford convention party, who were not permitted to cross her territory into the middle and Southern States. If this State has a distinguished son, worthy of the chief magistracy, why may he not be presented as a candidate for the suffrages of the people of the United States? So far from there being any thing wrong in it, there was a peculiar propriety, under all the circumstances, in taking the candidate from New York at the recent election.

Mr. Van Buren was thus made a candidate for the presidency of the United States. He encountered an opposition combining more talent with less scrupulousness in regard to the means employed to defeat him than was ever met before by any successful candidate for the same office. Their untiring exertions induced thousands of good men and sound patriots to vote against him, who were utterly misled with respect to his true character.

It would be a Herculean task to enumerate all the falsehoods propagated, and impositions practised, to accomplish his defeat. They all failed. Notwithstanding the people were appealed to in pathetic terms to come to the rescue, were assured that they would be ruined if they elected him, still they marched to the polls and gave him their votes. The people had been twice ruined by electing General Jackson; and, as they found it rather an agreeable operation, they concluded to try it a third time, and let Mr. Van Buren ruin them again.

He has been elected by the unbought suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and in a most remarkable manner. The vote received by him is diffused throughout the Union, so as to prove most clearly that nothing like a geographical division of parties exists in the country. All the efforts made towards that point have been unsuccessful. Including Michigan, he has received the votes of fifteen States out of twenty-six. He obtained the votes of a majority of the old thirteen States, and a majority of those of the new States. He has a majority of the electoral votes of the slaveholding and a majority of those of the non-slaveholding States of the Union. He has one hundred and seventy electoral votes, being a majority of forty-six over all his competitors put together; and he has a majority of all the individual votes of the people of the United States of from ten to twenty thousand. The exact number cannot be ascertained, because in South Carolina the people do not vote; the Legislature appoints the electors of President. Without this State, Mr. Van Buren has a majority of about twenty-two thousand, according to the calculation of the opposition newspapers themselves. But to make him out a "usurper," a "minority President," they count South Carolina as forty thousand—the whole number being set down against Mr. Van Buren, and none for him. Now, the Union party of that State compose from a third to one-half of its population, and they are openly for him, and would have so given their votes, if permitted by the State Government to go to the polls, and vote directly for the President. If, then, the State can give forty thousand votes, fifteen thousand at least, and perhaps twenty thousand, would have been for Mr. Van Buren; for many nullifiers would have voted for him, I have no doubt, in preference to any other candidate before them. Allowing him but fifteen thousand, there would be a majority of ten thousand against him in the State. Deduct this from the twenty-two thousand majority he has in the other States, and he has still a clear majority of the individual votes of the Union of at least twelve thousand.

He is elected according to all the forms of the constitution, and by these large State electoral and individual majorities; and yet gentlemen call him a "usurper!" No; he is the constitutional, lawful President; and, from the 4th of March next, all men will be bound to obey him as such, within the pale assigned to him by the institutions of his country.

FRIDAY, January 6.

R. P. Letcher and T. P. Moore.

The bill for the relief of Robert P. Letcher and Thomas P. Moore came up, on its final passage.

The main question, "shall the bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 64.

Descendants of James Brown—Claim for Property taken before the War of 1788 by the Cherokees, while the Ancestor was moving his Family from North Carolina to the Cumberland River Settlements.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Anderson coming up—

After some remarks by Messrs. UNDERWOOD,

VINTON, PARKER, BELL, HUNTSMAN, BRIGGS, and CAVE JOHNSON,

Mr. SHIELDS said that, at the commencement of this discussion, he had been improperly impressed with the belief that the Cherokee Indians and the United States were in a state of partial war at the time the loss was sustained, for which these claimants are now seeking indemnity; but, upon a careful examination of the history of the times, and the circumstances immediately connected with this claim, (said he,) I find that, at that period, a state of perfect peace existed between that tribe of Indians and this country. It will not, therefore, be necessary to consider, in the argument which I now propose to submit, whether this Government should or should not indemnify her citizens for depredations committed upon their property by the enemies of the country, when in a state of actual war with another power. The Committee on Indian Affairs, by which this bill was reported, state, in its accompanying report, that this claim rests upon the same facts and circumstances, or, rather, that it is identical in point of proof, with the claim of the heirs of James Brown, which was allowed at a former session of Congress. I shall, therefore, in this discussion, refer to the facts in that case, as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1832, and shall take the facts as reported by that committee, at least, as prima facie true. These claimants allege that they should be indemnified as the legal representatives of William Anderson, deceased, for the loss of property plundered from their ancestor, James Brown, by the Cherokee Indians, in 1788. It will be recollected by every one that, by the terms of the treaty of Hopewell, concluded in 1785, that portion of territory which now composes a considerable part of Middle Tennessee was ceded to this country by the Cherokees, and was immediately thrown open for the reception and occupation for our citizens. Among the early adventurers who manifested a disposition to establish a permanent home in this part of the Western wilderness, was James Brown, the ancestor of these claimants. In the fall of 1787, he and his family, carrying with them all their valuable property, arrived on the banks of the Holston, more than two hundred miles distant, by land, from the place of their destination. Believing that a passage down the Tennessee River could be more easily effected, and be, at the same time, less perilous, than a trip across the mountains, early in the following May (1788) they embarked, with a considerable amount of property, on board a boat, which they had prepared in the mean time, and descended the Tennessee River. While floating down this river, after they had reached the limits of the Indian territory, through which they had necessarily to pass, by an act of the basest perfidy, under the disguise of friendship, they were suddenly surrounded by upwards of seventy Cherokee warriors. Mr. Brown himself, two of his sons, and five boatmen, "the only adult males on board the boat," were instantly slain, Mrs. Brown, her three daughters, and two minor sons, made captives, and their property plundered and carried off by the Indians. It is for the loss of a small portion of this property, thus violently seized, that one of these captive girls, who afterwards became Mrs. Anderson, and her orphan children, now ask an indemnity from the Government. Can the Government, consistently with its past policy, its future interest, and the justice of this individual application, allow the sought-for indemnity? It is, in the first place, I believe, admitted that, in time of peace, there is a claim on our Government for the protection of the person and property of the citizen, and for spoiliations committed by any other than our own citizens. But it is contended, in argument, that we have not sufficiently shown that a state of peace then existed, and that the very act of hostility of which we complain is evidence of the want of a state of actual peace; and that a state of peace or war with an Indian tribe can only be determined by the character of the acts of one or both of the parties! I infer, however, that a state of peace existed at that period, from the history of the times, the contemporary conduct of a large community of our citizens who resided in the vicinity of this tribe of Indians, the conduct of James Brown himself, and from direct and unequivocal declarations of the Congress of the United States, contained in a proclamation of that year on this very subject.

Prior to his departure from the settlement on the Holston, the ancestor of the petitioners obtained a permit from one of the headmen of the tribe to pass on his contemplated voyage through the Indian territory, accompanied with every assurance of protection and safety. The community in which he had resided from the fall of 1787 until May, 1788, were on terms of perfect amity, and indeed had been from the treaty of Hopewell up to that time. And, further, this treaty of Hopewell, it should not be forgotten, contained the following remarkable provisions, with regard to our relations towards the Cherokees, in articles 9 and 10, to wit: That "the United States in Congress assembled shall have the exclusive right of regulating the trade with the Indians, and managing all their affairs, in such manner as they think proper;" and, again: "Until the pleasure of Congress be made known respecting the 9th article, all traders, citizens of the United States, shall have liberty to go to any of the tribes or towns of the Cherokees, to trade with them; and they shall be protected in their persons and property, and kindly treated."

No other intercourse regulations had been entered into with this tribe previous to 1788, and none, except one or two of a very partial bearing, up to the general intercourse law of 1802, which has regulated our intercourse with all the Indian tribes from that to the present time. It is true there were other stipulations in the several treaties concluded, respectively, at Holston in 1791, at Philadelphia in 1792 and 1794, and at Tellico in October, 1798; but none of a general nature touching this point. There is still stronger evidence of our peaceable relations to be found in the proclamation of Congress to which I have already alluded. This proclamation was issued, by a resolution of Congress, the 2d day of September, 1788, in four or five months after the plunder of the boat and murder of Brown and the crew. This proclamation, a copy of which I now hold in my hand, recognizes and reaffirms the obligations and binding efficacy of the treaty of Hopewell, without the slightest complaint with regard to any breach of the treaty, or of any depredations on the part of the Indians; in which, also, they threaten heavy penalties against any of the citizens of the United States who should dare to infringe any of the articles of that treaty. It is evident, from the language of this proclamation, that Congress regarded the Cherokees in a state of amity at that time; and, from what we have stated already, it is equally evident that our citizens who resided on the borders of that tribe so regarded our relations at the same period. These considerations seem to me to exclude the idea of the existence of a state of war at the date of the loss sustained by the petitioners. The several reports of the Committee on Indian Affairs on this subject, in summing up the testimony on this point, fully concur in the same opinion. "This is an application," says the able chairman of this committee, "to be paid the value of property taken with force by the Cherokee Indians prior to the enactment of laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and in time of peace between the Cherokees and the United States." Then, the act of which we complain has not been regarded by the committee, and I think cannot be looked upon as creating a state of partial war, or, as some of the gentlemen have styled it, a state of quasi war, so as to exclude this claim from a favorable consideration by Congress, under the established policy of the Government.

If this position were correct, you cannot conceive of any possible case in which those who had sustained an injury in time of peace by Indian treachery and violence could obtain redress for the loss and outrage; for the obvious answer would be ever ready, that the Government does not indemnify her citizens against the depredations of an enemy committed in time of war. The act of hostility complained of creates a state of Indian war, because Indians never make formal declarations of war, like civilized nations; therefore, the indemnity in this particular case cannot be allowed. This position cannot be sustained in any point of view. Nor is it conceived that the risk and hazard which Brown encountered by descending the river through the Cherokee country is such a departure from a course of due propriety, and from the obvious sense of the existing treaty regulations, as to exclude these claimants from relief. His object—the settlement of the newly acquired territory—was lawful, and even commendable. He had obtained a permit from the nation to pass through their grounds, and the proof is, that his conduct towards the Indians was unexceptionable in all things. This is altogether unlike the case of a trader, whose object is to gain by traffic. He surely, then, had not, by his own conduct, put his person and his property without the pale of the protection of his Government. It will be seen, by inspecting the several treaties with the Cherokees, that no provisions were made in any of them to satisfy such claims as the present. But in the 9th article of the treaty of Tellico, or, as it is more familiarly called, the treaty of 1798, the usual remedy between the Indians and border settlers, which is that of reprisal, was expressly taken away, leaving the party injured without any summary redress, and, indeed, without any redress at all, unless this Government shall interpose its protection. It is provided in the article of the treaty of 1798 just quoted, that “all animosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings,” prior to the date of the first conferences in that year, “shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side.”—(Laws of the United States, vol. 1, p. 334.) By this treaty stipulation, even the privilege to demand their rights of the Cherokees was expressly taken away from our citizens. And, much more, the ordinary remedy, so much practised on the Western frontier, of reprisal. It does seem to me most clear that the Government, by this act, became liable, in good faith, to satisfy all bona fide claims of private citizens against the Cherokees, that existed prior to the treaty of 1798, on account of “aggressions, thefts, and plunderings, of that nation.”

But it is argued, that if this claim should be allowed, a new policy will be established and introduced into our legislation, which will prove in the end onerous to the Government. This position is so far from being correct, that, if this claim be rejected, it will change the whole policy of this Government with regard to such claims, for the last ten or fifteen years. I do not pretend, said Mr. S., to have that profound information as to our Indian relations, or as to precedent generally, as many honorable gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject. I have neither had the experience nor the means necessary to such attainments. But, in examining the past course of the Government on this subject, I find the aggregate sum of twenty-one thousand and eighty-six dollars appropriated, by act of Congress “approved 25th March, 1830,” as full compensation to certain individuals named in said act, for horses stolen and property destroyed and taken by the Osage Indians, in the years 1816, 1817, 1823.—(Vol. 8, Laws of U. S. 294.) And again, in the year 1832, I find the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars appropriated by act of Congress of that year, to be paid to the legal representatives of John and James Pettigrew, for depredations committed on the private property of the Pettigrews, while navigating the Tennessee River in 1794, with interest upon that sum at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the date of the loss sustained, until the same should be paid—[Here Mr. SHIELDS asked the favor of the Clerk to read the report of the committee in the case of the Pettigrews, which he did]—and which Mr. S. said was similar, in all its material circumstances, to the claim now under consideration. The loss was sustained by private individuals, while descending the Tennessee River, in the Cherokee territory, by the act of that tribe of Indians, while in a state of peace. Mr. S. said, I might cite many other cases in point, from Missouri and elsewhere, which I have before me, but I will not consume the time of the House by reciting them. I shall desist, after again directing the attention of honorable members to the case of the heirs of James Brown, of which this claim is a counterpart, a duplicate, which in fact is identical with it in all its circumstances. [He here sent the report of the committee in Brown's case to the Clerk, a part of which was then read.] I am satisfied, after this explanation, that it must be apparent to all, that whatever may be done hereafter, Congress has repeatedly heretofore granted relief in many cases precisely similar to the one made out in this application; and, indeed, that it has been the policy of the Government, for a number of years past, without exception, up to this time, to do so. I cannot, therefore, see why this claim of the widow and orphans of William Anderson should be made an exception to a rule so well established. But I am apprehensive that the prospective claims from Florida may have an undue weight upon the minds of some, in deciding upon this claim. Still I hope they will not; it will be time enough to consider the justice of those claims when they shall have been presented. If, however, the policy of the Government, heretofore pursued with regard to the Cherokee depredations committed prior to the treaty of 1798, should appear to be obviously unjust, I grant it should be abandoned. But I cannot see how any one can come to this conclusion, so as to make this small claim, which is perhaps the last of that class, an exception to a rule which has so long prevailed.

Mr. EVERETT, in reply to the arguments in favor of the bill, (of Mr. BELL, Mr. ASHLEY, and Mr. SHIELDS,) said that, since the debate of yesterday, he had examined this case, and was satisfied there was no foundation in principle for the claim. He was aware of the difficulty of engaging the attention of the House to an argument dry and uninteresting in itself, more especially in opposition to a claim of so trifling an amount. In addition to this, he was asking the House to reverse its own decision in a case identical with this, (the bill for the relief of Joseph Brown, passed in 1834.) It was reported in 1832, and sanctioned by a second report in 1834. The report in the present case, made at the last session, refers to that case, and relies on it as a precedent. He did not recollect whether the case of Brown underwent a discussion. It was reported and passed while he was engaged elsewhere on another committee, and was now for the first time brought to his notice; and the importance of the principles assumed was his apology for addressing the House, and constituted his only claim to their attention.

If the aggression complained of was an act of war, the principle assumed would extend to all aggressions of the enemy in time of war. This principle has not been adopted by any Government. The decisions of Congress have been uniform, on claims for such aggressions during the revolutionary and late wars. If a distinction is taken in favor of Indian aggressions, the principle will extend to those of the West down to the treaty of Greenville, (1795,) to those of the Black Hawk war, and to those committed and committing by the Creeks and Seminoles. At the time of this aggression (1788) there was but little ground for a distinction between Indian and foreign wars. The Indians were then regarded as foreign and independent nations; they were not surrounded by our settlements nor under our control. He would refer the House to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in 1834, on the case of Alfred Stewart. If the aggression was to be taken as committed in time of peace, the principle assumed would extend to aggressions in all time before recognized war. It would be an authority for the allowance of the claims for the French spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. E. said he should meet the claim on its strongest ground; that, for the purpose of the argument, he would give the claim the benefit of the admission of a fact left doubtful in the report—that the aggression was committed in time of peace, and was not in itself an act of war. I will here remark (continued Mr. E.) that the claim is for an aggression committed not on the person but on the property of the claimant, and that the claim derives no aid from the hostile character of the aggression.

The case, then, is simply this: The claimant, in 1788, with the assent of the Cherokee nation, was passing down the Tennessee River, within the Cherokee country, with his property, not for the purpose of trade, but with the sole view of passing through the country, to make a settlement below it, when his property was forcibly taken from him by the Cherokees; and for the property so taken he claims compensation. On what principle? Upon the assumed principle that the Government were bound to protect its citizens against Indian depredations, committed even in the Cherokee country; that it is bound to seek redress for such depredations; that it having made a treaty without securing such redress, or having by treaty released the claim, they are bound to indemnify the sufferers. To lay a foundation even for the assumption of these principles, it should appear that some right, secured to the claimant by treaty, had been violated, and that the Government had in fact released a subsisting claim for indemnity. I shall endeavor to show that the aggression was not in violation of any right secured to the claimant by treaty; that no subsisting claim has been released; and that the Government are not bound, by any adopted principle of right or policy, to indemnify the claimant.

The treaty of Hopewell, of 1785, was the first treaty with the Cherokees, and established our first relation of peace with that tribe. By the 9th article of this treaty we secured the right to regulate the Indian trade; and the 10th article provides that, "until the pleasure of Congress be known respecting the 9th article, all traders, citizens of the United States, shall have liberty to go to any of the tribes or towns of the Cherokees, to trade with them, and shall be protected in their persons and property, and kindly treated." The 5th article provides that if any citizen of the United States, or other person, not being an Indian, shall attempt to settle on their hunting grounds, &c., such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States. No rights were secured to citizens to go into the Cherokee country for any purpose except that of trading with the Cherokees; protection was secured by the treaty to the property of traders only. The right of navigating the Tennessee River was not secured by this treaty, as was supposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) but by the treaty of 1791. The claimant was not a trader; he was not passing through the Cherokee country for that purpose. At that day the Indian tribes were treated with as foreign nations; and it is somewhat singular that in this treaty there is a provision relating to retaliation or reprisals, in case of a violation of the treaty: "that retaliation shall not be practised on either side, except where there is a manifest violation of this treaty, and then it shall be preceded first by a demand of justice, and, if refused, then by a declaration of hostilities."

Persons going into the Cherokee country had no other security than the treaty. In every other respect they submitted themselves to such usage as might befall them, without having any claim to call on the Government to seek redress for any injury either to their persons or property. The Cherokees may have violated their faith pledged to Anderson, but not the treaty. It is not intended to say that for any outrage the Government might not, if it chose, demand satisfaction; but that an individual has no right to demand this of Government, except for the violation of a right secured by treaty. It may here be proper to refer to the case of Pettigrew and Scott.—(Report of March 22, 1832.) The report in that case is based on two facts, which are wanting in this case: that the aggression was committed in 1794, when descending the Tennessee River, in violation of a right secured by the treaty of 1791; and that the treaty of 1798 ceded lands in satisfaction of that aggression. They appear to have inferred the last fact rather from evidence of what occurred pending the treaty than from the treaty itself.

It will be remembered that the aggression was in 1788. The next material fact is that war immediately succeeded, and continued until 1791. Whatever claims the Government might have had against the Cherokees, even for violations of the treaty, were merged in the war. It is the remedy sought by the parties for the redress of all injuries. Admit, then, for the sake of the argument, that a right of the claimant, secured by treaty, had been violated, and that the Government were bound to seek redress, the act of war was the measure by which redress was sought—the highest act to which a nation can resort. And whether they in fact obtain redress must depend on the fate of war. But no Government guarantees the result. Its duty is, by all reasonable means consistent with the best interest of the community, to seek redress. It is not, however, bound to continue a war until redress is obtained. The higher interest of the country must control; and if this requires that a peace should be made without obtaining redress, the loss must be submitted to. The Government is bound only to use its best efforts; these failing, the citizen must submit to the fate of war. If, however, a satisfaction be obtained, in part or in whole, the Government is bound to distribute it among the claimants. The claimants for the French spoiliations prior to 1800 base their claims on the allegation that their rights secured by treaty were violated; and that the Government, by treaty, have released those claims, in consideration of an equivalent. The issue is made on the equivalent; but if the principle now assumed be admitted, this issue becomes immaterial. They will be entitled to relief, though an equivalent was not obtained, because it was not obtained.

By the treaty of Holston, of 1791, an end was put to the war, without any stipulation for satisfaction for prior aggressions on property. It provides for the mutual restoration of prisoners only. This applied to no species of property. The treaty of 1785 provided not only for the restoration of prisoners, but contained the further provision: "They shall also restore all the negroes and other property taken during the late war." The treaty of 1791 was simply a treaty of peace, not of indemnity. "There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between," &c. "All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease." The effect of the act of peace itself was to bury all past animosities. It foreclosed all claim on the part of the Government or its citizens for past injuries; all right ceased, and no subsequent treaty could affect them, unless they were expressly recognized or assumed.

SATURDAY, January 7.

The honorable Mr. GHOLSON, member from the State of Mississippi, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Descendants of James Brown.

The debate was continued by MESSRS. SHIELDS, EVERETT, and WARD, when

Mr. HOWELL called for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed; which were ordered and were—yeas 52, nays 96. So the bill was rejected.

MONDAY, January 9.

Foreign Authors.

Mr. ADAMS said he was desirous to make the general inquiry, whether any member of the House was charged with a petition from the authors of Great Britain to the Congress of the United States. If any gentleman was charged with such a petition, he (Mr. A.) had nothing further to state; he did not know but that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. CAMBRELENG) had such a petition in his hands.

Mr. A. explained that his reason for making the inquiry was, that he had received a letter from a respectable person in England, Miss Harriet Martineau, enclosing a printed address or petition from certain authors of Great Britain to the Congress of the United States; and although the request was very distinct that he would favor the object of the petition, yet no positive request was made that he would present it. As the petition was merely a printed paper, without any signature, he did not feel himself at liberty to present it, if, as he presumed, there was in the possession of any other member of the House, who would present it, a petition regularly signed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no such paper in his possession.

And as it did not appear that any other member was charged with the presentation of the same, Mr. ADAMS said he would wait another week or two; and if a formal petition should not be presented by that time, he would present the one which had been forwarded to him.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Surplus Revenue.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report, accompanied by a bill, on the subject of the surplus revenue. The title of the latter was "a bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government."

JANUARY, 1837.]

Surplus Revenue.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. OWENS remarked that as this was a very important report, as well as the accompanying bill, he would move that both be read; which was agreed to.

The bill and report were then read by the Clerk. The bill is as follows:

"A bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government.

"Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 30th day of September next, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports,' or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-third part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 31st of March, 1838, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and on the 30th of September, 1838, the other half shall be deducted, any thing in the act of 2d of March, 1833, to the contrary notwithstanding.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th of September next, the duties on salt and coal shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The bill having been twice read, and the reading of the report being concluded—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill and report be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and one of the minority of that committee upon this subject, he hoped he might be permitted, in the outset, to express his entire dissent from the principles laid down both in the bill and in the report.

Sir, said Mr. L., this is a measure of great importance—no less than a bill to reduce the revenues of this country, which were proposed by the law of 1832 not to be reduced till 1842; that is, in five years and a half from this time. It was, he repeated, a bill to bring down the revenues of the country, in the short period of eighteen months, as much as was proposed by the law of 1832 in five years and a half. He wished, therefore, the members of the House to reflect for a moment upon the principles contained in that report, and those contained in the bill. He put the question to the members of that House, whether there was any serious, any abiding feeling there that that bill was to become the law of the land. This question should be answered; for the bill was of so much importance that it was a necessary duty that House owed to the country that it should be advised that such legislation was contemplated upon the great interests of the country.

What was to be the effect, merely, of simply reporting this bill now? It was to create a panic from one end of the country to the other. What was its present state, from Maine to Georgia? What was the state of our finances? How did they stand with reference to pecuniary facilities? Why, that in all the great commercial cities of the East, (and he understood it to be worse and higher in the new States,) money was from fifteen to twenty or thirty per cent. per annum. Sir, said he, there is already a panic, growing out of the peculiar condition in which the finances of the country had been placed, and the effect of the proposition then before the House was to increase that panic; and how? You come down here, and propose a reduction upon all articles of import of ten per cent. in six months, ten per cent. more in six months thereafter, and ten per cent. more in the ensuing six months.

Mr. MANN, of New York, raised the point of order, whether the merits of the bill were open to debate at this incipient stage.

Mr. LAWRENCE would go through in one moment.

[Cries of "Go on!" "go on!" from several parts of the House.]

Mr. MANN remarked that the debate was entirely irregular; but if the House were disposed that it should go on, it could, of course, so order.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he intended to conclude his remarks by moving to lay the bill on the table. He proceeded. He wished to appeal to a few gentlemen of that House on the subject. He appealed, then, to the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of ascertaining whether this bill be a party measure; he hoped it was not; but he appealed to the members from that State, and asked them if they were ready to sanction and adopt the doctrines of that bill and report. He appealed next to the members from the State of New York. He had been told that that State was in favor of the system, but he did not believe it. He knew there were many gentlemen from that State on that floor in favor of this system; but a majority of her people, he had no hesitation in saying, so far as he knew them, never would sustain the doctrines set forth in that report.

[Mr. MANN exclaimed, he knows very little, then; about the sentiments of that people!]

Mr. L. also appealed to the State of Ohio, and to all the great and growing States of the West, if they had no interest in this question. Was there a gentleman upon this floor, truly representing his constituents, who would get up in his place, and say he was willing to place the whole industry of his country upon the same foundation as that of foreign nations? He could anticipate their answer. It would be in the negative. He appealed next to New England, to the whole of New England; he would appeal to the State of Connecticut, whose delegation composed a portion of the administration party in that House, if they would dare go home to their constituents with this report in their hands, and say to them, "this is our doctrine; we will stand or fall by it."

Sir, they would not be sustained for an hour if they did so. When he appealed to New England, he was aware there was a diversity of opinion upon this subject; but he was confident there was no difference of opinion on one point; and that was, that this extraordinary reduction, brought forward at this time, and under the circumstances, was without the shadow of a plea for it.

What had they been told by the Secretary of the Treasury? What did the departments say? Did not they tell them that, in their opinion, the revenue would fall short during the present year? Did not the Secretary of the Treasury, after making his estimates, (and who knew better?) state that the revenue, after the appropriation made on the 31st of December next, would be short at least three millions of dollars? And what did they know about the revenue of 1838? Who could say what would be derived from the customs or from the public lands? Who could tell what contingencies might arise in that interval?

Again he denounced the bill as a monstrous measure, fraught with the most dangerous consequences, and whose effect would be to weaken, if not break down, the bonds of confidence and credit which ought mutually to subsist between men and communities. He again and again reiterated his appeal to gentlemen of the administration party from Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and New Hampshire, &c., to come out and avow if they were in favor of this bill, or that they believed it to be for the interest of the country. Mr. L. then went on to show that the principles of free trade ought not to be attempted in this country until a corresponding feeling had been exhibited by Great Britain and the continent of Europe; for they taxed foreign articles most heavily, particularly tobacco, bacon and hams, coals, &c. He was referring to the British tariff on imported articles, when

The CHAIR interposed, and said the whole merits of the bill were not open at that stage.

Mr. LAWRENCE wished to speak of the effects of sending this bill out to the people, and, after doing so, should move to lay it on the table.

The CHAIR had merely apprised the gentleman that the merits of the bill were not open on a motion to print and refer it.

Mr. LAWRENCE inquired if a motion to reject it would be in order.

The CHAIR replied, not in that stage.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be in order to move its indefinite postponement?

The CHAIR. That motion would be in order; but the motion to lay on the table would take precedence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would that motion open the discussion?

The CHAIR replied, that a motion to postpone indefinitely opened the whole merits of a proposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE then moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

[A most animated discussion then took place on the whole merits of the bill, involving the three-fold questions of protection to manufactures,*surpluses to divide, and limiting the revenue to the necessary support of the Government. The gentlemen who engaged in this discussion, were: Messrs. Lawrence, Cambreleng, Mann of New York, Ingersoll, Vanderpoel, McKay, Mercer, Reed, Craig, Adams, Bell, Thomas, Vinton, Owens, Toucey, Sutherland, Corwin, Galbraith, Muhlenberg, Calhoun, and Patton. A motion to lay the bill on the table was then made and decided as follows:]

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Darlingston, Denny, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, Galbraith, R. Garland, Granger, Grennell, H. Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Heister, Hoar, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jones, Jenifer, R. M. Johnson, Henry Johnson, Kilgore, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, T. Lee, Lincoln, J. Mann, Samson Mason, Maury, McKennan, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Parker, D. J. Pearce, J. A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phelps, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Russell, Schenck, W. B. Shepard, Slade, Spangler, Sprague, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Toucey, Turner, Vinton, Wagener, Wardwell, Washington, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, Young—93.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ash, Barton, Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Elmore, Fairfield, Forester, Fry, Fuller, J. Garland, Gholson, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Grayson, Griffin, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Haneghan, A. G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Halsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Huntington, Huntsman, Jarvis, C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, B. Jones, Klingensmith, Lane, Lawler, J. Lee, L. Lea, Leonard, Lewis, Logan, Love, Loyal, Lyon, A. Mann, Martin, W. Mason, M. Mason, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, Peyton, Pinckney, Rencher, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, A. H. Shepherd, Shields, Shinn, Smith, Standefer, Taliaferro, Thomas, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Webster, Weeks, L. Williams, Wise, Yell—117.

So the House determined that the bill should not be laid on the table.

TUESDAY, January 17.

Executive Administration—Mr. Wise's Resolution.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. WISE.

Mr. McKEON said the reading of the resolution must bring to the attention of the House the fact that a large portion of its time had been expended upon the discussion of the various topics which had been introduced into the debate. He was deeply impressed with the necessity of confining any remarks he might offer within a narrow compass. He assured the House that nothing would have induced him to prolong a debate already too much extended, except that justice to those with whom he acted, and to himself, required him to notice some of the observations made in the course of the debate.

When the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) was introduced, I viewed it, said Mr. McK., as a measure novel in its character, and one calculated to establish a precedent which might hereafter be perverted. In the phraseology of the resolution, I saw a power of unlimited extent intrusted to a committee of this House. I am not of that school which insists upon a search warrant to authorize you to examine your public offices; but I cannot but believe that, if you intend to examine any matter beyond the manner in which your public agents discharge the duties of their appointment, you will require something more than a resolution of this House. What does the original resolution propose? To examine into the official and unofficial conduct of those who are directly or indirectly connected with the public departments. This is the task which is to be allotted to a committee of this House. This is the inquisitorial tribunal you propose to create. If we appoint the committee, how can it proceed in the discharge of its duty? The power of this House can go no further than to examine into the official conduct of those who are in office, who receive their compensation at your hands, and who are liable to censure and removal for any breach of duty. In every point connected with your public offices, in every matter of an official character, you have the right and the power to exact a rigid, strict examination; but when you will attempt to inquire into the unofficial conduct of a public officer, or to make the wide-spread investigation proposed by the resolution, the success of your investigation will depend more upon the disposition of those who may be called before the committee than on any power of this House to compel them to satisfy your inquiries. You will search in vain for a precedent for this movement in parliamentary history; but you may find one elsewhere. There can be found one direction to which it bears a strict resemblance. The command of this House to the committee may be found in that of Dogberry to the watch, a sweeping resolution to "comprehend all vagrom men," and to let all go who will not stand according to order. Let it be considered that we have several standing committees, whose duty it is to investigate the affairs of your departments. Let it be considered, also, that, a few days since, we appointed a committee, at the head of which is the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARLAND,) which committee is daily engaged in the examination of one of the subjects referred to in this resolution. Yes, sir, the very point which, I believe, according to the mover of this proposition, gave rise to this proposed investigation. But in addition to these means which are within our power, the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island is offered. That amendment is, in my opinion, not open to the objections which may be made to the original proposition. It is in accordance with parliamentary practice. It is no part of the duty of a Legislature to undertake an exploring expedition in search of abuses; but if abuses are charged, it becomes a solemn duty to investigate them. The amendment proposes to create a tribunal before which charges can be made, and to examine into the truth of those charges. Suppose a petition was presented to this House, and referred to one of the appropriate committees, praying an examination into the manner in which your public officers discharge their duties, and setting forth that abuses existed. Your committee would ask the petitioners for specific charges, and if they were produced the examination would be made. I doubt very much whether they would inquire of your different departments and bureaus for something to sustain the allegation of the petitioners.

But, sir, it appears that your standing committees, your select committee, the amendment, will not be satisfactory. Nothing will give sufficient latitude but the original resolution. I prefer sustaining the amendment, believing it cannot be perverted hereafter into a dangerous precedent; but if that cannot be adopted, I shall not be found denying investigation. I am willing to give every facility, and to afford ample means, to pursue the desired examination; to have the official transactions and correspondence of your public offices laid open. As the representatives of the people, we are bound to guard every department. We are bound to pour light into every portion of this Government. It is due not only to the country, but to the incumbents, to those on this floor who wish the examination, that some decision should be had on this subject, and that without delay. The debate which has arisen upon this resolution has resuscitated the denunciations and charges which we had reason to believe were long since buried. I have been surprised to observe the course of the present discussion. The same accusations of corruption, of proscription, and of abuses of every nature, which were made at the last session, with a view of operating on the then approaching political contest, are reiterated upon the present occasion. We ought to suspect that our fate has been that of Rip Van Winkle; that we have been sleeping quietly while the thunders of the opposition, louder far than any which reverberated through the Catskill, have been pealing over us, and we have been unconscious of the presidential contest which has just closed. If there is to be a repetition of those charges, it is full time we should be aroused. I have sought for new statements, but none are offered. Let it be remembered that the same representations which are made now were made before the struggle commenced; that the same evidence, sustained by the aid of the same distinguished gentlemen, was laid before the people of this country, and that the people supported him against whom these charges were intended to operate. Why do gentlemen stop even now? Why do they halt? Why not cross the Rubicon? There is still remedy left. If outrages upon the constitution, if violations of the liberties of the people, have been committed, why, instead of making the accusation, is not the individual who is the author of these evils made liable to the consequences of impeachment? If he has violated the rights of any of your citizens, any of the rights of any branch of the Government, why is he not placed in a situation where he will be required to defend his public character from these accusations? If we have watchful sentinels on the ramparts of constitutional liberty, let them not only sound the alarm, but let them seize upon him whom they represent to be an enemy of the country. That country has a right to demand this movement at the hands of those who are so desirous of preserving its interests from violation. Nothing is easier than to denounce. We ask for the evidences to support the charges they make—we ask for action. The Executive has been represented as a violator of his pledged faith, as one who had broken every pledge. Let us look to his inaugural address, which ought to be considered as an exposition of the policy which would characterize his administration. In regard to your foreign policy, he had stated that he would endeavor to preserve peace and cultivate friendship with all nations on honorable terms, and to adjust our differences in the forbearing spirit becoming a powerful nation, rather than the sensibility belonging to a gallant people. Has this been fulfilled? Do you find the violation of this pledge in the elevated position which our country sustains amongst the nations of the earth? He pledged himself to a spirit of compromise, equity, and caution, in regard to your tariff, by the promotion of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; and if any encouragement should be given, it was only to those articles which might be found essential to our national independence. Let his Messages to Congress show how far he has labored to discharge this pledge. He avowed his determination to reform abuses, by depending for the promotion of the public service not on the number, but on the efficiency, the integrity, the zeal, of public officers. Let the consequences of the toils of those agents, visible in the negotiation of foreign treaties, and in the happy results of the faithful discharge of duties within our country, be his defence on this point. He promised to facilitate the extinguishment of the public debt. Has that been discharged? Does not the contest here for the division of an immense surplus in your Treasury speak for him on this subject? Has not, during this administration, the novel spectacle been presented to the world of an immense republic, unshackled with a national debt? When the violence of political feeling shall have subsided, but one opinion, sir, will be given of the present administration; and if, as some gentlemen insist, the coming administration will be but a continuation of the policy of the present, the country may be congratulated on the prospect of a career of brilliancy and prosperity. It will be a continuation of a policy which seeks to enlarge the liberties of every citizen, and to promote the welfare of the Union.

The corruption which exists in the Government is a fruitful theme. The dictation of the Executive, and his interference with the elective franchise, have been blazoned forth to the world. Sir, if we have had a dictator, he bears but little resemblance to the Sylla of other days. The Roman retired when the aristocracy had been armed with the sceptre, but our dictator is about to surrender his trust when the democracy is triumphant. Do gentlemen suppose that the intelligence of this country is to be deceived with this outcry? May we ask when and where this dictation took place? Who were the individuals who yielded, or the States that submitted to his commands? We hear of Tennessee! That State did not vote for the individual who is said to have obtained his election by the dictation of the Executive. If the dictation of the President was of any avail, it must have been united not only with omnipotence, but omnipresence. Its results are seen in Maine, and at the same time in Louisiana—in the Atlantic States and in your far West. This charge (let gentlemen consider) of dictation and of corruption reaches not only the Executive, but at those above that Executive. The poisoned arrows which are scattered strike not only those against whom they are aimed, but at the body of the American people. If there are corrupters, where are the corrupted? Are we to seek for them amongst the honest yeomanry of the land? Is this degrading character to be given to our countrymen? I trust we are not ready to look upon a majority of our fellow-citizens as obedient slaves, obeying the edicts of an imperial master. The sin of the Executive has been that he moved in unison with the people, and for this he is denounced. This is his crime, in the eyes of his opponents. I cannot believe that his course will at any time be deemed unpatriotic, or prejudicial to the institutions of our common country.

I cannot omit a reference to the allusions which have been made to the President during this debate. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) has traced his course from the period of his early obscurity to the present exalted station which he now holds. From its rise in humbleness, he has found the tenor of his life a broad and sweeping current, rolling onward under the living light of day and the steady gaze of the nation. Parallels are sought; but where? Are they sought for amongst the patriots whose reputations are interwoven with the brightest epochs of the past? Are they found in some brilliant example of devotion to country, of fidelity to her institutions, of purity of purpose, of undying patriotism; amongst the Aristides, the Curtii, or the Catos? No, sir; we find them seeking for parallels in the most corrupt and degraded periods of the Roman Government. They find them in a Commodus or a Severus; in the vile, the profligate, and depraved emperors of a crumbling empire. Who is your modern Commodus? Shall I summon from his many battle-fields the manes of the dead to be his defenders? No, sir; let the living attest his worth! Let them answer whether or not it was by collecting around him the abandoned Cleanders of his time he led your country through many difficulties up to the eminence on which he now is leaving her! Even in the highest excitement of a political contest, we ought not to forget the services of our public men—of those who “have done the state some service.” The petty differences of party will disappear, but the results of the labor of those men never will be destroyed. For one, I will not desecrate the temple of our Union by any attempt to deface one particle of those brilliant names that may cast their splendor over it. Fidelity to our own principles never can be incompatible with justice and toleration for those of our opponents. I speak of this point not as a partisan, but as an American. I cannot be deterred, by the fear of being termed a flatterer, from doing justice to any man. I ask gentlemen how they can hope that the people will attend to their charges? We are told it is to inform the people of the dangers they have passed—of the conspiracies against their liberties that have been exploded. Why, sir, Cicero himself would not have been heeded when the conspirators were deprived of all power to injure. The people of this country will not, as the hour is approaching which is to separate them from him who has for years enjoyed their highest confidence, stand with ready ear to listen to denunciations. Not while one spark of gratitude remains will they refuse to shield him. They will be seen protecting him from the flames of political persecutions; they will be the first to rescue him—the patriot who has led their armies to victory and given permanency to their Union—from the ignominy of being placed in the same niche of immortal infamy with a Commodus or a Severus.

We have been told that the approaching administration will be brought into power by the vilest means; that it is the triumph of the New York system. I find that it is the fashion of the hour to refer to that State. Her immense resources, her natural and artificial advantages, are paraded to excite a jealousy against her interests and her sons. Is this the spirit in which this Union was framed, or can be maintained? Why, to secure a petty triumph of party, is this effort made to array section against section, State against State? In sorrow, not in anger, have I heard the charges made against that State. I have witnessed the efforts to injure her fair fame; but still I look upon my native State with pride. Not one particle of her reputation is yet tarnished. That State can look back upon the past with high satisfaction, and look forward to the future with the brightest anticipations. What, sir, has been her system? She has had “a giant's strength, but she has used it like a giant.” She stands erect in the consciousness of her sacrifices to the independence, the liberty of the country, and to the Union of these States. She presents to you her Saratoga, as her evidence of her devotion to the cause of the Revolution. Every point of her whole frontier is the theatre of resistance to the invasion of a savage or a civilized foe. In peace, as in war, no sordid policy has characterized her course. I challenge gentlemen to point out in the votes of her Representatives here, or in the legislation of the State, any disposition to elevate that State at the sacrifice of the rights or interests of any section of this confederacy. Her history contains not a single line for which one of her sons need blush. Proud of her history, proud of her enterprise, for one, I would, in the language of one who has given glory, not only to that State, but to the whole confederacy, as soon forget the mother that gave me birth, as that State the trophies of whose systems may be seen in the unrivalled prosperity of her millions of inhabitants. The power she wields was never exercised for oppression. Mighty she has been, but none have been more meek. To be the equal, not the superior, of her sister States, has ever been her object. Gratitude demands this humble tribute from one who owes her much; and justice requires that her character should not be misrepresented.

Mr. Wise said that the parliamentary practice had been that the gentleman who had offered a resolution, and opened a debate, should be indulged in replying to members who had opposed it, and in concluding his debate. He had intended to avail himself of this indulgence, but now the previous question was forced upon the House. Now, it appeared, gentlemen seemed disposed to pass the resolution; to pass it, in order to save the administration party from the imputation of delaying action on the resolution by debate. He would ask, however, and he would thank gentlemen to answer him, whether they could now relieve themselves from this odious imputation—an imputation which they deserve. I tell you and the country (said Mr. W.) that I have been asking for this investigation for nearly two years. And how far are we now from the end of the session? Within six weeks of the end, with all our other duties to attend to, and we are told that this a sufficient space of time to investigate the huge, the mammoth operations of this corrupt and profligate administration. Six weeks, sir. I have been detained two weeks at home, detained by the state of the weather, and I find, on my return, that the administration has already carried out their own work for me, by which I am detained from ten until nearly midnight in wading through one branch of this investigation.

Gentlemen now propose to give me this Herculean task. Gentlemen, it is like all your candor, all your plans, and all your honesty. Make the most of it. Go, with a blush on your cheeks, without shame or confusion, before the people, and tell them this!

I now renew the motion made by the gentleman from New York for the previous question.

And the House seconded the call—yeas 94, nays 51.

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 121, nays 52.

So the House determined that the main question should now be put.

And the main question, being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the original resolution of Mr. Wise, reported therefrom, was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 165, nays 9.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

Crimes in the District of Columbia.

The following Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I hereby transmit to the House of Representatives certain communications from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia.

They relate to the difficulties which have been interposed, under the existing laws, in bringing to conviction and punishment the supposed incendiaries of the Treasury buildings in the year 1833.

The peculiar circumstances of this case, so long concealed, and of the flagrant frauds by persons disconnected with the Government, which were still longer concealed, and to screen some of which forever was probably a principal inducement to the burning of the buildings, lead me earnestly to recommend a revision of the laws on this subject. I do this with a wish not only to render the punishment hereafter more severe for the wanton destruction of the public property, but to repeal entirely the statute of limitation in all criminal cases except small misdemeanors, and in no event to allow a party to avail himself of its benefits during the period the commission of the crime was kept concealed, or the persons on trial were not suspected of having perpetrated the offence.

It must be manifest to Congress that the exposed state of the public records here, without fire-proof buildings, imperatively requires the most ample remedies for their protection, and the greatest vigilance and fidelity in all officers, whether executive or judicial, in bringing to condign punishment the real offenders.

Without these, the public property is in that deplorable situation which depends quite as much on accident and good fortune as the laws for safety.

ANDREW JACKSON.

JANUARY 17, 1837.

Letter to the Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1836.

SIR: According to the request in your letter of this day, I enclose a copy of the instructions given by the court to the jury, on the act of 1790, on the trial of Richard H. White.

I understand that the only juror who held out for acquitting the prisoner was satisfied of his guilt, but refused to find him guilty on the ground of this instruction as to the limitations. It is certainly highly necessary that the law should be so amended as to prevent the bar of the statute from operating in the cases where the proper officers of Government did not know, and could not by due diligence have known, by whom the offences were committed. One or two cases similar to the present have occurred heretofore in the circuit court, in which this defence has been sustained.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. S. KEY, U. S. Att'y D. C.

The Message was, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, January 23.

Abolition of Slavery.

An unusually large number of petitions and memorials, on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, were presented by different members, and were immediately laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked the House at this time to take up and decide on the objection raised to the reception of the petition, presented by himself, from Lydia Lewis and others, (and subsequently returned to him,) praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER said the resolution which had been adopted covered all these cases. The gentleman from Massachusetts might send his petition to the Chair, and it would be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not doubt his right to send the petition to the Chair. The Speaker had decided heretofore that the petition was not in the possession of the House. Mr. A. now wished for a decision on the question of receiving the petition, which, on the journal, appeared to have been presented by him.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman might present his petition, and send it to the Chair, to be disposed of under the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS said it was not his intention to send it again to the Chair.

The SPEAKER said then there was nothing before the House, and the gentleman was out of order.

[Mr. A. then presented a great number of similar petitions; all of which were laid on the table.]

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition which he thought could not be included in the resolution adopted by the House. It was a petition from fifty-four ministers and members of the Lutheran church in the State of New York, praying Congress to enact laws to secure to all the inhabitants of the District of Columbia the protection of the law and the rights of the declaration of independence. There was nothing about slavery or the abolition of slavery in it. He moved that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Massachusetts knew the contents of the petition, but the Chair did not. If the petition related to the subject of slavery, it must be laid on the table.

Mr. HUNTSMAN thought the Speaker should read the petition, in order to ascertain whether it came within the meaning of the resolution.

Mr. PARKER insisted that the only way of arriving at the nature of the petition was to read its contents.

Mr. ADAMS. But the order of the House declares that the petition shall not be read.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman admits that it relates to the subject of slavery.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not admit any such thing. I have presented the petition in the form required by the rule, by giving a brief statement of its contents.

The SPEAKER looked for a moment into the body of the petition, and then said that, in his opinion, it fell clearly within the meaning and intent of the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the Chair, and demanded the judgment of the House whether this petition should be received and read or not.

The SPEAKER said that the petition spoke of the absolute control held over a portion of the inhabitants of the District who were claimed as property. In his opinion it was embraced within the order.

Mr. PINCKNEY demanded the previous question on the appeal.

And the House seconded the demand—yeas 80, nays 51.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was taken, and carried—yeas 170, nays 3.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

Admission of Michigan.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

The question pending was the demand for the previous question, made yesterday by Mr. MANN of New York.

The House seconded the demand—yeas 84, nays 67; and the question recurring on ordering the main question to be put—

Mr. THOMAS said he had voted in the negative on the seconding the previous question. But now the position of the bill had been changed, and he hoped the House would not refuse to order that the main question be now put. If that was done, the further action of the House on the bill would be postponed until to-morrow. The bill would be open for discussion after it has been read a third time, on the question of its final passage. By ordering the main question, the House will not close the debate, but it will signify a willingness to take the bill as it is, without further amendment.

The question was then taken, on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Bynum, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Denny, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gholson, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, S. S. Harrison, A. G. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, J. Johnson, R. M. Johnson, C. Johnson, H. Johnson, B. Jones, Kenyon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Lay, G. Lee, J. Lee, T. Lee, L. Lea, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, A. Mann, J. Mann, Martin, W. Mason, M. Mason, May, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, F. Pierce, D. J. Pearce, Peyton, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Standefer, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, White, T. T. Whittlesey, Yell—140.

NAYS.—Messrs. H. Allen, Bailey, Bond, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Channey, Chetwood, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Elmore, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, H. Hall, Hardin, Harper, Hazeltine, Heister, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Janes, Jarvis, Jenifer, Lawrence, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, S. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, McLene, Mercer, Milligan, J. A. Pearce, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise, Young—57.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

It was read accordingly, and passed by the same vote, with the exception of a few members who had left the House.

FRIDAY, January 27.

Representative from Michigan.

Mr. THOMAS moved that ISAAC E. CRARY, who was in attendance from the State of Michigan, and whose credentials were presented at the last session of Congress, be qualified.

Objection being made, and a debate commencing, the previous question was called, and seconded, and the main question put, and carried—yeas 150, nays 32.

So the House decided that ISAAC E. CRARY be now qualified to take his seat as a member from the State of Michigan.

Mr. CRARY was then qualified, and took his seat as a Representative in Congress from the State of Michigan.

MONDAY, January 30.

Abolition of Slavery.

Mr. ADAMS said that he had in his possession a number of petitions in relation to slavery—some praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; some for the abolition of slavery in the Territories; some for the abolition of slavery and the internal coasting slave-trade; and some for the prohibition of the exportation of slaves to Texas, or to the dominions of any foreign power. He was under the necessity of presenting these petitions separately and distinctly, as they came partly from his constituents and partly from people in other parts of the United States. He asked leave to address the House on the right of the petitioners to have their petitions read. He wished that the request might be entered on the journals, and that he might have the yeas and nays upon it. He therefore submitted his request or motion; upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 44, nays 124.

So the House would not suspend the rule.

Mr. A. presented the memorial of the Young Men's Abolition Society of the city and county of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the recognition of Texas. Mr. A. moved that it be read, and called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HAWES moved to lay the whole subject on the table; on which question the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 131, nays 62.

Mr. ADAMS then presented, in succession, thirteen or fourteen additional memorials and petitions on the same subject, praying against the coasting slave-trade, the exportation of slaves to Texas, &c. Each petition was immediately, under the rule, ordered to lie on the table.

For each petition Mr. A. moved a reading; which, under the rule, was refused by the Chair; and against each decision of the Chair Mr. A. appealed to the House.

In each case Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay the whole subject on the table; and in this manner all were disposed of.

A memorial of certain citizens of Kentucky, in favor of aid and support being extended to the Colonization Society, being presented by Mr. CALHOON, Mr. ADAMS moved that the memorial be read; which having been done, Mr. A. made some remarks in the view that, as this memorial related to slavery, it should meet with the same treatment which his own petitions had. Mr. A. moved, therefore, that the memorial be laid on the table.

After some remarks from Mr. MERCER in favor of the petition, the motion was put, and lost by a great majority against it.

TUESDAY, January 31.

Mr ALFORD, member elect from the State of Georgia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, February 2.

Navy Appropriation Bill—Exploring Expedition.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PATTON in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the principal increase in this bill above that of the last year was in consequence of the equipping the exploring expedition; besides this, there was an appropriation for fitting out the ship of the line Pennsylvania and two sloops of war.

The first clause was read, as follows:

"For pay of commissioned, warrant, and petty officers, and of seamen, $2,434,886."

Mr. JARVIS said that as in the first item was included a part of the expense of the exploring expedition, which seemed about to be carried to an extent which he did not think necessary, or that the country would justify, he should move a reduction of it. He had been taken by surprise, for he had understood that the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill would be taken up to-day, and he had left his estimates for the reduction at home. He would, however, venture to move a reduction of $150,000 in the estimates for the exploring expedition, comprised in this and some other items, of which the pay would be about one-third; and before the bill was brought into the House he should be able to ascertain the exact reductions which were necessary, and would correct the bill accordingly, provided the committee agreed with him in opinion upon the expediency of diminishing the expenditure.

Mr. J. said he objected to the employment of so large a vessel as the frigate Macedonian on the exploring expedition, on account of her unfitness for the purpose and the great increase of expense. He said we ought not to think so highly of ourselves as to suppose that we could not profit by the experience of other nations; and went on to recapitulate the scale of the exploring expeditions of Great Britain and France.

Navy Appropriation Bill—Exploring Expedition.

He adduced the testimony of Captain Cook, who, before he departed upon his third expedition, that ended so fatally to himself, bequeathed, as a legacy to the world, his opinions on this subject. That great navigator contended that large vessels were unfit for the business; that the vessels must be of a light draught of water; of a construction that would take the ground easily, and that might be hove down whenever and wherever it might be necessary to examine their bottoms. The vessels he recommended were the north country colliers, of from four hundred and fifty to three hundred tons burden. These were the descriptions of vessels in which he had performed his two voyages, and was about to undertake a third; and he distinctly says that a forty-gun ship would be too large. Yet we are about to send out a frigate mounting forty-nine guns. He repeated the assertion of Cook, that no captain could discharge his duty as the head of an exploring expedition in a vessel of this description without too great hazard to the safety of his ship and of his crew. It might be urged that increased experience had shown that Cook was in error; but, so far was this from being the fact, it was well known that the latest expeditions of France and Great Britain had been performed by still smaller vessels. The Chanticleer was only about two hundred and fifty tons, and had between fifty and sixty men; and the Astrolabe, of whose voyage so splendid an account had been published by the French Government, was only a corvette, with a crew consisting of seventy-nine persons, including officers and men of science. The whole number of her scientific corps consisted of two surgeons of the navy and one draughtsman, while ours was to consist of eighteen persons, which (Mr. J. said) he had no doubt would be found equal in number, if not in science, to the corps of savans that Bonaparte took with him to Egypt.

The officers of the navy, (Mr. J. said,) so far as he had been able to ascertain their views, agreed with him in opinion—high and low, young and old; however they might differ on other points, all seemed to think that a frigate was not the vessel to be sent. If the squadron were composed of small vessels, the accidental loss of one of them would not endanger the result of the expedition; the crew might, without inconvenience, be divided among the remainder; but if the frigate were to meet with an accident, and her three hundred men were to be so divided, they would be so crowded on board the small vessels as to force them to return home, and the whole object in view would be defeated. Mr. J. concluded by saying that he was desirous that the expedition should be crowned with success, but he was fearful it would only be covered with ridicule unless a change was made in its organization; and he therefore hoped that his motion would prevail.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had made inquiries of many practical men, and some of the highest officers of the navy, on this subject; and, from the information he had obtained from them, he was perfectly satisfied that the view taken by the gentleman from Maine was correct, and he hoped the House would concur in it, and reduce the appropriation.

Mr. PHILLIPS said, if the leading friends of the administration, in view of the present posture of the question, in view of the present expectation of the world, in view of the responsibility assumed by the President, were disposed to interpose any obstacle to the completion of this expedition, upon them be the responsibility of its failure; for fail it would, if this motion should prevail.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, cited the law passed last session authorizing the President to employ a sloop of war, and such other smaller vessels as might be necessary for the expedition, appropriating $150,000 for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMS thought the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, had done the President and heads of Departments injustice. Mr. A. entreated gentlemen to withdraw the motion to reduce the appropriation. He did not consider it too large for the objects to be obtained. He would vote three times the amount, if called upon to do so, because it was his hope that this expedition would shed honor on the American character, instead of holding it up to the ridicule of the world.

Mr. VINTON said, we have passed the law directing the exploring expedition to be sent, and, for one, he wished the responsibility of its proper execution to rest upon the Executive, where it belonged, and not upon this House. Mr. V. said that in respect to himself he could say with perfect truth that he was wholly ignorant of the details and preparations necessary for such a voyage; he did not, therefore, wish to assume the responsibility of volunteering any directions respecting them. The gentleman predicts a failure of this expedition if conducted upon the present plan; but is not the hazard of failure greatly increased if we undertake to interfere and direct a new plan? From the moment we interfere, the Secretary is relieved of all responsibility; and in case of failure the Congress of the United States will have acquired the enviable reputation of having procured for itself the praises of the whole civilized world by the enactment of a law directing the expedition, and then of having disappointed the high hopes everywhere entertained of it, by volunteering its interference in the details of the enterprise as already adopted, and, he had no doubt, wisely adopted.

Without pretending to know which was the most suitable for this service, a frigate or a sloop of war, yet he thought in one important respect at least the former was preferable to the latter. Mr. V. said that he had occasionally seen statements of the extent and operations of our commerce in that quarter of the globe, which to him were truly astonishing. It was carried on in a region where all the inhabitants are barbarians; our merchants, in their intercourse with them, were subjected to perpetual vigilance against surprise and violence, and, after all, accounts are by no means uncommon of attacks, murders of our seamen, and even of captures of ships with their crews. On these occasions the most shocking barbarities are usually committed. Now, these people, whose lives and property are thus perilled, constitute a part of the sum total of the population and wealth of the nation. The Government is bound to give them every reasonable protection. For one, Mr. V. said, he was willing to afford that protection to American capital and enterprise, without stopping to inquire what region of the globe was the theatre of their operations. All barbarians entertain very extravagant ideas of their own power, and very contemptible notions of the power of those who have not made before their eyes a display of superior power. It must of necessity be so, since their whole stock of knowledge, from which to make their comparisons, consists of what they know of themselves and see of others.

These people know they are an overmatch for our merchant vessels; and, never having seen any thing else, they are not aware of the existence of ships of superior force. They therefore attack our vessels without fear of future chastisement. The display before them of a frigate would undeceive them, give them new ideas of our power, and cause them to hesitate before making an attack on our merchantmen, for fear of future punishment. It is in pursuance of this policy we have spent millions of dollars in stationing military posts and making military displays in the presence of the Indians, far in the interior, solely with a view to impress them with an idea of our power, and thus so far overawe them as to give security to the weak and powerless of our people who have intercourse with them, without the means of defending their persons or property. Mr. V. said it appeared to him that the sending out of a frigate was only an extension of our existing and long-established policy to the barbarians in the South Sea islands, with whom our people are brought into intercourse. The small vessels will perform the explorations, while the frigate would perform the equally important duty of demanding satisfaction of the natives for wrongs already done, and promising them punishment for those they may in future commit; and in many other respects greatly facilitate the labors to be performed by the squadron. If he was mistaken in his views of this subject, he should nevertheless adhere to the opinion that the Executive should be left untrammelled in directing the outfit and conduct of this important expedition. Mr. V. said he could not suppress the expression of some surprise at the course the gentleman from Maine (Mr. JARVIS) had taken, recollecting, as he did, that at the last session the same gentleman was opposed to the expedition, because not only the equipment, but even the sending it out at all, had not been left to the sole discretion of the Executive. At present, he would have this House to interpose its authority by indicating to the same Executive what class of vessels should be employed! He, (Mr. V.), of course, had no right to impugn men's motives, nor did he; but still he could not regard those who wished to derange the organization at present agreed upon as very friendly to the enterprise in any form.

The expedition was, as he had said, honorable to our national character; would be so regarded abroad and at home; was expedient, for wise purposes connected with our great commercial interests; would add much to various departments of human knowledge; and would, he had no doubt, at all times be amply provided for by Congress. It had, he believed, received the individual support of the delegation in Congress from Ohio, and would not be lost sight of by the people of that State.

Mr. BRIGGS said it was evident that they could not get through the bill to-night, and he therefore moved that the committee rise. Agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported.

FRIDAY, February 3.

Mrs. Susan Decatur.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution granting a pension to Susan Decatur, widow of the late Commodore Decatur.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Mrs. Susan Decatur, widow of the late Commodore S. Decatur, be paid from the navy pension fund a pension for five years, commencing from the 30th of June, 1834, in conformity with the provisions of the act concerning naval pensions and the navy pension fund, passed 30th June, 1834; the said pension not to be liable for her responsibilities on account of the debts of her late husband; provided that the said pension shall cease on the death or marriage of the said Susan Decatur."

A motion was made by Mr. WASHINGTON to amend said resolution by striking out the words "the said pension not to be liable for her responsibilities on account of the debts of her late husband," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and that she be allowed, from said fund, the arrearages of the half pay of a post captain from the death of Commodore Decatur to the 30th June, 1834, together with the pension hereby allowed her."

To which amendment the following was offered by Mr. MERCER, and accepted by Mr. W.: "And that the arrearage of said pension be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, in trust, for the use of the said Susan Decatur."

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, moved to commit the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was lost.

The amendment of Mr. WASHINGTON was then agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then engrossed, read a third time, and passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

SATURDAY, February 4.

Scene in a Committee Room—Messrs. Peyton, Wise, and Whitney: Statements of Messrs. Peyton and Wise.

MR. PEYTON asked the indulgence of the House to notice a matter personal to himself, which had appeared in the official journal of this morning.

Leave being given,

MR. PEYTON said: The House would bear him witness that he had not been in the habit of annoying them with matters personal to himself, which occurred out of doors. Now, however, he felt bound to request a moment's indulgence, not so much on his own individual account, as because it was due to the committee, and to the House of which he was a member. He (Mr. P.) referred to a statement which had appeared in the Globe of this morning, which was as follows:

"If this statement be true, or even approach the truth, it is evident that a gross outrage was committed by MR. PEYTON towards a witness summoned to testify before the committee, and therefore under its protection; and an act of such disrespect to the committee itself as should have subjected MR. PEYTON to its severest censure."

The statement of Whitney alluded to was not only untrue, but it did not even approach the truth. In answer to it, nothing more was necessary for him to do than simply to state to the House the facts of the case, as they appeared upon the journal of the committee.

It would be sufficient to state that his friend from Ohio, (MR. HAMER,) though differing from him (Mr. P.) in politics, moved, on the conclusion of the occurrence in question, a resolution of censure against Reuben M. Whitney for insulting him, (Mr. P.,) which passed unanimously. The committee had authorized him (Mr. P.) to publish this resolution, which he would lay before the House.

Extract from the Journal of the Committee of Investigation, J. Garland, Chairman.

WEDNESDAY January 25, 1837.

"By MR. PEYTON.—Question 15. Did you receive any letter of recommendation from Roger B. Taney, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated, or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?"

"MR. WHITNEY.—Answer. I decline answering this interrogatory; more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with 'or did he,' &c.; therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof.

"The witness was desired to withdraw.

"MR. HAMER moved that the foregoing answer to the fifteenth question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee.

"The witness, (R. M. Whitney,) immediately after the passing of this resolution, was brought into the committee room, out of which he had been sent, and the resolution of censure was read to him, (R. M. Whitney,) and his answer was returned to him. He (R. M. Whitney) apologized to the committee, and took back his answer; after which he peaceably answered the next question which was propounded to him, and such as before he had most indecorously refused to answer. This statement of the simple fact would at once show who was wrong in the occurrence referred to; it would show the unanimous decision of the committee to be that the witness was wrong, and his subsequent apology was an acknowledgment of it."

Having stated this much, which he (Mr. P.) flattered himself was an ample refutation of the charges implied in the Globe and other papers, perhaps it might not be unnecessary to relate what was the actual occurrence on the occasion referred to. His friend from Virginia, (MR. GARLAND,) and every other member of the committee, would do him the justice to say, that he (Mr. P.) had, in the first instance, treated Whitney with as much courtesy as he would have shown even to Chief Justice Marshall himself, if he had been alive and there; and for him (Mr. P.) to do so, when the course and conduct of the man to him (Mr. P.) was considered, it required on his part no little exertion of philosophy. He, (Mr. P.,) however, had done so.

From the time the witness (R. M. Whitney) first came into the committee room, he (Mr. P.) had put about sixty questions in regular succession, and at different times, to all of which he could not get more than ten or twelve answers; the witness threw them off contemptuously, denouncing them as inquisitorial; and this contemptuous course he (Whitney) repeated day after day, and night after night. It was manifest that he (R. M. Whitney) had totally mistaken the feelings which prompted his (Mr. P.'s) course, and from this indulgence in his insolence he made a miscalculation, and went at length too far; no doubt he imagined that because his card in the Globe had not been noticed by me, therefore I was to be insulted with impunity. On the night of the occurrence (said Mr. P.) I put to him a question, in order to draw from him the truth of my statement which he carded me for making; the question related to Mr. Taney's refusal to countenance him; but, as on former occasions, the witness would not answer, affirming that he had a right to demand from me proof of this matter, as I had stated it to be true. Sir, I suffered this conduct to pass unnoticed by me, both because he was a witness, and because I did not wish to enter into personal altercation with one who is as completely shielded from the notice of all honorable men by his infamy as a mad dog is by his hydrophobia. But, sir, he accompanied that answer with a scowl, a frown, an insulting look of defiance, directed boldly to me personally, which perhaps no one else then saw. I appealed, sir, immediately to the Chair, to know if the witness should be permitted to insult me; I walked up to him, and said I would teach him better than to insult me; that I would let him know that I required no constitutional privilege to chastise him if he dared to insult me; that, if he did, I would put him to death on the spot. Sir, I used language which was harsh, for I was excited, as any man would have been who has a soul within him fit to be saved. The Chair called to order, and I took my seat. He says I drew a pistol upon him; it is false. After I sat down, he rose and began again; I walked to him again, and he, at that moment, seemed as if he was about to use a weapon; he had his hand in his pocket, and, when I walked up to him, I put my hand in my bosom, but I drew nothing from it; every one present believed, from his attitude, he was armed with deadly weapons. My friend from Virginia (Mr. WISE) interposed; the witness was withdrawn, and the committee unanimously passed a resolution censuring his insulting behavior. As soon as I could, sir, I made an apology, which I felt due to the committee, for having been transported by such provocation to lose the momentary command of my temper. The witness, on being again brought into the room, apologized for the insult, and was afterwards, as he had been by me before, treated with perfect respect, as due to his position as a witness. I think, sir, this explanation and statement of the facts is due to the committee and to the House; the prompt course adopted by the committee is alone a sufficient refutation of the false statements which have rendered this explanation necessary. I knew what was due to a witness, and I felt what was due to myself. I do not envy, sir, that wretch his callousness and insensibility, who, when assailed by a ruffian, would not, without regard to who he is, resist, if necessary, force by force. Grateful to the House for the indulgence which it has accorded to me, I shall not any longer occupy its time unnecessarily.

Mr. PEYTON, having concluded, then resumed his seat.

The resolution of the committee of investigation was then read by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. WISE then rose and said:

Mr. Speaker: I request the same indulgence that has been granted to my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. PEYTON;) I request the indulgence not so much on my own account, personally, as in respect to the committee of which I am a member. I wish to show how the proceedings of that committee have been misrepresented and belied by that infamous wretch who has published his card in the Globe. From the first moment he (R. M. Whitney) came before the committee, I saw, or thought I saw, in what his examination might result before its termination. It may have been imagination, but I anticipated his intentions from the start. He was evidently disposed to try my friend from Tennessee and myself. He had felt his way, for some time before, in the Globe. He tried our patience there by attempting to draw our attention towards him by his insulting cards and paragraphs. We both had failed to take any notice of him; we could not recognize him as a gentleman in any respect. His behavior and manner, when he came before the committee, was that of a supercilious, self-important, contumacious, and contemptuous witness. His answers to interrogatories were given in writing. He would write his answer at the table, and then, with an impudent air of nonchalance, would fold his arms, cock up his legs against the wall, and cast glances, full of defiance and expressive of contempt, at me and my friend from Tennessee, as if anxious to insult us by his looks. To all this behavior, sir, not a remark was applied; no notice of his insolence was taken; we treated him with quiet composure and decent respect, until, emboldened by our forbearance, he went further; he behaved worse; he tried the experiment of being personal in his answer. His course, I think, was tentative; he wanted to see how far he might dare to go. The night this occurrence happened, I was sitting, with several of my colleagues of the committee, on a sofa in a corner of the room, on one side of the fireplace, conversing in perfect good humor, in a way certainly very agreeable to myself, telling anecdotes in whispers. The silence which reigned was broken only at intervals by the announcement of an interrogatory, or the reading of an answer. The answer to the question which caused the affray was announced; the attention of all to the reading of it was called. The witness was sitting at a table in the corner, on the opposite side of the fireplace from the sofa; a long table was sitting in front of the fireplace; the chairman and Mr. PEYTON were sitting on the side next the fire, the former towards the end next the sofa, and the latter towards the end next the witness. The clerk was sitting on the opposite side of the table. The back of the chairman was towards me, and when he read the answer, and Mr. PEYTON looked around, it brought his (Mr. P.'s) full face towards me. As soon as the answer was read, I looked at my friend, and saw he was flushed with excitement; his face beamed with indignation; no one could mistake his feelings. He first addressed the chairman, by saying, "Mr. Chairman, I wish you distinctly to inform the witness that he is not to insult me here." He was proceeding, when I arose, and remarked, "Mr. Chairman, the d—d insolence of this witness is insufferable, and has been borne long enough." He had, in fact, Mr. Speaker, declined to answer one question because it was "inquisitorial;" and because another was "inquisitorial," he declined to answer it, and had rung all the changes upon that word till, if reiteration could convince and supply the place of truth, one might have believed, from mere repetition, that the committee was, what it has been denounced to be, worse than a Spanish inquisition! Sir, he had received his cue.

But to proceed: My friend rose as I uttered these words respecting the witness, put me back with his arm, and said, "This is my business, Wise; not yours." And he walked straight up to the witness where he sat, and said to him nearly these words—I will endeavor to give his very words, however harsh: "You talk about my shielding myself behind my constitutional privileges. Now, I tell you that I claim no constitutional privileges to protect me from your insults in my presence; and you d——d thief and robber, if you dare to insult me, here or elsewhere, to my face, I will put you to death on the spot!" The chairman had called me to order, and I had sat down; he immediately called my friend back to his seat; for it is but due, Mr. Speaker, to the chairman to say that he has done his duty, in all respects, on that committee. My friend took his seat, when the witness rose, and began to say, "Mr. Chairman, I have been summoned to appear before this committee, and I claim its protection"—He did not finish the sentence, before my friend rose and told him to sit down. "Sit down, sir! you have no right to speak here but in writing, and you shall not utter a word; if you speak another word, I will!"—Sir, I do not remember here exactly what he said he would do; he used many harsh epithets, such as "d——d scoundrel." The witness uttered not a word, but he was standing, and immediately advanced his left foot, and put his right hand in his pantaloons right pocket. I was standing then immediately behind my friend, and seeing Whitney assume this attitude, I walked quickly around the end of the table, near to Whitney's left side. I expected him to draw a deadly weapon on my friend. I watched the motion of that right arm, the elbow of which could be seen by me; and, had it moved one inch, he had died upon the spot! That was my determination. Let me not be misunderstood or misrepresented. I mean to say that, if he had drawn his deadly weapon on my friend, it should never have done its execution. I considered my friend in imminent danger, and stood prepared to arrest it—to prevent his life from being taken by a villain, who wore every appearance and assumed the very attitude of an insidious assassin. Happily I had no occasion to interpose, but in a friendly manner to force my friend away, who had, seeing the position of the witness, put his hand in his bosom. I stepped in between them, took hold of Mr. PEYTON, caught him by his waistcoat, and closed it. I told him Whitney's blood was not worth spilling, and was not fit to stain any man—he was not worthy of his notice. My friend sat down, saying, "Yes, he is worth my notice when he comes to my face and insults me. I would notice any d——d dog!" The chairman expostulated with him, and my friend replied, "You have not seen him, sir; he has been looking at me—looking at me, sir; and he shall not look at me again! I submit it to you, sir, whether I have not treated him as if he were a gentleman." The Chair remonstrated against further disorder. Whitney had not uttered a word after he was ordered by my friend to be silent, and did not until after he had retired and returned to the committee room. Mr. HAMER had been speaking; the witness was requested to retire. Mr. HAMER offered the resolution you have heard read; it passed unanimously; witness was called in; the chairman returned him his offensive answer, and informed him of the resolution, and he immediately said: "Mr. Chairman, if I have been disrespectful to the committee, I regret it, sir, and apologize for it." The clerk took down his words immediately, unknown to most of the members, and the committee, afterwards, when Mr. HAMER was about to move to insert the witness's apology, withdrew his motion, because the committee concurred unanimously, I thought, that the clerk had correctly recorded it already. Thus ended the whole affair.

I went to the chairman, to Mr. HAMER, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. FAIRFIELD, all, I think, of the committee, and begged them not to adjourn until my friend's excitement entirely subsided. I suggested that he should be permitted to ask another question or two, and that the committee should discharge the witness before it adjourned; so that Mr. PEYTON might become calm, and not retire at the same time with the witness. This course was adopted, and successfully pursued. Whitney came back into the committee room, after he had retired, entirely humbled, I thought, and answered the next question propounded in the only becoming manner he exhibited at all. Such, sir, is a true statement of the whole transaction, and such was the part in it which I bore. I put it to the members of the committee to say whether what Whitney has published of my conduct on that occasion is correct; whether, with the exception of my first denunciation of his insolence, and of my after expression that he was not worthy of notice, my interposition was not peaceful. Sir, I acted on the occasion the part of a pacificator. He says I approached him with my friend to ogle him and frown him down. It is true I did approach him, and eye him, when I suspected his design to draw a weapon; I stood ready and watchful to protect my friend; but I call upon every gentleman on the committee, of all parties, friend or foe, to say whether I have not stated the facts truly. I say that no part or parcel, jot or tittle, of the statement of that infamous wretch (Whitney) is true, except the one statement of the question and answer. He states nothing as it occurred, and something that did not occur at all. I call upon the chairman of the committee, who should be the best witness, to say if these are not the facts.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said that it was extremely unpleasant to him at any time, and under any circumstances, to make a statement in reference to a personal controversy; but, from the various hues, in various directions, which had been given to the transaction referred to by his colleague, (Mr. Wise,) he thought it due to the committee, to the House, and to the country, that a correct statement should be made. Mr. G. said, without expressing any opinion in regard to the "card" referred to, or any other part of the transaction, he would simply say that the statement of the facts and circumstances related by his colleague were substantially correct, and detailed very much as they happened. Some things stated he did not see; others occurred which were omitted, not affecting the substantial correctness of the narrative. Mr. G. said he did not see the scowl and contemptuous look which the gentleman from Tennessee states Mr. Whitney to have given him; his eyes were turned in another direction at the time it is said to have happened; but he distinctly remembers hearing the gentleman from Tennessee complain of it at the time, and as the principal cause of his excitement. Mr. G. said the occurrence was very sudden, and the gentleman from Tennessee was certainly very much excited. He said that, with a view to restore quiet, he stated to Mr. Whitney that a question would arise as to the disposition of his answer, and that he must retire; which he did. After Mr. Whitney had left the room, Mr. PEYTON became more tranquil, apologized to the committee, and stated that he had been very much excited on account of the insult which he regarded as having been given him in the answer of Mr. Whitney, and the scowl and contemptuous look with which it was accompanied. Mr. Whitney was then called in, and the resolution of the committee in reference to his answer read to him; he then apologized to the committee in the terms contained in the copy of the journal of the committee just read.

Mr. GILLET said he rose but to make a few suggestions. The situation in which he stood, as a member of the Select Committee, required him to make a few remarks, lest his silence should be misconstrued. It would be obvious to all who frequently attend our courts of justice, that it is hardly possible for nine persons to witness a transaction, and all concur in giving their testimony concerning it, though all might be equally and perfectly honest. Each would remember the part that made the strongest impression on his mind—one would pay more attention to the words spoken, while another would particularly note the gestures. He much doubted whether, if each member of the committee should retire to his room, and write out what he recollected of the transaction in the committee room, any two would be found to agree upon the order and details of it. It would not be strange if they differed as much in their accounts as Mr. Whitney differed in his with either gentleman who had spoken on this subject. This disagreement of persons in their accounts of what had transpired was perfectedly reconcilable with honest intentions; consequently, he should not impeach the character of members of the committee, or of the witness who was before them, if all did not concur in the order and details of what had transpired. Unless we can agree among ourselves as to that occurrence, we could not, with any propriety, condemn one who differed no more from us than we among ourselves.

He had just come in from the committee room, and did not understand how this discussion arose, nor the precise object that was in view. He presumed it was intended to put the House and country in possession of an accurate and true account of what occurred between Mr. PEYTON and Mr. Whitney. As so many jarring accounts had gone forth, such a desire is not without reason in its favor. He had not heard the accounts given by those who preceded him, and hence he could not say whether those accounts were in accordance with his own recollection or not. It was no part of his purpose to express an opinion at this time of the correctness of the statements of others, and certainly none in relation to statements which he had heard only in part. Nor would he now express any opinion concerning the card of Mr. Whitney. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had a day or two ago given notice to the committee that, when the report should be made to the House, as he understood him, he should bring up the subject of that card, and should deny the truth of all, except the copies of the question and answer. At that time, and not at the present, he expected this matter would come up as a subject of discussion. He thought the committee had not generally expected it to come up to-day, and he believed they were not generally in; but if they were, he strongly doubted the propriety of members rising in their places and making verbal reports of what they recollected. He thought it better that the committee should agree among themselves, as far as they were capable of doing so, as to what had transpired, and present it in a tangible and definite shape, so that it would command credence wherever it went. When the committee shall agree, the country will feel an assurance that they have arrived at the truth.

If we cannot agree upon the facts, how, sir, are those who report what we now say to agree? Will every reporter and letter-writer give the same account of what we affirm in the matter? He thought he hazarded nothing in saying, not two of all these would agree. It will be the same with others who hear what we now say. Nay, sir, before we leave this House a difference of recollection will be found to prevail as to what we have said. By tomorrow we shall find a very wide difference in this respect. As the news of the debate spreads, these differences will multiply in proportion to the distance they travel, and all will remain in uncertainty. Newspaper readers will fall into the errors of the publishers, and while one part of the community will believe one account, other portions may equally believe others, and all wide from the truth. From these, among other considerations, he thought this manner of placing this matter before the public was highly exceptionable.

He had entirely abstained from stating one word of what did occur, as he recollected it. Before he sat down, he should propose a resolution in these words:

Resolved, That the select committee, of which the honorable JAMES GARLAND is chairman, be directed to report to this House the facts in relation to the difficulty that occurred between Mr. PEYTON, a member of that committee, and Mr. Whitney, a witness called before that committee, while said witness was under examination.

He did not know that the House was desirous of becoming acquainted with the occurrence referred to; but if it was, he thought this would be a suitable and proper manner of obtaining the facts. The narrative given by the witness had been, he understood from those who had listened to gentlemen who preceded him, objected to as inaccurate or untrue. If the committee be required to report the facts, the correctness of this statement would be tested. This would be doing justice to its author and to the objectors. Then the public mind, which is feverish with continued excitement on questions of a disputed character, would be tranquillized and settled on one at least. Continual talking on the subject would no more settle this question than it had settled those which the committee were ordered to inquire about. True, the committee cannot, perhaps, report the intentions of those who were the principal actors in the scene. He had understood these intentions, in whole or in part, had been already communicated to the House. He presumed those who had gone largely into details did not intentionally give more than what was recollected; and he would say that he had not yet heard it alleged by any one that Mr. Whitney's account had been amplified beyond the truth, except in a single word in the relation of what he said after he returned to the committee. He should not express any personal wish as to the disposition of this matter. If its importance entitled it to the consideration of the House, he thought the same reasons would impel us to seek the undisputed truth, and place it before the public; and by that let those who have made statements be judged.

This endorsing or denying the allegations of others was what he did not intend to do. The matter affirmed to be true or untrue might be misreported, and the affirmation be made to cover statements never intended to be vouched for or denied. From differences in recollection new controversies might arise, giving birth to feelings not to be designedly promoted by this House, and not productive of good anywhere. Thus far, he understood, the statements of facts had been mingled with much other matter not well calculated to enable others to understand them. If the committee should report the facts, they would not be interspersed with biting and criminating epithets heaped upon the witness, having nothing to do with what transpired in the committee room. He thought the true way of arriving at the truth was to call for it in an authentic form, and then the House could judge where the blame ought to rest. This he thought due to all parties, and could not fairly be objected to by any one. He therefore would send to the Speaker the resolution which he had read, and ask the House to adopt it.

[This motion, the reception of it being objected to, was not in order at this time.]

Mr. Wise then again rose to conclude his remarks, which he had not finished before Mr. GILLET rose. He said: Sir, in continuation of my statement, I have to remark that my friend from Tennessee is pardonable for much he said and did on that occasion. He spoke many harsh words, but under the strongest excitement. We both looked upon Reuben M. Whitney as a base minion of executive power, who went there with a pre-determination to insult us. He came, backed and endorsed, and prompted by the highest authority, to brow-beat and taunt us, and to trample upon the power of a committee constitutionally raised by the representatives of the people to detect and expose his villanous connection with the executive branch of the Government. My friend regarded the wretch as a mere agent, a miserable tool of others—others the highest in power. It was too much, sir, to suffer his authorized insults. My friend did not treat him as an equal; but he was transported with passion at his insolence and effrontery. He did and said many things which became not himself, but which Whitney richly deserved. As soon as he became calm and cool, he apologized to the committee in the most respectful terms.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GILLET) says that "many things which Whitney says are true." I repeat, sir, that no part or parcel, jot or tittle, of his statement, except the question and answer, is true; it is wholly false in matter and manner; in fact, and coloring, and context—emphatically false—false in italics! His statement as to his apology when he returned to the committee, I venture to say, no member of the committee will vouch; and that he makes especially a marked statement by words in italics. In this he is wilfully and brazenly false; and no member on the committee can endorse his statement. The gentleman from New York (Mr. GILLET) says he will not undertake here to make a statement. Sir, I care not whether he does or not. I have my statement confirmed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. GARLAND,) and that is all I want. It may be, sir—I do not say it is so—but it may be likely, that some gentleman who was present so lost his wits on the occasion that he could not make a statement if he were to try! Now, it is proposed to couple the name of my friend in a resolution with that of R. M. Whitney.

I hope, sir, the House will not so degrade my friend, by the association even of names. What! couple the name of a villain, pensioned for his perjury, with the name of BALIE PEYTON, in the same resolution! Sir, if you had been present and witnessed the scene of that night, you would have been struck with the immense difference between the two men. I will tell you what you would have seen: you would have seen the high elevation of an honest, bold, courageous, manly, noble disposition, above a low, base, cowering, cowardly, dishonest wretch! That, sir, was the only spectacle you would have seen. And I say, sir, let those of the two classes of spirits then present be respectively consorted together and assimilated to each other!

MR. HAMER (a member of the committee) said that he should not detain the House with any remarks of his, were it not for an observation that fell from the gentleman from Tennessee, (MR. PEYTON,) and had been repeated by the gentleman from Virginia who last occupied the floor, (MR. WISE.) They had stated that the gentleman from Virginia had notified the members of the committee, that when this subject came before the House, he would call upon them to pronounce Mr. Whitney's card false in every part, except so much as related to the proceedings of the committee. If he (MR. H.) now remained silent, after what had occurred, it might be inferred that he had borne testimony to the falsehood so charged. He did not intend that any such inference should be drawn. He agreed with the gentleman from New York, (MR. GILLET,) that no nine individuals who might be present at an affair of this kind could be found, who would afterwards state all the details alike; and at this time he would not go into details. As to Mr. Whitney's "card," he would neither pronounce it true nor false. He had, as he stated in conversation with the gentleman from Virginia the other day, read it but hastily, when it first appeared; and he had not taken the trouble to look at it since. But, as he was up, he would say that, without going into particulars, the outlines of the transaction, as given by the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Virginia, were substantially correct.

He thought it due to himself to state what had been his own course in the matter. When the excitement took place, and the honorable chairman called "order," he (MR. H.) rose and commenced making a speech, the object of which was to aid the chairman in producing order out of disorder. He had continued upon the floor, occasionally interrupted by other gentlemen, until he closed his remarks by submitting the resolution which was unanimously adopted by the committee. He thought the resolution due to the committee, due to the individual member involved, and due to the witness himself, who had in some measure provoked what followed.

His (MR. H.'s) opinion was, that a witness called before a committee, having an interrogatory propounded to him, ought either to answer or to decline. If he declined answering a question, that was enough. He had no right to proceed further, and make remarks about the committee, or an individual member of it, which were of a personal character, or which reflected upon them in any manner disrespectfully. Such a practice could not be tolerated, and the committee were unanimously of that opinion.

After this sudden gust of passion, this momentary excitement, the gentleman from Tennessee expressed his regret, and apologized to the committee for what had taken place on his part. The witness was called back, and apologized to the committee for any thing he had done of a disrespectful character. He (MR. H.) had hoped the whole matter would have remained there; but it seemed that by some means it had got out, and was travelling through the country in the newspapers. False and exaggerated statements, in regard to it, were no doubt circulated in public journals; and although he deprecated all discussions of this sort, yet he thought the gentleman from Tennessee perfectly justifiable in bringing the subject before the House, for the purpose of making a statement in his own defence.

Having said thus much, he would trouble the House no further.

MONDAY, February 6.

Presidential Election—Counting the Votes.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House of its concurrence in the report of the joint committee appointed to consider and report upon the mode of counting out the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

MR. THOMAS moved that the House concur with the Senate in the report and resolutions thereto appended, as reported by him to this House on Saturday evening, as follows:

"The committee on the part of the House of Representatives, 'appointed to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States; of notifying the persons elected of their election; and also to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the constitution; and, if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any and what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance in future of that section of the constitution,' report:

"That the short period at which they were appointed before the day on which the votes for President and Vice President of the United States have to be counted, has prevented them from investigating the acts submitted to their examination as fully as might have been done, had more time been allowed.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The correspondence which has taken place between the chairman of the committee and the heads of the different departments of the executive branch of the Government accompanies this report, from which it appears that Isaac Waldron, who was an elector in New Hampshire, was, at the time of his appointment as elector, president of a deposit bank at Portsmouth, and was appointed and acting as pension agent, without compensation, under the authority of the United States; that, in two cases, persons of the same names with the individuals who were appointed and voted as electors in the State of North Carolina, held the offices of deputy postmasters under the General Government. It also appears that in New Hampshire there is one case; in Connecticut there is one case; in North Carolina there is one case; in which, from the report of the Postmaster General, it is probable that, at the time of appointment of electors in these States, respectively, the electors, or persons of the same names, were deputy postmasters. The committee have not ascertained whether the electors are the same individuals who held, or are presumed to have held, the offices of deputy postmasters at the time when the appointment of electors was made; and this is the less to be regretted, as it is confidently believed that no change in the result of the election of either the President or Vice President would be affected by the ascertainment of the fact in either way, as five or six votes only would in any event be abstracted from the whole number; for the committee cannot adopt the opinion entertained by some, that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases where the vote of the whole college has been given for the same persons.

"The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the constitution, which declares that 'no Senator, or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector,' ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice President of the United States. This provision of the constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments; and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster, after his appointment as elector, would not entitle him to vote as elector under the constitution.

"Should a case occur in which it became necessary to ascertain and determine upon the qualifications of electors of President and Vice President of the United States, the important question would be presented—what tribunal would, under the constitution, be competent to decide? Whether the respective colleges of electors in the different States should decide upon the qualifications of their own members, or Congress should exercise the power, is a question which the committee are of opinion ought to be settled by a permanent provision upon the subject.

"The committee at present, and in part, report the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

"Resolved, That, in relation to the vote of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A B for President of the United States, ——— votes; if not counted for A B for President of the United States, ——— votes; but, in either event, A B is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice President."

Mr. MERCER was understood to make an inquiry of the chairman (Mr. THOMAS) in relation to the fact, whether any votes have been given by persons not competent, under the Constitution of the United States, to vote as electors of President and Vice President.

Mr. THOMAS said a few words in explanation. The committee, on investigation, had found that there were three individuals in North Carolina, one in New Hampshire, and one in Connecticut, elected to the electoral college, who bore the same name with those of individuals who were deputy postmasters under the General Government; and the impression on the minds of the committee was, that they were consequently the same individuals.

The resolutions were then severally concurred in without a division.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia—Petitions from the Females of Twenty-eight Towns in New Hampshire.

Petitions and memorials being called for in the order of States and Territories,

Mr. CUSHING said he was charged with a commission of some delicacy, respecting which he craved the indulgence of the House. It happened that in his district the fair sex greatly outnumbered the other, and the better half of creation was no half at all; it was two-thirds; so that he was probably the immediate representative of more ladies than any other member of the House. In obedience to the wishes of his fair constituents, whom it was at all times his pleasure to serve, he had to present petitions praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia, from 3,824 ladies of the city of Lowell and the towns of Amesbury, Andover, Haverhill, Newburyport, Reading, and Salisbury, in the State of Massachusetts.

These petitions were accordingly received and laid on the table, without debate or commitment, under the resolution of the House.

Mr. C. said he had now to beg pardon of the gentleman from New Hampshire, his nearest neighbor at home, (Mr. CUSHMAN,) for appearing to interfere in any way with that gentleman's concerns. He (Mr. CUSHING) was not aware that the ladies of New Hampshire had any general objection to the propounding of the previous question; but, on this occasion, they had distinguished him with their preference, so far as to desire to make him their organ in their communications to the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN signified his acquiescence, and

Mr. CUSHING proceeded to present petitions from the ladies of Alstead, Bedford, Boscawen, Canaan, Concord, Durham, Franconia, Gilmanton, Groton, Hampton Falls, Hanover, Haverhill, Hebron, Henniker, Hillsborough, Keene, Lancaster, Lincoln, Lyndeborough, Madbury, Mount Vernon, New Hampton, New Market, Orange, Raymond, Salem, and Salisbury, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia; which petitions were severally received and laid on the table, under the resolution of the House.

Suppression of the Slave-Trade in the District of Columbia—Petition from "Nine Ladies" of Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Mr. ADAMS said he presented the petition of nine ladies of Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia. He would not name them, because, from the disposition which at present prevailed in the country, he did not know what might happen to them if he did name them. It was not a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, but it was a petition praying Congress to put a stop to the slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

This was one of those petitions which had seemed so strange to him when he received it, that he did not feel a perfect security that it was genuine, and to which he had alluded when he first began the presentation of his petitions. It was sent to him, purporting to be the petition of nine ladies, not one of whom should be named by him. Whether it was genuine or not, it was not for him to determine.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, under the resolution.

Petition from 22 Slaves.

Mr. ADAMS said he held in his hand a paper on which, before it was presented, he desired to have the decision of the Speaker. It was a petition from twenty-two persons, declaring themselves to be slaves. He wished to know whether the Speaker considered such a petition as coming within the order of the House.

The SPEAKER said he could not tell until he had the contents of the petition in his possession.

Mr. ADAMS said that if the paper was sent to the Clerk's table, it would be in possession of the House, and if sent to the Speaker he would see what were its contents. Now, he (Mr. A.) wished to do nothing except in submission to the rules of the House. This paper purported to come from slaves, and it was one of those petitions which had occurred to his mind as not being what it purported to be. It was signed partly by persons who could not write, by making their marks, and partly by persons whose handwriting would manifest that they had received the education of slaves; and the petition declared itself to be from slaves, and he was requested to present it. He would send it to the Chair.

Mr. LAWLER objected to its going to the Chair.

The SPEAKER said that the circumstances of the case were so extraordinary, that he would take the sense of the House on the course to be pursued.

Mr. LAWLER wished it to appear on the journal that he had objected to the paper going to the Chair.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Massachusetts had stated that the petition came from slaves; but it had not been sent to the Clerk's table. It was the first time, in the recollection of the Chair, that persons not free had presented a petition to this House. The Chair wished to take the sense of the House, which he had a right to do.

Mr. HAYNES felt astonished at the course which had been pursued by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, not only to-day, but every day for some time past, whenever petitions were presented; but his astonishment reached to a height which he felt it impossible to express, when he saw the gentleman rise in his place on this floor, and offer to present such a paper as this had been described to be. Mr. H. could not tell in what manner he would meet a proposition of this kind. It might be giving it more attention than it deserved, if he (Mr. H.) were to object to receiving it. He had risen mainly to express, so far as language could express, his unfeigned surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman, should ever have made a question on a paper of this kind.

Mr. ADAMS called the gentleman from Georgia to order, on the ground that he was making personal reflections.

Mr. PINCKNEY was opposed to a protracted discussion on the subject, which could only lead to useless excitement and confusion, the matter before the House being a subject for action, not for debate. He hoped the House would act promptly and decisively.

Mr. HAYNES inquired of the Chair if he did not still hold the floor.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Georgia held the floor, but it was not in order to make personal allusions.

Mr. HAYNES said the Speaker was aware that he was one of the last men to violate the rules adopted for the order and government of the House. It was well known that, from the commencement of these discussions, at an early day in the last session of Congress up to this moment, his lips had been closed on the subject in every form; because he had thought that the members from his section of the country should be among the last to seek or promote discussion upon it. But he would not trust his feelings to pursue the subject further under its present aspect, extraordinary as it was. The true motion, in his judgment, would be to move that the petition be rejected, subject, however, to its withdrawal, if the House should become further enlightened as to its contents.

Abolition of Slavery.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. LEWIS hoped that no motion of that kind would come from any gentleman from a slaveholding section of the country.

Mr. HAYNES would cheerfully withdraw his motion.

Mr. LEWIS was glad the motion was withdrawn. He believed that the House should punish severely such an infraction of its decorum and its rules; and he called on the members from the slaveholding States to come forward now, and demand from the House the punishment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GRANTLAND would second the motion, and go all lengths in support of it.

Mr. LEWIS said that, if the House would inflict no punishment for such flagrant violations of its dignity as this, it would be better for the Representatives from the slaveholding States to go home at once.

Mr. ALFORD inquired if the gentleman from Massachusetts had certainly proposed to introduce this petition.

The SPEAKER said the member from Massachusetts had risen, and stated that he had a petition coming from slaves, and had inquired of the Chair whether it would come under the order adopted by the House in reference to all petitions and papers on the subject of slavery.

The Clerk having been directed to read the minutes which he had taken at the time, read as follows:

"Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of twenty-two persons, declaring themselves to be slaves, and wished to know whether it came within the order of the House."

Mr. ALFORD said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts intended to present this petition, he, (Mr. ALFORD,) the moment it was presented, should move, as an act of justice to the South, which he in part represented, and which he conceived had been treated with indignity, that it be taken from the House and burnt; and he hoped that every man who was a friend to the constitution would support him. There must be an end to this constant attempt to raise excitement, or the Union could not exist much longer. The moment any man should disgrace the Government under which he lived, by presenting a petition from slaves praying for emancipation, he hoped that petition would, by order of the House, be committed to the flames.

Mr. PATTON moved to suspend the rule to enable him to submit a motion to take from the table, to be hereafter disposed of as the House may decide, the paper already presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and which had been laid on the table under the resolution of the House; he alluded to the paper presented as a petition from nine ladies of Fredericksburg. He (Mr. P.) would state in his place, and on his responsibility, that the name of no lady was attached to that paper. He did not believe there was a single one of them of decent respectability. He believed the signatures to be genuine, and he recognized only one name which he had known before, and that was the name of a free mulatto woman of the worst fame and reputation. He had been raised in Fredericksburg, and believed he was acquainted with all persons of respectability residing there, and he could say there was not one respectable name attached to this paper.

Mr. W. THOMPSON asked that the petition might be read, so as to render the gentleman from Massachusetts amenable to the resolution which he (Mr. T.) proposed to offer.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order at this time.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 131, nays 50.

So the rule was suspended.

Mr. PATTON said he was disposed to pursue as kind and respectful a course to the gentleman from Massachusetts as the circumstances of the case would admit, so far as related to the particular question before the House.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, before presenting this petition, had stated that he did not know who these individuals were; he did not know their claims to the consideration of this House, or to his own agency in presenting the petition. Mr. P. thought it was to be regretted that the gentleman from Massachusetts had not thought proper, but, on the contrary, had refused, to permit him, (Mr. P.,) coming from the town from which this paper purported to come, on a subject which the gentleman knew the people whom he (Mr. P.) represented, as well as himself, felt a deep and exciting interest, to see the paper before it had been presented. He (Mr. P.) could not permit himself to believe that, after stating to him, as he (Mr. P.) would have stated privately, what he had since stated publicly, the gentleman from Massachusetts would have persisted in being the organ through whom such a petition should be presented. He (Mr. P.) would again state, on his honor and veracity as a man, that he did not believe that there was the signature of any decently respectable individual in Fredericksburg attached to this paper; that the only name he recognized was that of a mulatto free woman of infamous character; and he believed that the names of others were the names of free negroes, all of whom he believed to be bad. He therefore moved that the paper which had been received and laid on the table should be taken from the table and returned to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOULDIN said that, as he had just voted against suspending the rules on the motion of his colleague, (Mr. PATTON,) and had found himself voting with those who, from their local situation, might be supposed not to feel with him on the very delicate and vital subject now before the House, and as his name had not been recorded with the names of those with whom he knew he did feel and act substantially in every important matter peculiar to the South, and especially in regard to the subject-matter now before the House, it became him to give the reason for his vote. It was this: He wished to dispose of the first branch of the subject, and then he would be willing to suspend the rules for his colleague, and would be willing to go with him in any vote to take from our files the paper he wished withdrawn, and which was well calculated to throw disgrace and contempt on the proceedings of the House. He was willing the resolution and wish of his colleague should prevail, and that the paper should be returned to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, to make what mischief he could or he chose from it, in or out of this House.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts had offered in the House the memorial of those who, on the face of it, appeared to be slaves, and had announced to the Chair and to the House that such was the paper.

Mr. B. said he did not care a rush whether the paper went to the Chair or not. Nothing that that gentleman could say or do in relation to it could add to, or detract from, the impression that the statement of the proposition to the Chair by him had made. He (Mr. B.) wished now, without interruption of any other business, to progress with this matter until he saw and understood what countenance the gentleman from Massachusetts should receive from the House.

Mr. W. THOMPSON had risen to move, as an amendment to the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON,) the following resolution:

Resolved, That the honorable JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, by the attempt just made by him to introduce a petition purporting on its face to be from slaves, has been guilty of a gross disrespect to this House, and that he be instantly brought to the bar to receive the severe censure of the Speaker.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said: The gentleman from Massachusetts offered to present a petition from slaves, and so purporting to be on its face, in open and wilful violation of what he knew to be the rules of this House, and insulting to a large portion of its members. Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the House and the feelings of its members. Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave States, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as grand juries; and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment. Mr. T. said that, when he first took his seat here, and heard daily denunciations of the people whom he represented, and every vile epithet heaped upon them—a people for whom he claimed, to say the very least, the proudest equality—he was excited almost to the point of frenzy. Now he found himself sitting quietly under these things, when he saw his new colleagues, not more excitable than he was, in the same state of feeling in which he was at the last session. Sir, it is a most instructive commentary upon the gradual wear and tear of feeling, and the cooling of that just indignation which every Southern man should feel. Sir, if I desired the breaking up of this Government, I should thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his course on this subject. All we desire, sir, is an issue, a fair and distinct issue. If gentlemen think slavery an abomination, and that they have a right to abolish it, why not come up to the point, and say so? I will forgive them for all the past if they will do it. We shall then, sir, soon, very soon, settle this question forever.

Mr. HAYNES said that, believing the object of the gentleman from South Carolina might be more readily obtained by a resolution in a different form, he would send to the table the following amendment:

Strike out all after "Resolved," and insert—

"That JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, has rendered himself justly liable to the severest censure of this House, and is censured accordingly, for having attempted to present to the House the petition of slaves."

Mr. GRANGER said this was a question of extreme delicacy, and one which he hoped would not be closed by the previous question. His honorable friend from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) knew that no man in this House had more sincerely stood by him on the right of petition than he (Mr. G.) had. But he (Mr. G.) must express his surprise that, with papers in his hand from sources of which he was ignorant, and of the genuineness of which he has expressed a doubt, he (Mr. ADAMS) should have assumed the responsibility he had this day assumed. He (Mr. G.) was surprised that that gentleman, holding the right of petition as one of the most sacred rights granted to this people, should ever have cheapened the value of that right, by presenting indiscriminately papers enclosed to him, (Mr. ADAMS,) when he was himself ignorant of the names, condition, or characters, of those who forwarded them. He was the more surprised that a paper from this immediate vicinity, and purporting to bear the signatures of those who are represented by a gentleman (Mr. PATTON) sitting on the left of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and with whom that gentleman was on intimate terms, should have been presented to this House without some inquiry having been made as to the character of those whose names were attached to the petition, or without the gentleman (Mr. ADAMS) being possessed of, or having guarded himself by, the requisite information in relation to the petition he was about to present. It was well known that no man here deprecated more than he (Mr. G.) did the decision of the Chair in tying down members of the House under the resolution of the last and the present year.

Abolition of Slavery.

This question, as now presented, was one of deep interest. He felt bound to say that a certain class of the community were too ready to change their ground, and to hide their opinions on the abolition of slavery under the denial of the right of petition. He had in his mind men, not ordinary men, who, feeling that this right has been unjustly abridged, have enlisted themselves in a cause in which they would never otherwise have engaged; men who, only one year ago, were as much opposed to the abolition of slavery as any man in this House, but who are now found within its ranks. These, he said, were not ordinary citizens, but those who stood forth to the community in that enviable relief which talent gives to virtue. It was not to be disguised, and he felt bound to declare, that, if the House wished to forward the cause of abolition, they would pass these hasty resolutions. No man in this nation held the right of petition under the constitution more sacred than he did; but it was due to himself to repeat, what he had heretofore stated, that so long as the States of Maryland and Virginia should continue their present policy, he did not believe that Congress had any just power to interfere in this question, nor that either philanthropy or patriotism demanded it; that in his opinion, at the time of the session of this District, it was no more contemplated that slavery should be abolished here before it was in the surrounding country, than that this territory should continue in its present position after the adjoining States by which it had been ceded should have changed theirs. But he would say to the gentlemen from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) and from Georgia (Mr. HAYNES) that, if this resolution was pushed to a vote of censure, its effect on the community would be most serious.

Mr. LEWIS offered the following amendment, which he suggested to his friend from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) to accept as a modification:

Resolved, That JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member from the State of Massachusetts, by his attempt to introduce into this House a petition from slaves, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, committed an outrage on the rights and feelings of a large portion of the people of this Union; a flagrant contempt on the dignity of this House; and, by extending to slaves a privilege only belonging to free-men, directly invites the slave population to insurrection; and that the said member be forthwith called to the bar of the House, and be censured by the Speaker.

Mr. W. THOMPSON accepted the modification.

Mr. LEWIS, as a member from the South, was not disposed to argue this question here. He wished to see whether there was the power or the will to discountenance such proceedings as these. If not, the members from the South had better go home and prepare to protect themselves.

Mr. PATTON thought the House was proceeding rather harshly in this matter. The resolution asserted two facts: First, that the paper was a petition by slaves for the abolition of slavery. Was that the fact? Was any gentleman here authorized to state that this was a paper for the abolition of slavery? It was essentially important, before the House was called on to act, that they should know whether this was the fact or not. The resolution asserted also another fact: that the gentleman from Massachusetts attempted to offer this petition. He (Mr. P.) understood that this was not the fact. He thought he should be disposed to go as far as those who would go farthest in adopting any proper course for arresting these attempts to procure the action of the House in relation to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or anywhere else. He should be ready to go to the utmost extent of his constitutional powers to arrest that action, either by the legislative intervention of the House, in its ordinary course, or by refusing to receive the petitions, or by inflicting censure on members transgressing the bounds of their duty to keep up an excitement on the subject. But let us know (said Mr. P.) what we are doing. Suppose that this petition was a quiz; and that, so far from being a petition for the abolition of slavery, it was a petition for a very different thing. Mr. P. would object as much to the one proposition being presented here as the other. But let the House, before it involved itself in this solemn proceeding, before it took this decided and hazardous step of bringing to the bar of the House a member of its body, as having violated its rights, know on what grounds they were proceeding.

Were the facts as they were stated to be? Had any such petition been presented or offered by a member of the House? He regretted to be involved in this excitement on grounds which might turn out to be more of a farce than a tragedy. He expected it would be found that neither the one fact nor the other, assumed in the resolution, was true.

Mr. ADAMS then rose and said he did not know under what rule of the House the several resolutions which had been presented in relation to himself had taken the place of the resolution or motion submitted by his friend from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON), nor how it had happened that this matter had come under the consideration of the House, whilst a question was pending whether a paper previously presented by him (Mr. A.) should be taken from the Speaker's table and returned to him. The Speaker, he presumed, knew how this had come about.

The SPEAKER explained that this had been effected under the operations of that well-established parliamentary law, which gave precedence to questions of privilege over all other business.

MR. ADAMS. Well, sir, I am satisfied.

In regard to the resolutions now before the House, as they all concur in naming me, and in charging me with high crimes and misdemeanors, and in calling me to the bar of the House to answer for my crimes, I have thought it was my duty to remain silent until it should be the pleasure of the House to act either on one or other of these resolutions. I suppose that, if I shall be brought to the bar of the House, I shall not be struck mute by the previous question, before I have an opportunity to say a word or two in my own defence.

But, sir, gentlemen are really consuming the time of the House in such a manner, that I think the obligation rests upon me to ask them to modify their resolution. It may be as severe as they propose; but I ask them to change the matter of fact a little, so that when I come to the bar, I may not, in one single word, put an end to their resolution.

The gentlemen, who have such a laudable zeal for the slaveholding portion of this confederacy, and I do not censure them for that zeal, charge upon me, first, that I attempted to present a petition from slaves; and, secondly, that that petition was for their emancipation from slavery. I did not present the petition, and I appeal to the Speaker to say that I did not. I said I had a paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves; I did not say what the prayer of the petition was; I said it was a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, signed partly by crosses for signatures, and partly by letters, scarcely legible, purporting to be names. I asked the Speaker whether he considered such a paper as included within the general order of the House, that all petitions, memorials, resolutions, and papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, should be laid on the table. I intended to take the decision of the Speaker before I went one step towards presenting, or offering to present, that petition. I stated distinctly to the Speaker that I should not send the paper to the table until the question was decided, whether a paper from persons declaring themselves slaves was included within the order of the House. This is the fact.

Now, as to the fact what the petition was for. I simply state to the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis,) who has sent to the table a resolution assuming that this petition was for the abolition of slavery; I state to him that he is mistaken. He must amend his resolution; for, if the House should choose to read the petition, I can state to them they would find it something very much the reverse of that which the resolution states it to be; and if the gentleman from Alabama still shall choose to bring me to the bar of the House, he must amend his resolution in a very important particular; for he probably may have to put into it, that my crime has been for attempting to introduce the petition of slaves that slavery should not be abolished. This is possible, sir. I say, then, the gentleman must amend his resolution; and I take it for granted that he and the House will be under the necessity of seeing what that petition is, and that they must not take it even from my representation. This representation I am perfectly willing to make, if the House shall think fit that the petition should be received and considered; and I shall be willing to do almost any thing, except to grant the prayer of the petition; for the gentleman from Alabama may, perchance, find that the object of the petition is precisely that which he desires to accomplish; and that these slaves, who have sent this paper to me, are his auxiliaries, instead of being his opponents. I state these facts for the consideration of the House. I shall not present the petition until the decision of the House has been announced; and I am disposed to be perfectly submissive to that decision, whatever it may be.

MR. MANN, of New York, said that the future historian, when arriving at the transactions of the twenty-fourth Congress, would find it requisite to pause and contemplate the spectacle now before us and the American people. He will be at fault to discover the cause for the scenes now presented; and, contemplating the nature of our political institutions, tracing their formation and establishment, he will find nothing which would necessarily produce or justify the course of proceedings which have occurred here for the last and present sitting of Congress. Sir, (said Mr. M.) why is it, then, that we are weekly, and almost daily, drawn into the consideration of abstract, impracticable, and (Mr. M. said he must be permitted to say) improper, if not reprehensible subjects, by the course adopted by the venerable member from Massachusetts? (Mr. ADAMS.) Is it from any defect in the forms or principles of our proceedings? Is it inherent in the compact upon which rests all that is valuable in our institutions? Is it to be found and justified in the condition and circumstances of our country? Can it be traced to a want of patriotic devotion in any considerable portion of our country to the Union? Would it be charitable to attribute it to any disappointment of individual ambition, seeking revenge for such disappointments in attempting to ruin that which it could not rule?

On no one of these inquiries, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. M.) can we find a satisfactory solution of the question why we are now presenting to the country the deplorable spectacle,

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Abolition of Slavery.

[H. OF R.]

shown off every petition day, by the honorable member from Massachusetts, in presenting the abolition petitions of his infatuated friends and constituents. The House has, with a unanimity almost unparalleled, prescribed a rule for its government in respect to these petitions, with which it is, upon experience, as well (Mr. M. ventured the opinion) as the considerate men of all parties, in every portion of the confederacy, well satisfied. Yet the honorable member has made himself to believe that it was his duty, against the sense of the whole House, (Mr. M. believed, with but few exceptions,) against the sense of the whole country, including his own political friends, (if any he has,) to resist the execution of that rule with a degree of violence paralleled only by revolutionary madness of desperation. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) it becomes me, the House, and the country, to remember that the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts has occupied the executive chair, and administered the duties of the highest office of the civilized world. And it becomes us, also, to respect his gray hairs, his old age, his long public services, and to seek out apologies and excuses in his behalf, if possible, for the obstinacy and ebullitions of temper which on these occasions he so often exhibits, and which is so much opposed to cool deliberation and the dignity of the proceedings of this House. Thus shielded and protected by his age and public character, it has been matter of surprise to those who are not spectators of our proceedings, that a member of his great learning and experience should so far forget his dignity as to presume upon that age and character as a license to him to annoy and trifle with the House and its most solemn and satisfactory regulations.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) while we contemplate the character and respect the age of the honorable member, charity claims that we should also remember the frailty of our nature, and that man is mortal. It would be unjust to believe that, in the prime and vigor of manhood, the honorable member would have adopted the course of action which, at this late period of his life, seems to control him. The high noon-tide of that life has long since passed with him, and its wane is no doubt upon him, before he is either aware or sensible of it; for it cannot be believed that, in the days of his more acute perceptions, he could have yielded to influences which now seem to have the mastery.

Mr. M. had always viewed this question of abolition and its progress with the deepest solicitude, as affecting the political integrity of the confederacy. In the formation of this Union it was, as we well know, one of the greatest obstacles to be overcome, and was only surmounted by a spirit of concession and compromise which it is feared does not exist now. In that compromise, we of the free States agreed to the doctrine of non-interference in the domestic institutions and concerns of the others. Some few of our people, however, pretending to a holy zeal, worthy of a better and more lawful cause, influenced by what they claim to be paramount considerations to the obligations of the constitution and the integrity of the republic, regardless of consequences, insidiously violate the spirit of the compact, by interfering with the subject in this District. And we are now again called upon by our Southern brethren to know whether we will live up to the agreement we have made; whether we will keep the faith and perform our bargain. This is the true question propounded to us in all these proceedings. And, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. M.,) as for me and my household, my constituents and friends, I say, without reservation, we will. Is there a patriotic heart in this hall, in this nation, is there a friend to the welfare of the republic, who can answer that he will not? Mr. M. did not believe there was one; and he therefore asked that honorable members from the South should give themselves no uneasiness on account of these ill-advised proceedings. Mr. M. relied upon the patriotism and good faith of the people of the North to abide by the compact they have made. He knew that this reliance would not fail.

Mr. W. THOMPSON was sorry to see the air of levity which it is attempted to throw over this matter. He felt very differently. What, sir, is it a mere trifle to hoax, to trifle with the members from the South in this way and on this subject? Is it a light thing, for the amusement of others, to irritate, almost to madness, the whole delegation from the slave States? Sir, it is an aggravation. It is intimated that the petition does not pray for the abolition of slavery, but a very different object. It makes not the slightest difference; it is the attempt to introduce a petition from slaves for any object; as insolent if it be for one purpose as for another. It is the naked fact of the presentation of a petition from slaves. But, sir, there is another view of this matter, which, in my judgment, makes the thing worse. The gentleman from Massachusetts had been presenting abolition petitions all the morning; it is his daily labor of love; and I appeal to every member on the floor, if the conduct of the member was not such as to induce every one to believe that it was an abolition petition. He allowed resolutions to be presented on that supposition, and speeches to be made, without undeceiving the House. This trifling was an additional contempt of the House; how much befitting the age and standing of the gentleman it is not for me to say.

Mr. T. then further modified his resolution by substituting the three following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the honorable JOHN Q. ADAMS, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this House.

2. Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts above named, by creating the impression and leaving the House under such impression, that the said petition was for the abolition of slavery, when he knew that it was not, has trifled with the House.

3. Resolved, That the honorable JOHN Q. ADAMS receive the censure of the House for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions.

MR. PICKENS observed that it had not been his intention to address the House upon this subject; he had not intended to utter one word, if it had not been for the remarks that fell from his friend from Virginia, (MR. WISE,) and that he would now endeavor to preserve all the calmness he could, considering the momentous topics which had been drawn into this discussion. MR. P. perfectly agreed with the gentleman from Virginia (MR. WISE) in reference to the resolutions which the member from Charleston (MR. PINCKNEY) introduced last session, and which had been substantially adopted again at this session, by which all this class of petitions had been received into this House. They were miserable and pitiful resolutions; pitiful, because they had trifled with the rights of the South, and trifled with the rights of this House. He could thank God that he had nothing to do with their passage, and the deep responsibility they had brought down upon their authors. He would say, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, (MR. GRANGER,) in censure of the gentlemen from the South who supported those resolutions, "Thou canst not say I did it." When those resolutions passed, he (MR. P.) predicted what had now come to pass: the scenes which we now see passing around us—the introduction of all kinds of vile petitions from free negroes and slaves, which, under the resolutions, are treated with the respect, in advance, of having them received and laid upon the table. But (said MR. P.) although these were his opinions, yet, as long as we were members of this body, we were bound to maintain its dignity, and do what we could to prevent scenes calculated to harass and insult the feelings of a large portion of the members of this House, by calling down our censure upon the gentleman from Massachusetts (MR. ADAMS) for his wanton attempt to introduce the rights of slaves upon this floor, and by avowing he held a paper in his pocket purporting to be a petition from slaves, signed by twenty-two. MR. P. said this admitted that he had communication with slaves, and was evidence, in law, of collusion. It broke down the principle that the slave could only be known through his master. For this he was indictable, under statute, for aiding and abetting insurrection; and for such conduct is he not amenable to the censure of this House? The privilege of speech protected a member from being questioned before any other tribunal, but does not exempt him from being questioned before this House.

MR. CAMBRELENG observed that he was not among the number of those who despaired of the safety of the Union, let the hurricane come from what quarter it would—from the North or from the South. There was sufficient virtue and power among a large population, in every quarter of the Union, to keep the two extremes from breaking down the pillars of the confederacy, whether threatened with fanaticism on the one hand, or insurrection on the other. This was the first time he (MR. C.) had ever risen to speak upon this subject; he had felt as gentlemen from the South, when the honorable member from Alabama (MR. LEWIS) presented his resolution; he felt, that great as the sacrifice was to bring to the bar of this House one who had occupied the highest station on earth, as President of the United States, yet thought that it ought to be made. But now, after having heard the explanation of the honorable gentleman, (MR. ADAMS,) he viewed the subject altogether in a different light. It appeared to him that that gentleman (MR. ADAMS) had been hoaxed by some young men in Fredericksburg. The two gentlemen from South Carolina (MR. PICKENS and MR. THOMPSON) must pardon him for attaching less importance to this whole affair as it now stood, and if he could not treat it with the same solemnity. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts had evidently been not only hoaxed in regard to the Fredericksburg petition, but insulted in the very petition for making the inquiry about which he was now arraigned before the House. The contents of the petition were known in this House before the gentleman from Massachusetts announced them. It was manifestly designed to make him appear ridiculous, by presenting a petition praying for his own expulsion. It came from a slaveholding quarter, and was no doubt designed to insult him for presenting so frequently abolition petitions.

MR. PINCKNEY said that, from the peculiar position in which he stood in relation to this question, he was constrained to throw himself upon the indulgence of the House. He concurred entirely with the gentleman from Alabama, (MR. LEWIS,) that this subject ought not to be discussed by Southern members. Opposed, as he always was, to the agitation of the subject of slavery on that floor, he was decidedly of opinion that now, more than ever, under the extraordinary circumstances of the present case, no Southern delegate should have said a word. The decision of the question should have been left entirely to the members from the non-slaveholding portions of the Union. He was sure that, if the decision was left to them, without any of that excited debate which always injures a cause, however intrinsically good, the enlightened patriotism and liberal feeling of the members from the non-slaveholding States would have done all that was necessary either to satisfy the injured feelings of the South, or to maintain the order and dignity of that honorable House, both of which had been outraged by the extraordinary conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (MR. ADAMS,) against whom resolutions of censure had been moved. But, instead of simply demanding the action of the House upon this matter, and having the seal of its reprobation placed instantly and promptly upon the indignity that had been offered both to the South and to the House, member after member had risen, speech after speech had been made, resolution upon resolution had been offered, by Southern members, until excitement had risen to the very highest pitch; and, now, what was the consequence? Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that, if the gentlemen who have moved these resolutions wish to have him censured by the House, they must modify their resolutions, by striking out all that relates to the abolition of slavery; for the petition which had caused all this excitement not only does not pray for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, but prays for directly the reverse, and even denounces him (Mr. ADAMS) for intermeddling with the subject. It seems, then, said Mr. P., that the petition which the gentleman offered to present is not a petition in point of fact; that it is nothing more than a quiz, or hoax, which has been played off upon the gentleman himself; and that, probably, in retaliation for the joke practised on himself, he determined to carry it still further, by playing it off upon the House. But whether the petition was genuine or not; whether it prayed for the abolition of slavery, or the expulsion of the gentleman himself; and whether the gentleman was in jest or earnest, his conduct was unquestionably reprehensible, and such as ought to be visited with the severest censure of the House. If the petition was genuine, it was an indignity to the House to have offered to present it, purporting, as it did, to come from slaves. Does not the gentleman know that the right of petition only attaches to the free white people of the Union, and that slaves can only be heard in a legislative body through the agency of their owners? But if the petition was a hoax, then the conduct of the gentleman was still more unjustifiable. It was adding insult to injury: first, by creating the impression that it was a genuine petition, and producing a scene of unparalleled excitement in the House; and then, as if he revelled in the tempest he had raised, turning it all into ridicule, by telling us now, after a protracted debate of several hours, that the petition is in favor of slavery, not against it, and that it was more against himself than any thing else. The gentleman, if such is his disposition, may enjoy this joke, and enjoy this scene; but farces of this kind neither suit the humor of the slaveholding States, nor comport with the character and dignity of the Legislature of the nation. But the gentleman says he did not present this petition, nor offer to present it; he only stated that he had such a petition, and inquired of the Chair whether it would come under the order of the House, by which all papers relating to slavery are directed to be laid upon the table, without printing or commitment, or any action whatsoever.

Censure of Mr. Adams.

[H. OF R.]

It would seem, then, (said Mr. P.,) that this notable hoax of a slave memorial was an ingenious device, by which the gentleman had attempted to manifest his contempt for an order solemnly adopted by this House, under the pitiful pretext that because the said hoax had reference to slavery, it must, therefore, be received and laid upon the table, as included in the general and comprehensive scope of the aforesaid order. If this was the object of the gentleman, so far from mending the matter, it only made it worse; for, according to his own showing, he had not only offended the House, in earnest, or trifled with it, if in jest, but, in either case, had determined, if possible, to throw ridicule upon a resolution which the House had thought proper to adopt for its own governance, in relation to all papers connected with the subject of the abolition of slavery. Mr. P. had no doubt that this laudable motive was duly appreciated by the House, and that they would manifest their high sense of the ingenuity of the gentleman in the manner that became them.

After a few incidental observations by MESSRS. CAMBRELENG, LAWLER, WISE, and JENIFER, the House adjourned, without coming to any decision.

TUESDAY, February 7.

Censure of Mr. Adams.

As soon as the reading of the journal was concluded,

Mr. ADAMS rose and said the minutes on the journal of the proceedings of yesterday were not, in one particular, sufficiently explicit. The journal stated that Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, moved a modification of his own resolution "at the suggestion of Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama;" whereas, Mr. A. contended that the journal should set forth that Mr. LEWIS had moved, or offered to move, that resolution as an amendment, and that then Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, accepted it.

After some conversation between MESSRS. ADAMS, THOMPSON of South Carolina, LAWLER, EVERETT, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, ALFORD, ELMORE, and MERCER, the journal was amended according to the suggestion of Mr. ADAMS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the "privileged question" of censure embraced in the following resolution, submitted by Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina:

"1. Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this House.

"2. Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts, above named, by creating the impression, and leaving the House under such impression, that said petition was for the abolition of slavery, when he knew it was not, has trifled with the House.

"3. Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS receive the censure of the House for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions."

The question pending was the following, submitted as a substitute by Mr. HAYNES:

"Resolved, That JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, has rendered himself justly liable to the severest censure of this House, and is censured accordingly, for having attempted to present to this House the petition of slaves."

Mr. JENIFER, who was entitled to the floor, begged leave to propound an inquiry to the venerable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS.) He read the following proceedings from the Globe of this morning, and he would respectfully ask that gentleman if that report was correct:

"Mr. ADAMS then proceeded, and further presented abolition petitions from New Hampshire, New York, Michigan, Virginia, (nine ladies in Fredricksburg,)" &c.

"Mr. ADAMS next stated he had in his possession a paper, upon which he wished to have a decision of the Speaker. The paper, he said, came from twenty persons declaring themselves to be slaves. He wished to know whether the Speaker would consider this paper as coming under the rule of the House."

Mr. ADAMS said it must be perfectly within the recollection of the Speaker, that what was there stated in the Globe was correct. He did not present the petition, but kept it in his possession. He had stated to the Speaker that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be from twenty-two slaves, and he had asked the Speaker whether a petition of this kind would come under the rule of the 18th of January last; and the Speaker said, as it was a novel question, he would take the sense of the House upon it. He had also stated, before he commenced presenting his petitions, that he had some in his possession which it had occurred to him were impositions; as, by the order of the 18th of January, members who had an attachment to the right of petition were liable to imposition. He had stated that, among the petitions which were in his possession, he had the suspicion that some of them were not genuine; and he would appeal to members to say whether he had not given this statement when he presented several of his petitions. He had given this statement when he stated he had in his possession the petition purporting to be from slaves; but he did not say, and no member of the House had the right to infer, that this paper was for the abolition of slavery. It was impossible for him to have said any such thing; for if the House had received the petition, and it had been read, they would instantly have seen that he made a false statement. He would, furthermore, say that if it had been a petition of slaves for the abolition of slavery, he should at least have paused before he brought the subject before the House in any form. However sacred he might hold the right of petition, he would still exercise a discretionary power in bringing before the House petitions which it was his opinion ought not to be presented; that discretionary power, however, he would use with prudence, and he would say that the mere circumstance of a petition being from slaves would not prevent him from presenting it; and if he should have incurred the censure of the House for so doing, he was ready to receive it.

As he had before said, however, he had not presented this petition to the House, and he was yet waiting the Speaker's decision before he could determine whether he would present it. If the House should decide that it was not a paper which came under the order of the 18th of January, and was not admissible, he should not present it at all. He would take this opportunity of saying to the House, that however much he might have been misunderstood by gentlemen, there was nothing further from his intention than to trifle with the House on this occasion; and never in the course of his life had he intended to pay a greater respect to the rules of the House and the rights and privileges of members. Had he consulted his own feelings, he would have presented the paper to the House; but, from the respect he paid to the rules of the House, he had asked the decision of the Chair before he presented the paper.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he preferred action on a question of this character rather than debate, and he had risen only for the purpose of requesting the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) to accept a modification he would send to the Clerk's table:

The modification was read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the honorable JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation,) has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that for the same he deserves the censure of this House.

2. Resolved, That the aforesaid JOHN Q. ADAMS receive a censure from the Speaker, in the presence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMPSON accepted the above as a substitute for his own resolutions.

Mr. ELMORE trusted there was no intention of arguing this subject, but that the South would present united action, and an undivided front, and suffer all minor differences of opinion to subside.

Mr. LAWLER then took the floor, and insisted, at some length, that the explanation of the member from Massachusetts was any thing but satisfactory, and he made an earnest appeal to him to retract what he had done.

Mr. ROBERTSON said: I have taken no part, Mr. Speaker, in the stormy debate which the extraordinary conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts has elicited. I was, sir, I confess, unwilling to trust to the emotions which that conduct could not fail to excite in the bosom of every Southern man. There was danger the first impulse might hurry us too far; for it is ever in moments of high excitement, of exasperation, such as we have just witnessed, that the most fatal precedents are established, and that, too, often under the influence of high and honorable motives. It is due, therefore, to ourselves, to the member implicated, and to the country, now that some degree of calmness is restored, to weigh well the consequences of the measure proposed under such circumstances for our adoption. To drag a member to the bar of this House, and cause him to be publicly censured by the Speaker, must be regarded by him and by all as a heavy punishment, and we ought to be able to give satisfactory reasons for inflicting it. Let us look to the resolution which professes to assign them. It declares that the member in question, by stating that he had a petition purporting to be from slaves, and inquiring whether it came within the meaning of a certain resolution, as preliminary to its presentation, has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ. Yes, sir; we charge that by stating a fact, and making an inquiry, he has given color to an offensive idea; and it is for the crime of intimating that idea we demand his punishment. I cannot go this length. So long as I have the honor of a seat here I will never consent, be the consequences to myself personally what they may, to censure or expel any member for the utmost latitude of inquiry or remark in which he may indulge, whilst acting in what he may regard, however erroneously, as the discharge of his duty, and keeping within the limits of parliamentary order. Let me not be understood as approving the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Far from it; no one more strongly condemns it. I concur with those who think that he has trifled with the patience of the House, to the great delay of its business, and wantonly tortured the feelings of a large portion of its members, by the minuteness with which he has dwelt upon the contents of offensive petitions, and the names and characters of those who signed them. I cannot hold him guiltless in unnecessarily introducing and enlarging upon this irritating topic of abolition; especially he seems to me much to blame for leaving the House so long under an evident and painful mistake in relation to the petition in his possession, by suppressing information of its contents. Nor do I believe that he has succeeded, by the explanation he has offered, in convincing one human being, except himself, of the propriety of his course. Indeed, in one respect that explanation must rather be regarded in the light of an aggravation, reiterating, as it did, the offensive doctrine that slaves have a right to send their petitions into this hall. That gentleman is too intelligent to assert, in his calmer moments, the preposterous position, that those who under the constitution are recognized as property, who constitute no part of the body politic, can exercise political rights. He ought to have foreseen the consequences which have ensued from suggesting a doubt upon that subject. But whatever may be my opinion, or that of the House, of the absurdity or impropriety of raising such a question here, it by no means follows that we can make it the ground of a penal proceeding.

Mr. ALFORD addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the member from Massachusetts would screen himself from the censure of this House, because he has not sent his petition from slaves to your table. Sir, he has sent the petition from the free negroes of Fredericksburg, and that is as wrong and insulting to us as if it were from slaves. The Constitution of these United States no more allows the one than the other, and both are equally insulting. Moreover, the member has said he would not refuse to present a petition from slaves, if the House did not object. The member from Massachusetts says he would not offer an indignity to this House; the fact speaks for itself, and is more conclusive to my mind than all his professions.

Sir, there seems to be some difference of opinion amongst our friends here, as to what course we ought to pursue in this awful crisis of our beloved country. Some of our friends, as patriotic as any, have urged, in this debate, that we ought not to sit here and submit to this outrageous course of things; that if it does not cease, we should go home. No, sir; no, sir; this must not be; we will neither submit nor retire. If they prosecute this measure in this House, by attempts at legislating us out of our rights, we will resist it here by legislative acts as long as we can; and if at last they prove too strong for us, and succeed in passing unconstitutional laws, to rob us of our property, to murder our wives and children, still we will not submit; they must change the constitution before they can bind us by any laws of abolition; this they never can do, if the South is true to itself. And true we shall be, I hope in God, to our constitution, our wives, our children, and our country. If still they pursue us to the last, and attempt to do by force what they never can do by law, we will not be found wanting; we will not desert this Capitol nor this country. This is the Old Dominion; this land is ours as well as theirs; it was ceded by Virginia and Maryland, where slavery is tolerated by law. Shall we leave it, then, to the dominion of force, and that, too, inflicted by the unhallowed arm of the wild and worse than savage fanatic? No, never!

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that the South is not well understood upon this subject. Party purposes and party policy may have prevented a fair and full expression of the feelings and opinions of people of all parties at the South upon this floor. The spirit of the South has not been felt here as it should have been. Let me tell gentlemen, it is a firm and unconquerable resolution never to surrender one jot or tittle of our constitutional rights upon this subject. We have a common interest in this Government, a common title in this capital; it bears the name of the immortal Washington, and he was a Southern man. Shall we, then, ever surrender the one or desert the other? No, never! Never, until this fair city is a field of Waterloo, and this beautiful Potomac a river of blood.

MR. CUSHING said that the House, during the whole of yesterday and to-day, had been the scene of a most excited and very discursive debate, branching out into a great variety of incidental topics, many of which were but remotely connected with the main question. There was, in truth, only one thing for the House to determine. Did the venerable member from Massachusetts, by the inquiry he propounded to the Chair, violate any law of the land, or any known parliamentary rule, so as to render him liable to the indignant censure of the House? This was the real point in issue, on the precise merits of the resolution moved or adopted by the gentleman from South Carolina, (MR. THOMPSON.)

I have not risen (said Mr. C.) to analyze or discuss that resolution. There is no need of it. My honorable colleague near me (MR. LINCOLN) has ably discharged this duty. He has demonstrated, temperately but manfully, the untenableness of all the grounds on which the resolution had been made to rest. The sentiments expressed by him do honor alike to his head and his heart. I declare my cordial concurrence in every word he has uttered on this occasion.

And, after this declaration, it is but a necessary consequence to say that to no resolution of censure, based on the matters now before us, to no rebuke, expressed or implied, to no action of the House that shall touch that individual (MR. ADAMS) with so much as the uttermost edge of the shadow of indignity, will I give my assent. If, in the present contingency, any thing had transpired of itself tending to justify the resolution of censure, I could not fail to remember that he, who is the object of it, has presided over the destinies of my country; that he is at this moment a representative, in common with myself, of the State of Massachusetts; that, eminent as he is by reason of his long public services, and the exalted stations he has held, he is yet more eminent for his intellectual superiority; that his character no longer belongs to his State or his country, but to the history of civilization and of liberty; and I would have members ponder well the case, before they proceed, whether to gratify friends or appease foes, to record their votes in censure of such a man.

This House is called upon to punish my colleague, for the alleged offence of speaking words in his place, and in the execution of his duty, which give color to the idea that slaves possess the right of petition. Was it an offence? And if so, in what text is the offence defined and the punishment prescribed? There is no such text. The proposition is, to censure my colleague at the mere will of the House, its arbitrary will, for an act which offends a portion of its members, by raising the implication of an erroneous idea. Whither is this precedent to lead? Is it not utterly subversive of the freedom of debate? A member is not to utter an opinion, or by words of inquiry insinuate an opinion, obnoxious to the rest of the House? I must express my surprise—I will not say my indignation, because that would infer reproach—that gentlemen, who continually themselves exercise the privilege of debate in its widest latitude—who stretch it to the farthest verge—who do this in the utterance of opinions offensive to a majority of the House—my profound astonishment that such gentlemen should urge the arbitrary punishment of my colleague for a pretended abuse of the right of debate. Or do members from the South conceive they are to have the privilege of speech exclusively to themselves? If so, it is time they should awake from their self-delusion.

Relying, however, very little on the merits of the question, gentlemen seek to justify their purpose by other considerations. To begin, they denounce, in no measured terms, the distinguishing opinions of Massachusetts on the subject of this great question of public liberty, incidental to the resolution before us. They err most egregiously, if they believe that such opinions are exclusively peculiar to Massachusetts or to New England. Those opinions prevail quite as extensively in the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, for example, as they do in New England. They are, indeed, opinions of elemental right, lying at the very bottom of all the political institutions of the country. It may be that such opinions are more strongly held, and more universally understood, in New England, than elsewhere in the United States. I may not deny it. Deny it? I glory in the fact. It is the proof and the result of our old and persevering dedication to liberty.

Gentlemen talk to us of these our great fundamental rights—as the freedom of speech, of opinion, of petition—as if they were derived from the Constitution of the United States. I scout such a doctrine. If there were a drop in my veins that did not rebel against the sentiment, it would be bastard blood. Sir, I claim to be descended from the king-killing Roundheads of the reign of Charles the First; through a race of men not unremembered in peace or war; never backward in the struggles of liberty; a family, upon the head of a member of which the first price of blood was set by Great Britain, in revenge of his early devotion to the cause of independence. I venerate their character and their principles. I am ready to do as they did—to abandon all the advantages of country, home, fortune, station—to fly to some western wilderness—and to live upon a handful of parched corn and a cup of cold water, with God's blessing on honest independence—sooner than I will surrender one jot or tittle of those great principles of liberty which I have sucked in with my mother's milk. I disdain to hold these rights by any parchment title. The people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the people of every State of this Union, came into it in the full possession and fruition of all these rights. We did not constitute this Government as the means of acquiring new rights, but for the protection of old ones, which nature had conferred upon us; which the constitution rightly regards as pre-existing rights; and, as to which, all the constitution does is to provide that these rights neither you, nor any power on earth, shall alter, abrogate, or abridge. They are rights of Heaven's own giving. We hold them by the supreme tenure of revolution. We hold them by the dread arbitrament of battle. We hold them by the concession of a higher and broader charter than all the constitutions in the land—the free donation of the eternal God, when he made us to be men. These, the cardinal principles of human freedom, he has implanted in us, and placed them before and behind and around us, for our guard and guidance, like the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night, which led the Israelites through the desert. It is a liberty, native, inborn, original, underived, imprescriptible; and acknowledged in the constitution itself, as pre-eminently before and above the constitution.

Censure of Mr. Adams.

[H. OF R.]

Now, in their denunciations of the North, it is these, the very primordial rights of the universal people of the United States, that gentlemen from the South assail. They strike at the freedom of opinion, of the press, and of speech, out of doors—and the right of petition and debate in this House.

It seems to be imputed as a crime, to a portion of the inhabitants of the non-slaveholding States, that they entertain sentiments condemned by a majority of this nation. But can it be a crime? I appeal once again to that portion of the members from the South who are foremost in this debate—I mean the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) and his friends—who on certain subjects differ in opinion with a great majority of their countrymen; and I ask them whether they stand prepared to abide by and sustain the doctrine that opinions, unacceptable to the majority, are a moral or political crime? Will they apply to themselves the rule of judgment which they urge so vehemently against the people of the North? Will they deliberately sanction such an odious doctrine? I know they cannot. They must perceive that it is impossible by any act of the will to control the conclusions of the mind. It is our duty, in all the contingencies of life, to weigh well the facts and the reasonings upon which our judgments are to be formed; to apply to every question a conscientious desire to arrive at the truth; to spare no means to inform ourselves rightly as to the matters which the mind is to judge. But the result is not a thing within the scope of the will. And it is monstrous, therefore, to bring opinions to the bar of legal censure. It is a violation of the interior sanctuary of a man's own soul. It is the very acme of tyranny. The arbitrary power to condemn and punish opinion is that which gave birth to the protestant reformation, and which has rendered the inquisition a by-word of odium and reproach. It is that self-same thing from which our fathers fled—the Puritans, the Catholics, the Quakers, the Huguenots—when they left their native Europe to found an asylum for conscience in this New World. It is that which has nerved the arm and edged the sword, in every contest of liberty, which lightens along the history of civilized man.

As to speech and the press—I admit that here there is more difficulty than in the case of opinion. It is a practical problem, extremely difficult of solution, to determine always how much of liberty in this respect is possible to be maintained, without degenerating into licentiousness. And it is a practical question, greatly dependent on times and circumstances. I shall not seek, in these cursory remarks, to solve the problem. It suffices for my present purpose to suggest the idea, that the suppression of political inquiry, while it is a thing hostile to the general spirit of our institutions, is hard of accomplishment, and apt enough to end in aggravating the evil it is designed to remedy.

I had occasion, the last winter, to express my views on the general subject of the right of petition. They remain without change. And I can but repeat my conviction, that this, like the liberty of conscience and the press, is not a right given by the constitution, but an original right of the constituent people of the United States, and one which they never parted with, but in their compacts of political fellowship expressly saved from all abridgment and limitation forever. The right of the people to petition for a redress of grievances, and the duty of Congress to receive and consider such petitions, are in my estimation the correlative conditions of the right. A petition is the formal mode in which the people bring their wants or opinions to the direct notice of Congress. It is an essential ingredient of representative institutions. To forbid the citizen to prefer his wishes to Congress by petition would be to lop off one of the chief democratic features of our Government, and to convert it into an aristocracy of elective despotism. It would be a curtailment of the constitutional liberties of the people of the United States, to which they could not and should not submit.

Mr. Speaker, such are my sentiments in regard to these great fundamental rights of my fellow-citizens. I think they are, in the substance and the general outline, the sentiments of the bulk of the people of the North; and I had fondly imagined, until very recently, that they were sentiments co-extensive in prevalence with the jurisdiction of the republic. Entertaining this belief, I have deeply regretted to see the dangerous topic of slavery mixed up with other questions, wholly foreign to it in principle.

Sir, I put it to gentlemen, in all directness and sincerity, do they suppose that angry attacks on the freedom of opinion, of speech, of the press, of petition, of debate, are likely to check the spread in the United States of that disapprobation of slavery, which is but another form, conversely considered, of the love of liberty? Do they deem it possible to smother the opinions and stifle the petitions of the free men of the United States? Ay, and of the free women too? For I confess it seems to me a strange idea to uphold, in this enlightened age, that woman, refined, educated, intellectual woman, is to have no opinion, or no right to express that opinion. Do gentlemen soberly think their cause can be strengthened in the country, by bringing to the bar of the House for contempt, by subjecting to censure, by expelling, a Representative of one of the free States, because he may have given color to the idea that slaves can petition Congress?

The resolution before the House proposes to censure my colleague for the act of stating that he held a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and asking of the Speaker whether such a paper falls within a certain order of the House.

Now, as I have already said, I hold the right of petition to be an original and unalienated right of the people of the United States, secured to them by the constitution, but not derived from it. I hold that the right appertains, not to the subject matter of the petition, but to the person of the petitioner. I hold, also, that the obligation to receive a petition corresponds to the right of petitioning; since the right, without the duty, is a mere name, and not a substance. And there may be a power to receive a petition, without any obligation to receive it, or any right to insist upon its reception as a corresponding duty. For instance, Congress has the power to receive a petition of a foreigner; and yet Congress lies under no obligation to receive it; because the right of petition is guaranteed only to the people of the United States. Is it not, as a matter of constitutional law, just so in the case of a slave? The constitution guarantees to the constituent people of the United States their natural rights of opinion, discussion, assembly, and petition, against all abridgment. Are slaves embraced within these guarantees of the constitution? I think not. As to the natural right of the slave in these particulars, that, like his natural right of personal freedom, not being assured to him by the constitutional compact, is not a question within the constitutional competency of Congress.

But the inquiry whether Congress may receive the petition of a slave depends on other considerations. It is a question, not of the right of the petitioner, but of the discretion or power of the petitioned. And this appears to me to be just such a matter-of-fact question of common sense as might occur in the relations of private life. There is a multitude of supposable cases in which I could receive and grant the request—that is, the petition—of a slave. I cannot infringe the legal rights of the master without becoming amenable to the law of the land; nay, to a higher forum, since I should be doing an act immoral and dishonorable as well as illegal. He is in the eye of the law the property of his master. But is he not also a human being? Does not the Constitution of the United States expressly call him a person, while making him an integral part of the basis of representation? Can he prefer no petition, no request, no prayer, in any circumstances? If I see him drowning in the canal, or about to be struck down by a stranger, and he cries to me for succor, may I not listen to him? Suppose a memorial to come to me from a slave, setting forth by well-authenticated statements, that he is in a foreign land, oppressed and wronged, and his master, a citizen of this country, does not know it, or cannot be found; may I not bring the matter before the Government, whether it be Congress or the Executive, which ever has the power to afford redress? What I mean to say is, that, in matters having nothing to do with abolition, and not affecting in any other respect the legal rights of the master, it might be proper and reasonable to lend an ear to the petition of a slave. These, I know, are extreme cases; and they are suggested only as illustrations of my idea; for I would no more present a petition from slaves, in derogation of any of the constitutional rights of the South, than I would offer a deliberate insult to the Chair or to the House.

Having been at all times a strenuous advocate of the freedom of opinion, of the press, and of petition, I consider it my duty to state thus explicitly my views of the existing constitutional limitation of these immunities. It were unbecoming to be a stickler for the rights of one part of the country, and blind to the rights of another part. I resist the attempt to punish my colleague by a sort of ex post facto law, which in its tendency extinguishes the freedom of debate, and subjects every member to the arbitrary will of a majority. I defend the particular opinions of the North. I assert the freedom of opinion, speech, the press, petition, inherent in the people of the United States, and secured to them by the constitution. But while I maintain the sanctity, the inviolability of these rights, as it befits a representative of Massachusetts to do, I will not practise here, nor countenance elsewhere, any encroachments on the constitutional rights of the South.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Election of President and Vice President—Counting the Electoral Votes.

This being the day especially set apart by a joint resolution for the two Houses to convene in joint meeting, for the purpose of opening and counting the electoral votes given by the several States for President and Vice President of the United States—

FEBRUARY, 1837.] Election of President and Vice President—Counting the Electoral Votes.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HAYNES said, as the hour had nearly elapsed, he begged to propound an inquiry to the Chair, in relation to the order in which the Senate should be received by the House on occasions like the present.

The CHAIR stated, in reply, that the usual course had heretofore been for the House, some short time before the arrival of the hour, to send a message to the Senate, informing that body that the House was in readiness to receive them and count the votes. The Chair stated, further, that, so far as he had been informed, the mode of receiving the Senate by the House was for the members to stand uncovered.

Mr. PATTON moved that, while the votes were being counted, ladies be admitted to the privilege of the floor of the hall.

Mr. JARVIS objected.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, moved a suspension of the rule; agreed to—yeas 141, noes not counted; and Mr. PATTON's motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. ANTHONY inquired if it was necessary to move that a committee wait upon the Senate; and, if so, whether the chairman of the select committee on the subject should appoint a sub-committee, or the Speaker of the House.

The CHAIR stated, in reply, that upon every occasion of this kind, with a single exception, the invariable course had been to send a message to the Senate by the Clerk. In one instance only the message had been transmitted by a committee of two members of the House, who were also appointed to conduct the Senate into the hall; but that was a departure from the former practice.

Mr. ANTHONY moved that a message be then sent to the Senate by the Clerk, notifying that body that the House was in readiness to receive them, and count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The CHAIR stated, before putting the question, that the seats on the right of the Speaker's chair had been provided for the accommodation of the Senate, and others provided for the members to which they belonged.

Mr. ANTHONY's motion was then put and agreed to.

The Clerk accordingly left the House; the Senate shortly after entered the hall, with the President of the Senate, the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING, of Alabama, at their head, preceded by the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-arms of the Senate, and were received at the door of the hall, and conducted to the seat assigned them by the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, all the members being uncovered, and rising in their places.

When the Senators had taken the seats assigned them, and the President of the Senate had seated himself at the right of the Speaker, the tellers took their seats at the Clerk's table.

The tellers were—for the Senate, the Hon. FELIX GRUNDY; for the House of Representatives, the Hon. FRANCIS THOMAS and the Hon. LEVI LINCOLN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE then rose and said:

The two Houses being now convened for the purpose of counting the electoral votes of the several States for President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate will, in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution, proceed to open the votes and deliver them to the tellers, in order that they may be counted.

I now present to the tellers the electoral vote of the State of Maine.

The tellers then counted the votes, and announced them, severally, in their order, the same form having been observed in every case; the tellers also reading the qualifications of the electors, and the certificates of their elections.

He then announced the result, as reported by the tellers, as follows:

For President of the United States.

For MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York—

If the votes of Michigan be counted - 170

If the votes of Michigan be not counted 167

For WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio - 73

For HUGH LAWSON WHITE, of Tennessee - 36

For DANIEL WEBSTER, of Massachusetts - 14

For WILLIE P. MANGUM, of North Carolina 11

It therefore appears (continued the President) that, were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for MARTIN VAN BUREN, for President of the United States, 170 votes; if the votes of Michigan be not counted, MARTIN VAN BUREN then has 167 votes. In either event, MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, is elected President of the United States; and I therefore declare that MARTIN VAN BUREN, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States, for four years, commencing the 4th day of March, 1837.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE then announced the votes for Vice President of the United States, as reported by the tellers, as follows:

For RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky—

If the votes of Michigan be counted - 147

If the votes of Michigan be not counted 144

For FRANCIS GRANGER, of New York - 77

For JOHN TYLER, of Virginia - 47

For WILLIAM SMITH, of Alabama - 23

It therefore appears (continued the President) that, were the votes of Michigan counted, the highest number of votes for Vice President of the United States would be 147; and if those votes be not counted, the highest number of votes for that office will be 144. But, in either event, no person has received a majority of the electoral votes for Vice President of the United States; and I do therefore declare, that, no person having received such majority, no person has been elected to that office; that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and FRANCIS GRANGER, of New York, are the two highest on the list; and it now devolves on the Senate of the United States, as provided in the constitution, from those two persons to elect a Vice President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE then announced that the object for which the two Houses were assembled, under the constitution, had been accomplished, and that the Senators would retire to their chamber in order.

The Senators then rose and retired in the order they came, the members of the House rising in their places and remaining uncovered.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported:

That the joint committee, in further execution of the duties with which they were charged by the two Houses of Congress, have agreed to the following resolution, in which their committee recommend to the House of Representatives to concur:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, and notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1837.

The above resolution having been concurred in,
The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.

Censure of Mr. Adams.

The CHAIR announced the unfinished business, being the question of privilege involved in the consideration of the following resolutions in relation to Mr. ADAMS.

The original resolution moved by Mr. W. THOMPSON was modified by him, at the suggestion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, as follows:

"1. Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House, by stating, in his place, that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation,) has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that for the same he deserves the censure of this House.

"2. Resolved, That the aforesaid JOHN Q. ADAMS receive a censure from the Speaker, in the presence of the House of Representatives."

Mr. BYNUM had offered the following as a substitute:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert, "That an attempt to present any petition or memorial from any slave or slaves, or free negro, from any part of the Union, is a contempt of the House, and calculated to embroil it in a strife and confusion incompatible with the dignity of the body, and that any member guilty of the same justly subjects himself to the censure of the House.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the fact whether any such attempt has been made by any member of this House, and report the same to the House as soon as practicable."

The question immediately pending was the following amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. PATTON:

"Resolved, That the right of petition does not belong to slaves of this Union; that no petition from them can be presented to this House without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding States and endangering the integrity of the Union.

"Resolved, That every member who shall hereafter present any such petition to this House ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of this House, the rights of the South, and an enemy to the Union."

"Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS having solemnly disclaimed a design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House in the inquiry he made of the Speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the House was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore, all further proceeding as to his conduct now cease.”

Mr. FRENCH said: The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) who last addressed the House upon these resolutions, contended that the right of petition was a natural right, derived from our Creator; and, being a natural right, so derived, belonged to all human beings. If that gentleman meant that all men have the natural right to supplicate the Deity, he is right. If he meant that all men, while in a state of nature, had the right to petition their fellow-beings for what they wanted, he is right. If he meant that all men, in their personal relations and intercourse, have the same right now, he is right. But if he meant that all men have the right to petition the Government, I think he is wrong.

Sir, there was a time when civil government did not exist; and how can a man be said to have a natural right to petition a political being who had no voice in its creation—who is neither party nor privy to the body politic?

That gentleman was pleased also to favor us with what he termed the abstract opinions of the abolitionists—opinions which, as he said, they honestly and conscientiously entertained. And what are those opinions? That slavery is, in the abstract, a social, moral, and political evil. I will not, Mr. Speaker, debate the question whether slavery be or be not, in the abstract, a social, moral, or political evil, but I refer to what the honorable gentleman said to prove what are the grievances of the abolitionists, and what their objects. Slavery, according to his exposé of their views, is their grievance—universal emancipation, then, must be their object.

If they prevail in that object, through the action of Congress, what becomes of the rights of the slave States, as guaranteed to them by the constitution? What becomes of the Government? Sir, it is plain that the end of these things, if successful, terminates in the overthrow of the Government. This view of the subject, therefore, has also an unfortunate bearing upon the conduct of the honorable gentleman whom it is proposed to censure.

Sir, the history of abolition petitions in this House during the last and present sessions of Congress, and of the efforts of a large majority of this House to avoid the agitation and consequent excitement, here and elsewhere, of this dangerous question, are known to this House and to the country. I will not attempt to repeat them, but will call the attention of the House to the resolution of the 18th of January, by which this House ordered all petitions, memorials, propositions, and papers, relating to slavery or the abolition of slavery, presented to the House, to be received and laid upon the table, without being printed or referred. It reads as follows, to wit:

“Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.”

What, sir, was the object of this House in passing this resolution? It was to give peace to this House and the country on this exciting question. That object was known to us all. It was known to the honorable gentleman in question. His conduct, therefore, in bringing before the House the question of the right of slaves to petition, by inquiring of the Chair if a petition from slaves came within that resolution, defeats the object of the House, and is disrespectful to the House.

The terms of the resolution are broad and comprehensive; and, considered without reference to those to whom the right of petition belongs, the circumstances under which it was adopted, and the object the House had in view by its passage, would be construed to let in petitions and papers on the subjects embraced in it from all persons. But when considered in reference to these considerations, the resolution neither enlarges nor abridges the right of petition. It leaves the right of petition as it stood before its passage. Does that resolution, then, enlarge the right of petition? The House did not dream of enlarging the right of petition. Will any one contend the slaves inhabiting the island of Cuba have a right, under the resolution, to petition this House? Or that it gives to the blacks planted at Liberia the right of petition? In short, does it confer the right of petition to all people? Surely not. The broadness of the resolution, then, forms no justification or excuse for the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts.

The conclusion, then, Mr. Speaker, to which my own sense of duty conducts me, is, that that honorable gentleman, by raising the question of the right of slaves to petition this House, did wrong—in fact, by so doing, threw a firebrand into the House, in contempt of all its efforts to allay all excitement upon this subject, and especially of the settled judgment of the House, as expressed by the passage of the resolution of the 18th January—that he has, by his conduct in question, trifled with the House, its feelings and its characters, and therefore ought to be censured. In voting for the resolution to censure that honorable gentleman, I shall not be influenced by any unkind or unfriendly feeling towards him personally. But, sir, whilst I feel it my duty, in my representative character, to disapprove of his conduct, I shall give my vote under a lively sense of his high character for talents and learning, and of the distinguished ability with which he has discharged the important duties of the high and honorable stations which he has filled at home and abroad.

If the majority of this House are satisfied with the explanations of that honorable gentleman, and think proper to excuse him, they can do so. Those explanations have not satisfied me, and I shall do my duty.

Mr. EVANS insisted that the charge of offence, on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, was too vague to justify a vote of censure upon him. There was nothing specific. The resolution did not set forth any thing like contempt towards the House, or even an infringement of its rules, but that he had "given color to the idea" that slaves had the right to petition. Mr. E. held that the House had the right to punish a member for a determined violation of its rules; because, otherwise, the whole business of the country might be obstructed by a disorderly member; but no man could be punished for the expression of his honest opinions. The limitation to this, such as personalities, reflections upon the past conduct of the House, &c., were expressly laid down in the lex parliamentaria. With reference to the right of slaves to petition, he said there were cases embracing it. It had been said, also, the slave had no constitutional rights but through his master. This was not so; and he put the cases of murder, or unprovoked assault, and that of alleged kidnapping, where his legal rights were recognized, and frequently put in force.

Mr. PICKENS explained that if the gentleman from Maine was alluding to his argument, he (Mr. P.) had not said the slave had no legal rights, but that he had no constitutional or political rights. That was a question he should like to hear the gentleman argue.

Mr. EVANS was referring to constitutional or legal rights, which he insisted had been secured to the slave. He then adverted to the general character of the petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in none of which was there found any harsh language in relation to the peculiar institutions of the South or Southern men, nor any expressed or implied wish to interfere with those institutions. There might be a few solitary exceptions, but it should be borne in mind that there was much warmth on both sides. The right of the abolitionists to petition, however, should have been respected, and their memorials continued to be received, as they formerly had been. While this was done, their numbers were few and their efforts feeble; but they had increased in numbers, and become more powerful, from the manner in which they had been treated by Congress. They contended that slavery was a great moral, social, and political evil, and was, besides, indefensible by argument; and the refusal of the House to listen to them, and argue with them, justified them, in their own opinion, in these allegations; but there was nothing insulting in this. Even that language was borrowed from Virginia; and he was about to cite some passages from the debates in that State on the adoption of the constitution, containing this declaration, when

Mr. PATTON arose, and hoped the Chair would restrict the limits of the debate within the proper range of order. If the gentleman was suffered to go on in this way, it must be obvious that a debate was springing up which would be interminable.

The CHAIR reminded the House that he had several times interposed to confine the debate within the proper limits, and had repeatedly reminded gentlemen that they were taking too wide a range, but in the performance of that duty he had not been sustained by the House. As he had been called upon, however, he should enforce the rule, and take the sense of the House whether the gentleman from Maine should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. EVANS was allowed to proceed, but declined to do so, saying he did not wish to discuss the subject of slavery, or to introduce any new topics into the debate.

Mr. PATTON then read the following modification of his amendment:

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union.

Resolved, That the honorable JOHN Q. ADAMS having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House, in the inquiry he made of the Speaker, as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition to the House, was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease.

Mr. PATTON moved the above, which

Mr. THOMPSON accepted, and Mr. BYNUM withdrew his amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to Mr. V. to withdraw this motion, to allow him to submit some remarks to the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL could not withdraw the motion, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts would pledge himself to renew the motion when he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. ADAMS said it was not in his power to comply with this request, because he desired to have the opportunity of a full hearing in his own defence; and he had hoped he would be granted the privilege.

Mr. KENNON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 50, nays 144.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) to address the House.

The CHAIR decided this motion to be out of order, inasmuch as the previous question had been moved.

The question was then taken on the second to the previous question, when it appeared that the previous question was not seconded—yeas 79, nays 100.

Mr. WISE then said he wished merely to remark that he hoped the House, after hearing, as they ought to hear, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) would be disposed to take the question without further debate; because he had an important matter to lay before the House from one of the select committees.

Mr. ADAMS began by observing that he would take up as little of the time of the House as was possible for him to do on this important subject. The first question before the House was the inquiry addressed by himself to the Speaker and to the House. On this inquiry, no question had yet been taken. He (Mr. A.) was, however, extremely anxious that the question should be taken, and that every member of this House should record his vote on this important proposition, namely: "Whether the House shall refuse to receive a petition from slaves, under any circumstances whatever." When he (Mr. A.) first made this proposition as a matter of inquiry only, and when the Speaker submitted the inquiry to the House, a member immediately rose, (Mr. HAYNES,) and said that he did not know how to meet a proposition of this kind. He (Mr. HAYNES) thought it was not deserving attention; that to receive it in any shape would be bestowing upon it more attention than it deserved. If, then, the question did not deserve attention, how came it to happen that the House had been engaged so long a time in debating upon such a question? Why, if the question was not deserving attention, have gentlemen professed to feel so deeply upon it, and been so anxious to bring me to the bar of the House to receive censure? Why was not an inquiry of so little importance disposed of at once? If the Speaker had objected to receiving the petition, I (said Mr. A.) should not have presented the paper, out of respect to the House, though I know that it is a question more important than the honorable gentleman (Mr. HAYNES) imagines. Sir, I know it to be a question demanding deep attention from this House, from this nation, and from the civilized world. I said (continued Mr. A.) that I was willing to abide by the conclusion the House might think proper to come to on this subject, whatever that conclusion might be; but at the same time I confess I was exceedingly anxious that this question, in the abstract, should be taken and decided upon by the House. I was anxious that every member of this House should record his vote, for all time to come, on a question of such importance—a question which opened the whole subject of the condition of slaves in this country—a question which brought into inquiry the whole subject of the power and privileges of this House, and of the freedom of speech in debate. These are questions of vital importance; these are privileges dear to some, though there may be those by whom they are not valued. I had hoped, sir, to have received an answer to the proposition "if a petition from slaves would be received by the House," because, as I have stated, the answer to this proposition would open the whole subject relating to slavery, and the whole question relating to the privilege of speech of the members of this House. The answer to this inquiry involved all this, and more than this.

Amidst the prevailing excitement, and among the various speeches which the numerous resolutions against him had elicited, he (Mr. A.) had heard but one individual who had undertaken argumentatively to discuss the question which he (Mr. A.) had propounded to the Speaker; and that individual was the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. FRENCH.) That honorable gentleman, who is an able judicial character, has treated the subject as an argument before a court of law; but, sir, the subject demands a different kind of argument. What was his argument, sir? It was this: that if you abolish slavery, you take away a part of the representation which the constitution has guaranteed to the Southern States. But, I ask, has that gentleman established any connection between his premises and his conclusions? What, sir? If slavery were abolished, they will be deprived of the right of representation, and therefore the House cannot receive petitions from slaves!

[Mr. FRENCH, the member referred to, explained. He (Mr. F.) did not affirm that slaves were entitled to representatives, if that was what the honorable gentleman (Mr. ADAMS) understood him to say.]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. Has he taken the right issue, sir? Has he drawn his premises and his conclusions to a closer connection? What, sir? If you should deprive the South of its representation, what then? Is that any reason to assign why slaves should be deprived of the opportunity of crying for mercy to this House? There is no connection between the two things. Sir, he has travelled out of the record; he has raised a totally different question from the actual question which is alone before this House: he has substituted the question "if slavery should be abolished," in place of the question put to the Speaker, viz: "if the House would receive petitions from slaves under any circumstances." My colleague (Mr. CUSHING) has, more forcibly than I can do, already discussed the proposition of the freedom of petition. He has shown that it is a right not derived from the constitution, not given by parchment, but prior to the constitution; given, by the God of Nature, to every man when he created him; it is the right to implore favor, to seek for mercy! a right which the framers of our constitution would have spurned the very idea of abridging or limiting, or restricting to any particular color or class of men! He recognized this right as belonging to all men in the constitution which they framed; and, in that constitution, sir, instead of imagining any limits to this right, they solemnly declared, in that instrument, that it should not be abridged! Yes, sir, that it should not be limited—they recognized no limitation of any kind to this sacred right. It is, sir, a right belonging to every human creature, which does not depend upon the condition of the petitioner, and which cannot be denied to man in any condition. This, sir, is the principle involved in the inquiry put by me to the Chair—a principle more than recognized by the constitution, which has declared that this right shall suffer no abridgment, no limitation whatever! If you now abolish this principle, this first and humblest right given from God to every human being, a limitation will next be put to the right of petitioning, in the fullest extent to which party madness might hereafter be inclined to carry it. If the House shall decide that the paper I possess comes under the order of the House of the 18th of January, I will present the petition, and in doing so shall be doing my duty—a duty of the highest importance to my country, to humanity, and to human nature. What, sir? Will you put the right of petitioning, of craving for help and mercy and protection, on the footing of political privileges? It is an idea which has not even been entertained by the utmost extreme of human despotism; no despot, of any age or clime, has ever denied this humble privilege to the poorest or the meanest of human creatures. If this House decides that it will not receive petitions from slaves, under any circumstances, it will cause the name of this country to be enrolled among the first of barbarous nations. A petition is a supplication; and supplication for what? For relief from those who have the power to give relief, and who are placed in a situation to attend to the cry of distress. That would be a sad day, sir, in my opinion, when a vote should pass this House that would not receive a petition from slaves? What would it lead to? When the principle is once begun of limiting the right of petition, where would it stop? Gentlemen have objected to the petition immediately preceding that which I presented, because it came from colored people! from color! That, sir, is giving color to an idea with a witness!* The honorable gentleman makes it a crime because I presented a petition which he affirms to be from colored women, which women were of infamous character, as the honorable gentleman says—prostitutes, I think the gentleman said.

[Mr. PATTON explained. He (Mr. P.) did not say they were prostitutes; the objection he made was that the petition came from free mulattoes in the South; he did not object on the ground of opposition to the right of petition, but because he (Mr. P.) considered that the House ought to refuse to open its doors to applications from the Southern slaves. As to the infamous character of the women in question, he mentioned that, not as if he deemed it a reason for refusing the right to petition, but because he wished to wipe away the stain from the ladies of Fredericksburg, as these women had been called "ladies of Fredericksburg" by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. ADAMS.) He (Mr. P.) was sure that no ladies from Fredericksburg had sent such a petition to this House.]

Mr. ADAMS continued. He (Mr. A.) was not certain that he called them ladies, or whether the petition itself had not stated that they were ladies. Whenever he presented petitions from ladies, he was not in the habit of using that term for their designation; the word "woman" was an expression much dearer to his heart than that of "lady." But to return to the idea he was about to enforce. He (Mr. A.) thought the honorable gentleman had said that they were infamous; but the proposition which he would ever maintain was that the sacred right of petition, of begging for mercy, as it did not depend upon condition, so also it did not depend upon character; it was a right which could not be denied to the poorest, the humblest, and the most wretched; and, moreover, it was a right which could not be refused to the most vile, the most abandoned, or most infamous. He (Mr. A.) did not, however, know that they were in the present case infamous, but he thought that was the word used in debate by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. PATTON,) and that it was so reported in the National Intelligencer.

[Mr. PATTON again explained. He (Mr. P.) had not said that he knew those women.]

Mr. ADAMS continued. He was glad to hear the honorable gentleman disclaim any knowledge of them; for he had been going to ask, if they were infamous women, then who was it that had made them infamous? Not, he believed, their own color, but their masters; and he had heard it said, in proof of this fact, and he was inclined to believe it was the case, that there existed great resemblances in the South between the progeny of the colored people and the white men who claimed the possession of them. Thus, perhaps, the charge of being infamous might be retorted upon those who made it, as originating from themselves.

[Great agitation in the House.

Mr. GLASCOCK here interposed, and produced from the Clerk's table the original petition

* One of the resolutions presented to the House charges Mr. ADAMS with giving color to the idea, &c.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Censure of Mr. Adams.

[H. OF R.]

referred to, and said that it bore on its back an endorsement in Mr. ADAMS's hand, "from nine ladies of Fredericksburg." Cries of order! order!]

Mr. ADAMS continued. He (Mr. A.) would observe that he did not know they were colored people; whether they were called ladies or women was very indifferent; the term "woman" was enough for him. But (observed Mr. A.) if you once admit the principle that the right of petition is limited, and will not apply to slaves, the next thing will be to limit it still further, by extending the limitation to free colored people; and, after this, the next limitation will be to the question of the character of the petitioners; then the next limitation will be to inquire on what side of political parties are the petitioners; and then, sir, from one side all petitions will be perfectly good and receivable, but on the other side all the petitions will be from people of bad character, according to the representations of any member who may say he does not know who they are; they will be all infamous, sir, who are on the wrong side. This will be the case. To this state will things come if the right of petition shall be limited by peculiar distinctions, and shall be made to rest on such grounds as these which have been relied upon in this debate.

Another gentleman (Mr. ROBERTSON) has taken another ground. He says the right of petition is not to be admitted, except when it is in the power of the party petitioned to grant the object prayed for. There is some plausibility here; the expediency of petitioning those who have not the power to grant the petition might, perhaps, be made a question; but the right itself is not affected. The absence of power on the one side does not involve the deprivation of a right on the other side; incompetency in one man does not involve the deprivation of his rights to another man; take away the party petitioned, the party offering the petition remains with all its rights unimpaired. Where, then, is the objection? Besides, the power to grant a petition might be made one of the most mooted questions in the world. If the right of presenting a petition or of not presenting is made to depend upon the question of power, then it may be shown, by the opinions of slaveholders themselves, that Congress has the power; and, consequently, according to the gentleman's own argument, the right of petition is also possessed on the other side. The opinion that Congress had the right to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia was entertained by the great majority of Southern gentlemen themselves only a few years ago; now, however, not many can be found who would venture to acknowledge such an opinion. Some, indeed, there are, who have that magnanimity, though I know not what it may cost them for expressing their opinions. I appeal to the records of this House, which will show that, on the question of its power to abolish slavery in the District, a great majority of this House will be found to have been in its favor; the House has been, heretofore, almost unanimous on the subject. The honorable gentleman (Mr. ROBERTSON) thinks that Congress has no such power; and that therefore, on this account, the petitions ought not to be received. The ground he (Mr. ROBERTSON) takes is this: that the petitioner has no right to petition, because Congress has no power to grant! Let us concede the premises, then it is clear that the whole right of petition is rendered a nullity; it is reduced to nothing; it is annihilated; for, let but a majority only please to assert the absence of power on any question not agreeable to them to entertain, and (according to the argument) the right of petition ceases to exist, because of the alleged absence of power!

As to the character of petitioners, I wish it was in my power to elucidate the proposition which I maintain; and which is, that the right of petition does not depend upon any moral qualifications. But I shall not now, sir, urge any arguments to illustrate this proposition. Gentlemen, indeed, have desired to found the right of petition on moral character; but I shall show that it cannot be limited.

I would take the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON,) which the Speaker has decided to be the subject before the House, instead of the abstract proposition put by myself to the Chair; though that proposition, sir, was the real question before the House; and it was this: "Whether the paper I held in my hand came under the rule of the 18th of January." Now, sir, in the course of the arguments which I have heard on this subject, (or, I should say, debates, rather than arguments,) the attention of the House has been diverted into different channels, and the subject-matter of debate has been changed from my question first propounded to the Chair, to other and different questions, almost without number, and all of them, sir, relating to me, all their object being, to the very last, down to this final resolution, offered by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON;) I say, sir, the object of them all has been to pass censure upon me. Yes, sir, to pass censure, either direct or implied, upon myself, for having asked a simple question of the Speaker!

I do not propose, sir, to go through all the speeches which fell upon me so thickly, which came down, pouncing upon me like so many eagles upon a dove, calling me infamous, with other harsh expressions; nay, from one quarter of the House I heard cries "Expel him! Expel him!" However, sir, I will lay all this aside. First came a resolution by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. HAYNES;) that was succeeded by the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON;) then came a modification by the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. LEWIS,)—all of them, sir, reminding me of what Dame Quickly says: "Oh! day and night, but these are bitter words." Yes, sir, they all contained very bitter words against me; but, unfortunately, in the midst of all the joy and hopes of certain triumph, when the gentlemen were quite sure of at least two-thirds of the votes of this House against me, I was obliged to ask that, if brought as a culprit to the bar, to receive censure as a criminal, the gentlemen would first amend their resolution a little, because it was contrary to facts. Well, sir, they took advantage of my suggestion, and whisk came another resolution, as bitter as the first, charging me as guilty of a gross contempt of the House; then came a second resolution, bringing me in guilty of trifling with the House, because, as it was presumed, I suffered the House to believe the facts to be true; and so, sir, I was to be brought to the bar of the House for letting the House believe what they had not the slightest right to believe! I was to be found guilty, sir, for permitting the House to believe as true a thing which there had not been one word uttered by me authorizing them even to infer, much less to believe. Another resolution was then discussed, but it had not been long before the House, when it was found that it would not do; and then came a fresh resolution; at last, after all, came the proposition by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. DROMGOOLE,) of which I shall not speak much, though it might, perhaps, have been made a theme for merriment to the House; for it was charged upon me by this resolution that I had given color to an idea; to this resolution an amendment was proposed, which was immediately seconded by the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. LEWIS;) and this also was a motion censuring me for giving color to an idea; then, immediately after, as nothing yet would answer the purpose, whisk came another resolution, changing the whole ground, and censuring me, not for what I had done, but for what I had not done; because, forsooth, I had given color to an idea. But the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EVANS) has anticipated me in most of the observations I proposed to make on this charge, and I shall say no more on that subject.

I did not get up soon enough to set all these gentlemen right, to show them the best way to censure me, and prevent them from running wild in the manner they had done, bringing forward resolutions in such rapid succession, but all of them, unfortunately for the movers, contrary to facts. I beg the honorable gentlemen (Messrs. LEWIS and THOMPSON) to remember that when I say there was not one word of truth in this last resolution of theirs, I do not intend to impeach their veracity; there are no two men in whom I would place more confidence, so far as to confide to them all that I possess; but I say that, in offering this resolution to the House, inflicting censure upon one who has never, in all his parliamentary career, given offence to them, they went a little beyond the bounds of that course of conduct which is due from one gentleman of this House to another; and I would only give them one word of friendly admonition, that, when in future, they may wish to censure me, they would first be careful to pay more attention to facts.

[Mr. LEWIS explained. He (Mr. L.) had risen in his place and inquired what was the character of the petition; this was full two hours before he had any idea that it was not a petition for abolition.]

Mr. ADAMS continued. He (Mr. A.) was extremely glad to admit the explanation, and he hoped the gentlemen would not feel it unkind when he only gave them his advice—advice from an old man addressed to those who were yet young; and that advice was, that when in future they charged others with crimes, first to be quite sure of their facts. But he would now call for another explanation from the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON;) and, if that gentleman and the House would permit him, he (Mr. A.) would read from the National Intelligencer the report of what he had said in the House, and would beg to ask that gentleman (Mr. THOMPSON) if the sentiments as here reported are really the expression of his own deliberate and reflected opinion.

“Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the House and the feelings of its members. Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave States, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as grand juries; and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment.”

[Mr. THOMPSON explained. He (Mr. T.) would state to the House that he had thought there was not one human being living who entertained the opinion that slaves had any right to petition, under any circumstances. When he (Mr. T.) first heard the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) it appeared to him (Mr. T.) that the gentleman had acted wilfully, until he afterwards heard him state differently. As to the other portion of the report, he (Mr. T.) had thought at the time it was a petition for the abolition of slavery which had been presented, on which account he had characterized it as he had done in the report. He (Mr. T.) spoke as a lawyer, and would observe that such is the law in South Carolina.]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. There, sir, stands the sentiment; there is the written record, in which the gentleman has threatened me with an indictment before the grand jury of the District of Columbia, as a felon and an incendiary, for words spoken in this House! And now the gentleman (Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina) has again avowed the sentiment, and declares that, if the petition had been such as he imagined, he would still not only call me, to the bar of this House, to be reprimanded by the Speaker, but, in addition to this, he would invoke the vengeance of a grand jury upon my head! Yes, sir, he (Mr. THOMPSON) would make a member of this House amenable to a grand jury! Such being the case, sir, I would beg to invite that gentleman, when he goes home, to study a little the first principles of civil liberty. As that gentleman appears here the representative of slaveholders, I should like to know, sir, how many others there are, if any, who are prepared to endorse his sentiments. If this House, sir, is come to this point; if a member of Congress, in presenting a petition, let it be for whatever object it may, is amenable, not to this House, sir, but to the grand jury of the District of Columbia; if this is the opinion of the slaveholding gentlemen, let it go before the nation; let the people know who they are who have uttered such a sentiment, and made such an avowal!

Censure of Mr. Adams.

[Mr. WISE rose and said he would not endorse that sentiment; if he (Mr. W.) thought that the members of the legislative branch were responsible to any tribunal, that of the grand and petit juries of the District of Columbia would be the last in the world he would wish to see this House (which represented the sovereign people of America) responsible to. This little tribunal of the District, to which it was proposed to subject the American people, in the persons of their representatives, was notoriously under the dictation and authority of the Executive, who already dictated both to the Senate and to this House.]

Mr. ADAMS, in continuation, replied. If the law of South Carolina is a good argument to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) and if a member of that Legislature is made amenable for words spoken in debate, not only to the Legislature, but also to the grand and petit juries—if that, sir, is the law of South Carolina, I thank God I am not a citizen of South Carolina! [Great agitation.]

In the kingdom of Great Britain, where the Speaker of the House of Commons is subject to be approved of by the King before his election is confirmed, even there, sir, the first thing the Speaker addresses to the King, after his election, is a demand of freedom of speech in the House; and the King never sends him, sir, to the grand or petit jury, to know how far the House is under liability for words spoken in debate. Such a sentiment, sir, uttered in this House, such a threat held out to the representatives of this nation, when it shall come before the world in the report of this debate, cannot fail to excite contempt and amazement; and it will be a matter of no less surprise that, when utterance was given to such a sentiment, it was not immediately rebuked by the Speaker. If, sir, a resolution of censure was ever called for, I know not what could more imperatively demand it than such a declaration made in this House. I know not what it could be possible to utter more proper to subject any member to be called to answer for as a gross contempt upon this House! What, sir! We, the representatives of the nation, are all of us subject to the grand jury of the District of Columbia for words here spoken? We from the Northern and Eastern States are liable, sir, to be indicted as felons and incendiaries for presenting petitions not exactly agreeable to some members from the South? Is that the tenure on which we hold our seats? If it is, I wish the House may pass the resolution that whoever hereafter proposes to hand up a petition from slaves is an enemy to the Union. If this, sir, is the condition of this House, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) has anticipated me in what I was going to say: If a grand jury, to which the gentleman (Mr. THOMPSON) proposes to make me amenable for things done in this House, constituted as in the nature of things a grand jury will be in this District—if they are to be the avengers of words spoken in this House, it will not be long before the gentleman himself will have to answer before a grand jury as an incendiary for things said not pleasing to the Executive! Let that gentleman, let every member, ask his own heart, with what confidence, with what peaceful ease, with what freedom, with what firmness, would he be able to give utterance to his real sentiments and opinions, if he felt, as he was speaking, that for every word, for every proposition, relating to human freedom, he was liable to be brought up for punishment as a felon before a grand jury of the District of Columbia? A jury, sir, of twelve men, appointed by a marshal, holding his office at the pleasure of the President! And this jury is to be the supreme judge of the sovereign American people, in the persons of their representatives!

I have dwelt, sir, so long upon this topic that, in order to spare the time of the House, I shall endeavor to abridge what remains for me to say. I do not know but that I should be willing to take the question on the whole proposition censuring me, without even saying one word in my own defence, leaving it entirely to the good sense and to the justice of the House. But it is not possible for me to pass over in silence the sentiment to which the honorable gentleman (Mr. THOMPSON) gave utterance, and which was not, as it ought to have been, immediately put down by the Speaker. Sir, I do not even yet know what is the answer of the House to the question propounded by myself; no question has been taken upon it; it does not yet appear what portion of the South assents to the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON.) It is not my desire, sir, to urge this point further than an imperative sense of what is my duty requires me to do, and, on this account, I repeat, I cannot pass it over in silence. If, when the gentleman, (Mr. THOMPSON,) instead of coming at once to a solution of that question, brought forward his resolution of censure against me—sir, if he thought to frighten me from my purpose—if that, sir, was his object, he mistook his man! I am not to be intimidated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) nor by all the grand juries in the universe. The right by which every member of this House holds his seat here is of the deepest and utmost importance to the whole nation; and I trust this debate will be read by every portion of the country, and that, among other astonishing things in this debate, the astonishing threat of the gentleman will not be unnoticed. We have heard, sir, of the great superiority of Anglo-Saxon blood. What, sir! is there a drop of that blood flowing in the veins of any man who will subscribe to such a political doctrine as this? How little does such a person understand of the true principles of freedom in relation to the powers of a legislative assembly! I would ask every member of this House, what would have been the issue if, in the British House of Commons, to which I have already alluded, one member of Parliament should tell another member that, for what he had said or done in Parliament, he should be made amenable to the grand jury of the city of Westminster? Sir, it would be too ridiculous for indignation; it would excite one universal shout of laughter; it would from thenceforth render him who had uttered the menace,

"Sacred to ridicule his whole life long,
And the sad burden of some merry song."

It is not possible for me to make my defence in any system or order. All that I say is unavoidably desultory, and I cannot find how to arrange a reply to charges made in such variety and disorder. When I take up one idea, before I can give color to the idea, it has already changed its form, and presents itself for consideration under other colors. The attack upon myself has assumed so many forms that I can compare it to nothing so well as to an actor on the stage, who changes his dresses and makes his appearance so frequently in different guise, that no one can tell that it is the same actor. Just so are all the resolutions, variable and changing, which charge me with giving color to an idea. If I were to plead guilty, what is the offence? Am I to be found guilty for giving color to an idea? Or, if I would defend myself, what excuse can be alleged? What defence can be made against this new crime of giving color to ideas? I am not able, therefore, to act as if I knew what was the cause which existed for passing censure upon me. But, I beg to say, I should deem it to be the heaviest calamity which has ever befallen me in the course of a life chequered with many vicissitudes, if a vote of censure from this House should pass upon my name, or upon any action of mine in this House. Yes, sir, I profess and avow that, in the whole course of my life, this would be what I should regard the heaviest of all calamities which had befallen me! And now, when I thus speak, am I treating with contempt this House? Have I ever done so? Has not the honor of this House been among the first and dearest sentiments of my heart? I have reverenced this House as the representatives of the whole people of this Union. I have further felt that sentiment which is called the esprit de corps. I appeal to this House if I have not been the first to come forward and defend its honor and dignity on more than one occasion. When members of this House, in the habit of voting differently from myself, were charged with liability to bribery, when it was said of them (and that by one to whom they are most devoted) that they would have been bribed, I, sir, was the first to vindicate the honor and integrity of the House, and to repel the foul accusation! Again, when other charges were made against the honor of this House, (from what quarter I will not say,) was I found backward in supporting its character? Are these instances of contempt? And now am I to be brought to the bar for a contempt of this House, for doing that which was done in the most respectful manner which it was possible to devise? For asking a question of the Speaker; consulting him first upon the admissibility of a petition by the rules of the House? If I am deserving censure for making this inquiry of the Speaker, your Speaker, who made the inquiry of the House, is much more deserving of censure. But if a majority of this House shall be found to pass censure on me, be it so; and if I have an enemy, let him know that he has triumphed; for a worse calamity could not befall me on earth.

My first objection to the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PARSONS) is, that it does not meet and answer my question. It does not say, if the House will receive a petition from slaves, or if it will not; that question, the original question, and the one still, as I think, before the House, is not met; we are left in the dark whether it is proper or not; no one knows. But suppose it is proper, where then is the offence in asking if it be proper? And suppose the House decide that it is improper, where then is the offence in ascertaining, in asking merely, what is the disposition of the House? Let this question be brought to a vote; I wish to record my vote on this subject; I consider it among my most imperative duties to do so; the liberty of every member of Congress depends upon the question; and let me say, if the House has any respect for itself, it will never pass such a vote as this, namely, that the House will refuse to receive a petition from slaves.

The next objection which I have to state against the resolution of censure is this: instead of answering the question put by me to the Chair, it turns upon the man; it runs away from the question, and fixes upon an ideal man, on "whosoever hereafter shall propose to present a petition from slaves," he, the ideal man, the future existence, "is an enemy to the Union." What is all that, sir, but the same in substance as the intimidation which was made by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) that whoever presented such a petition should be brought before the grand jury as incendiaries? It is a declaration, it is a menace, a threat, that any member who shall hereafter present a petition from persons held in slavery, be the object of the petition ever so reasonable, shall be amenable to punishment; it is a threat, a menace, a terrifying limitation to the freedom of speech and action in this House. If the vote pass, I, sir, shall submit, and will not present the petition; but, at the same time, I shall think that it is a most disgraceful resolution, surrendering up at once the rights of every man in this House. What member of Congress, sir, who thinks as I do, and who might present petitions from slaves, founded on just and reasonable grounds, would feel himself a free agent in this House? Not only he is interdicted from presenting such a petition, but, at the same time, his freedom of action is placed under limitation in this House. By such a step the whole question of liberty and independence is surrendered, is abandoned! If, by this resolution, you decide that a man is infamous for making a proposition in this House, which in itself is not unreasonable, but which gives offence only because it comes from a human being who is in a state of slavery—if you do this, when once you have taken this step, you may next expect resolutions declaring a member in the minority infamous for displeasing the majority.

Censure of Mr. Adams.

In reference to the second resolution, I not only do not assent to it, but I ask as a right of the House not to pass it. It is only a substitute for all the other resolutions of a stronger character, which appeared and disappeared, one after the other; all of them, however, calling me to the bar to answer, as if guilty of contempt towards the House. This resolution, however, goes upon the ground that I submit, that I plead guilty; and therefore, out of pure kindness, as I have acknowledged the offence, there is no necessity of further action in reference to me; it presumes that I have made concessions which I have not made, and that but for such supposed concessions, I ought to have been punished, for doing my duty in this House! If such a resolution as this were to pass, it would be said that, upon the most important question that ever came before the House since its first origin, I had received a pardon from the House—that the House had forgiven me. Forgive me, sir? What for? For any violation of the rules of the House? Was it a violation of the rules to ask the Speaker if a paper not presented came under the rules, and so might be presented? Was that a violation of the rules of the House? But suppose for a moment that it was a violation of any rule to ask a question of the Speaker, what was the duty of the Speaker? Ought he not to have answered the question, and to have said "No;" and that the paper I held in my possession it would be out of order to present? If the Speaker did not rebuke me, but said, as he did say, that it was a novel question, and that he would take the advice of the House, then, if I am to be indicted before the grand jury as a felon and an incendiary, the Speaker must be indicted along with me for putting to the advice of the House the question which he put to it: I only put the question to the Speaker, but the Speaker put the question to the House.

I am content that the whole question go before the nation as it is reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning. And here I will say that I am not conscious of having given the least particle of offence to the House, nor of having done any thing which I would not do over again. My conduct was dictated by a sense of duty, and in the same persuasion of what was my duty I remain still unshaken. But, sir, among other things alleged as reasons for censuring me, it has been said I have trifled with the House. I have already disclaimed, and again I not only disclaim any such intention, but I deny that any man in this House has ever had cause to believe that I ever trifled with the House. Such was not my intention; I never was more serious in any moment of my life; therefore, I am unwilling that a resolution should pass containing the declaration that the House ceased all further action on the subject because I made disclaimers. I renounce all advantages on the ground of my having made a disclaimer. While I totally disclaim any intention of trifling with the House, while I totally disclaim any purpose of offending or provoking any of the members of this House, while I totally disclaim any contemptuous course or any violation of the rules and orders of the House, sir, at the same time, I disclaim not any particle of what I have done; not a single word of what I have said do I unsay; nay, I am ready to do and to say the same again tomorrow. One word in conclusion: I would only beg the House and the country to exonerate me from the charge of consuming the time of the House here. If the House had suffered the petitions to be laid on the table with the multitude of petitions there already buried in oblivion, no one would have heard of it any more. As to the time occupied by me in presenting petitions, the whole time employed by me in the fulfilment of this great duty has never at any one time exceeded half an hour. If members have risen to obstruct me in doing my duty, raising questions and debating them interminably, I appeal to this House, I appeal to the nation, that it is not I who am answerable for this loss of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. GHOLSON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment.

Mr. BOULDIN called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 137.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were not ordered; and the main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote separately on each resolution.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, in the following words:

"1. Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this Union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union:"

And decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 105, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, William B. Calhoun, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Fowler, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Gillet, Granger, Grennell, Haley, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Herod, Hoar, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, William Jackson, Janes, Jarvis, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Logan, Love, Job Mann, Samson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Milligan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Patterson, D. Whittlesey—105.

So the first resolution was rejected.

Mr. PICKENS said as the first resolution had been rejected, he hoped the mover would withdraw the second.

The CHAIR replied that the resolution could not now be withdrawn.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to lay the second resolution on the table; which was pronounced to be out of order.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, which is as follows:

"2. Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House in the inquiry he made of the Speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the House was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease:"

And passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 137, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, John Calhoun, Carter, N. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Craig, Deberry, Dunlap, Gholson, Huntsman, Jenifer, Lawler, A. Mann, Maury, Peyton, Robertson, Shields, Standefer, Wagener, S. Williams—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Doubleday, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hamer, Hard, Hardin, Harper, Samuel S. Thomson, Turner, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, White, E. Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise—137.

John Quincy Adams excused.

So the second resolution was rejected.

A motion was then made by Mr. LANE that the House do adjourn; which was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 84.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Mr. WISE then rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for not adjourning. I will detain it but for a few moments, and I should not press the matter I have to bring to its notice at this time but for the fact that to-morrow, and, indeed, during the whole time of the sessions of the House, my duty will call my attention to the Select Committee of which I am a member, and from the character of the report itself. It is a report affecting a question of privilege.

I am directed, continued Mr. W., by the committee appointed on the 17th of January last, to report the following resolution, which, I will promise, was adopted by the unanimous vote of the committee. Mr. W. then read as follows:

Case of R. M. Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

"Reuben M. Whitney, who has been summoned as a witness before this committee, having, by letter, informed the committee of his peremptory refusal to attend, it becomes the duty of the committee to make the House acquainted with the fact; therefore,

Resolved, That the chairman be directed to report the letter of Reuben M. Whitney to the House, that such order may be taken thereon as the dignity and character of the House require."

Mr. W. reiterated the fact that this resolution had been unanimously adopted, and he sent to the Clerk's table the letter of the witness, together with another letter showing the manner in which the former had been communicated to the Select Committee.

[This letter was from the Hon. ABIJAH MANN, of New York; but, on application, it could not be obtained.]

Mr. W. continued. I will remark, sir, that by this communication from the member of the committee into whose hands the letter of the witness fell before it fell into mine, this letter of this contumacious witness reached the committee; but I could not, from self-respect, present it. Sir, I considered it disrespectful to the committee as much as to myself personally. I ask that it be read.

Mr. PEAROE, of Rhode Island, said, under the supposition that this subject would come up as the first business in order to-morrow morning, and as it was one that would be likely to produce debate, he moved that the House adjourn.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

The unfinished business was the report made last evening, from Mr. WISE, chairman of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the Executive Departments, stating that Reuben M. Whitney had refused to appear before the said committee; which report was accompanied by a letter from R. M. Whitney, and a memorial from him, sent for presentation to the Speaker on Monday last, but which was not presented, owing to the proceedings in the case of Mr. ADAMS.

The report concludes with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the chairman be directed to report the letter to the House, that such order may be taken as the dignity and character of the House require."

Mr. WISE asked that the communication of R. M. Whitney be now read, that the House might see what was its character, and take such steps as, in its judgment, might be necessary to defend its own dignity.

The letter and memorial having been read,

The SPEAKER said it was proper he should state that on Monday last, after the meeting of the House, a memorial of a similar character was laid on his table. It was not in order on that day for him to present it, nor had it been in order since.

Mr. LINCOLN then stated that, in the few remarks which he had to submit, he should make no reference to any proceedings which might have occurred in reference to the same individual before another select committee of this House.

He would offer the following series of resolutions for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney, in refusing to appear as a witness before a select committee of this House, acting by the authority of the House, under a resolution of the 17th January last, after being duly summoned thereto, has been guilty of a contempt of the committee and of the House.

Resolved, That the letter addressed by the said Reuben M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the notice of this House, declaring his determination peremptorily to decline to appear before any committee constituted in such manner and of such persons as the pleasure and judgment of the House shall designate, until the House, as a condition precedent, shall have redressed his supposed wrongs, both in the manner and style of communication, is contumacious, arrogant, and offensive; alike disrespectful to the House, and utterly subversive of its rightful authority.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House issue his warrant, directing the Sergeant-at-arms to take into custody the person of the said Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the House to answer for the contempt aforesaid.

Mr. LANE suggested that the resolution should be so modified as to give the sense of the House that Mr. Whitney ought to appear before the committee; and, if such should be declared to be the sense of the House, Mr. L. undertook to say that Mr. Whitney would appear and answer questions as he ought to answer them.

Mr. LINCOLN here modified his amendment, to read as follows:

Resolved, That whereas the select committee of this House, acting by the authority of the House under a resolution of the 17th of January last, has reported that R. M. Whitney peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-arms, to take into custody the body of Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the House, to answer for an alleged contempt of this House.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. PARKS, WISE, D. J. PEAROE, ROBERTSON, MERCER, LINCOLN, and A. MANN.

Mr. BOON moved the previous question; but there was no second.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, moved to amend the resolution by adding at the end thereof "and that he be allowed counsel, when brought to the bar, should he desire it."

The amendment was accepted by Mr. LINCOLN, as a modification.

Mr. CLAIBORNE then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. C.,) let no man call me the friend of Reuben M. Whitney. If he stood in that group, I could scarcely identify him. I am no lawyer, nor do I appear here as his advocate. I confess myself prejudiced against him. The many charges, mysterious and undefined, which have been brought against him here by gentlemen high in rank—the constant denunciations with which he has been visited—the glittering tomahawk which has been held over his head, like the sword of Damocles—have made upon my mind unfavorable impressions. There are other reasons, sir, which I will not name. But he is an American citizen, accused of a serious offence, and I demand counsel for him. Sir, I voted last session, time after time, in a minority, with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) for his committee of investigation. I voted uniformly for it this session; but I will not consent that a resolution shall pass to drag to this bar a free citizen of the republic, to be tried by those who are prejudiced against him, without securing to him the privilege of counsel. I denounce it as a high-handed and arbitrary proceeding, unworthy of the age in which we live, and disgraceful to the tribunal that sanctions it.

[Mr. LINCOLN here rose and accepted the amendment offered by Mr. CLAIBORNE.]

Mr. C. continued. I am glad that the gentleman has agreed to this act of justice. It removes from this proceeding its most obnoxious feature. But I doubt, if I do not deny, the propriety of dragging Whitney to this bar. I have my doubts whether he has been guilty of a contempt. Sir, your doctrine of contempt is a dangerous doctrine, that originated in times unfavorable to human liberty; in those old days of privilege and prerogative, when the rights of the citizen, if understood, were not defined, and when parliamentary bodies were used by Kings as instruments of oppression and persecution. The power of Congress to punish for contempts, if such a power exists at all, is not expressly conferred, but is incidental, and arises ex necessitate rei. Where is the clause in the constitution making the grant and defining a contempt? Sir, it is a constructive and incidental power. The powers and privileges of Congress are not, like those of the British Parliament, unlimited, undefined, and omnipotent; on the contrary, they are abridged and specific. Our courts of justice have the power to punish for contempts; but it is not a constructive power, arising out of the mere act that established them, but was conferred by a statute, restraining in its character, in 1789. The common law does not invest the federal courts with this power, nor can we derive it from the common law. As a system, the common law does not constitute any part of the law of the United States, according to the highest courts of the country; an opinion, too, upon which Congress has uniformly legislated. No department of Government can therefore derive any such authority from it. In 1831, after the memorable trial of Judge Peck, of Missouri, Congress deemed it necessary to define, by law, the nature of contempts of court.

Mr. TURRILL said, as the question which was about to be decided was a very important one, affecting the personal liberty of an American citizen, he rose for the purpose of asking for the yeas and nays, that he might have an opportunity of recording his vote against it; and, sir, (said Mr. T.,) while I am up, I will state some of the reasons for the vote I am about to give. I cannot remain silent; I should be guilty of a gross violation of my duty as a Representative on this floor, were I to sit by and see a citizen, however humble his condition, deprived of his liberty under the circumstances of this case, and not enter my protest against it.

What, I would ask, (said Mr. T.,) is the resolution under consideration? What does it propose to do? Sir, it directs the Speaker to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-arms, requiring him to take an humble citizen from his own fireside, from the bosom of his family, drag him, as a culprit, through the streets of this city, and as such hold him up at the bar of this House to the gaze of the nation—and for what? Yes, sir; for what, I would ask, (said Mr. T.,) is a private citizen to be thus dragged from his home? Why are his feelings and the feelings of his family to be outraged? Because, sir, he refuses, for reasons contained in his letter to the committee, to appear and give evidence. To his mind, at least, the reasons are sufficient to justify the course he has taken. From the papers on your table, Mr. Speaker, it appears that this individual, who is about to be taken into custody for an alleged contempt, complains that, while he was giving testimony before a committee of this House, in obedience to a summons, he was grossly insulted, and an outrageous assault was made upon his person by two members of that committee. It also appears, from the papers submitted to the House, that this witness has been waiting at the doors of this hall for a week or ten days, seeking an opportunity to present his petition to the House, asking an inquiry into the facts and circumstances connected with the assault thus made upon him, and praying the House to take measures to protect him from similar assaults in future; but during that time he has not been able to lay his memorial before the House.

Sir, (said Mr. T.,) I take a different view of this case from some gentlemen who have spoken upon it; they seem to think the witness has been guilty of a technical contempt, in refusing to appear before the committee, and that we cannot now inquire into the reasons assigned by him for not obeying the summons. We must wait, say they, until he is brought to the bar of the House; until he gives his reasons here, when arraigned to answer to the alleged contempt. Sir, (said Mr. T.,) I cannot subscribe to this doctrine.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

In the same letter, in which the witness refuses to appear before the committee, he gives the reasons why he cannot obey its summons. Those reasons are before us; and if, in our opinion, they are sufficient, he stands justified, and we have no right to bring him here to answer to a technical or an alleged contempt. Suppose (said Mr. T.) that the witness had returned for answer that he was confined to his bed by sickness, or that his wife or child was at the point of death, and he could not obey the summons; would you say that there had been a technical contempt? that you would not now pass upon the reasons given by the witness? Would you direct the Speaker to issue his warrant, requiring the Sergeant-at-arms to bring the witness from his sick bed, or from the dying couch of those most dear to him, to give his reasons here? Certainly not, sir. The House would say at once, without hesitation, that the reasons were sufficient, and that no contempt whatever had been committed.

In the case under consideration, the witness informs the House that he cannot, in his opinion, obey the summons, without subjecting himself to gross personal insult; that he cannot do it without even putting his life in jeopardy; and he states the facts and circumstances upon which that opinion is based. He invokes an inquiry into the accuracy of his statements. Now, sir, (said Mr. T.,) I, for one, have no hesitation in saying that, if all Whitney states in his communications be true, he was perfectly justifiable in refusing to appear before that or any other committee of this House, until the House itself shall, by some act on its part, show a fixed determination to maintain its own dignity, by extending the most ample protection to witnesses summoned to give testimony before its committees. The whole American people will justify him. Every individual in the nation will commend him for the course he has taken.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered.

The House was further addressed by Messrs. THOMSON of Ohio, GARLAND of Louisiana, HARDIN, WISE, PEYTON, ASHLEY, and JENIFER.

Mr. GUNSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am aware that there exists a variety of opinions as to the power of this House to punish acts not interrupting the proceedings of the House nor committed in its presence, as contempts. This resolution assumes the facts that a contempt had been committed, and that the House possesses the power to punish it; and it is now proposed that, without further inquiry, we shall deprive a citizen of his liberty, and direct our Sergeant-at-arms to seize and hold him in custody. I do not believe this House possesses any such power.

Mr. Speaker, I am of opinion that the report of the committee, upon which this proceeding is founded, is based upon the letter of Mr. Whitney, given to the House by the committee; and, as such, the House must, in coming to a conclusion, take into consideration the letter of Whitney, and the reasons given in that letter for his refusal to appear before the committee. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who deny the power of this House to punish for constructive contempts. I, sir, do not believe there is any power given to this House, by the constitution, to punish a citizen of this country for a constructive contempt growing out of his refusal to appear before a committee of this House, standing as the present witness does towards the chairman of that committee. Sir, there is no law giving authority to place an American citizen under duress under such circumstances; and I, sir, for one, never can give my consent to see authority exercised by this House that I do not believe it possesses. But it is said the exercise of this authority is necessary to the preservation of our rights. Sir, I think such a preservation of our rights as this promises, ere long, to take from us the rights we now have. Gentlemen talk of the rights and dignity of this House, and say they must be respected. I say to them that we, as the representatives of the people, come here with delegated powers, and are bound to keep within the pale of the constitution, which constitution is the palladium of our rights and liberties, and gives this House no power to place an American citizen in the custody of our Sergeant-at-arms for a constructive contempt. Sir, after the proceeding of this House in relation to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and his petition from thirty-two slaves, what is this House to consider a contempt?

Sir, it is contemptuously asked by honorable gentlemen on this floor, who is the contemptuous Reuben M. Whitney? I answer, that I know him only as an American citizen; and, as such, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the constitution. I ask gentlemen, in return, from what source do they derive the power to place him in custody? I tell gentlemen, at the outset, that precedents from the British Parliament cannot be received by me as authority for the arrest of an American citizen. I, sir, have the honor to represent in part the highly honorable, democratic, and patriotic people of Mississippi; a people who, from the democratic character of their institutions, are known to be tenacious of their rights; and I cannot, as their representative, sit idly here and see one known to possess the high and exalted privileges of an American citizen arrested by order of this House, brought as a prisoner to answer at the bar, without attempting to arrest the course of usurpation, and exercise of such usurped power, on the part of this House, over the rights of the people.

Sir, the doctrine contained in the parliamentary annals of Great Britain, and given in the precedents of the House of Commons, is utterly repugnant to the spirit and genius of our republican institutions. The English law of privilege, and the power of the British parliament to punish for contempts, is undefined, unlimited, and unknown to the subject except as particular cases occur, in which Parliament, in their omnipotent discretion, choose to exercise it. Thus it is that the infliction of punishment is the first evidence of the existence of the rule under which it is inflicted.

Mr. Speaker, let us inquire for a moment into the circumstances under which it is proposed to bring Mr. Whitney before this House.

Sir, by the very terms of the resolution under which we are to act, it is for an alleged contempt, and that allegation sustained only by construction. Sir, the honorable chairman of the committee before whom Mr. Whitney has refused to appear, and for which refusal this proceeding is instituted, has, according to his reported speech, made on this floor, asserted that he would, on a certain occasion, and that, too, whilst he was acting as a member of a committee appointed by the order of this House, and at a time this witness, Whitney, was before that committee as a witness, and whilst this honorable chairman was acting in a judicial capacity, have taken the life of this witness if he had moved his hand. Yes, sir, if he had moved his arm one inch, even in his own defence, the honorable chairman of this committee informs us that he would have taken his life; and that in defence of his friend, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who, he states, was rushing upon Whitney.

[Here Mr. Wise explained.]

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman's explanation amounts to the same thing that I had stated; he admits that his friend, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, was advancing upon Whitney, whilst Whitney was before the committee as a witness. Sir, I am not to be deterred by the honorable gentleman's implied threat, nor by his imputation and "insinuation" that I had misquoted him.

[The SPEAKER had not understood the honorable gentleman from Virginia to make any threat, or he would have interposed; and that the gentleman from Mississippi must not make personal allusions.]

Mr. Speaker, I shall, in arguing this question, pursue the same course that other gentlemen have pursued on this floor. I assure the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that if he expects to intimidate me, he has mistaken his man. I shall pursue my own course, without regard to his implied threat. Then, sir, what is the distinguishing difference in the statement first given, and the one now given by the honorable gentleman who is chairman, and before whom Whitney refuses to appear? In either event, the life of Whitney was to be taken, even if he defended himself against the honorable gentleman from Tennessee; and it is for this that gentlemen say he has been guilty of a contempt of this House. Sir, I am not prepared to force a witness before a committee, when the chairman of that committee stands in such relation towards the witness as the honorable chairman does in this instance. Then, I ask, is it a contempt of this House for a witness to refuse to appear before a committee of this House under such circumstances; and has this House the power, and will we be acting in accordance with the authority vested in us by the constitution, to have the witness brought to the bar of this House to answer for such refusal? I certainly think, upon examination, it will be found that this House possesses no such power.

Mr. McKEON said that, intending to vote in the negative on the question which had been submitted to the consideration of the House, he was aware that he thereby would subject himself to the censures (if such they might be called) of his friend from Maryland (Mr. JENIFER) who had just taken his seat. He (Mr. McK.) saw in the case before him not that of Reuben M. Whitney. He passed by Mr. Whitney. He viewed the matter in a broader light. He saw in it the proposal to arrest an American citizen. It involved the decision of a principle which would be capable of striking down not only the humblest but the highest in the nation. It called into action the exercise of a power which was to be felt not only within the circle of this District, but from Maine to Louisiana, wherever the jurisdiction of this confederacy might operate. It carried with it the means of dragging any man from his home, his family, his business, to answer the behest of a majority of this House. I ask gentlemen (said Mr. McK.) whether the individual who is now before us is not, so far as the knowledge of this House is concerned, a private citizen? So far as we yet know, he has no connection with your departments. I ask the gentleman from Maryland whether the person alluded to is not a private citizen, covered by our laws, and protected by our constitution. I understand my friend to yield his assent to this point. Well, sir, under your constitution, his liberty, his life, his property, his papers, are secured; and yet, under the power claimed during this debate, and proposed to be exercised, what security had he, or any other man, against an invasion of his rights? Opposed, as I have ever been, to the doctrine of contempts, I would ask gentlemen what must be the consequences of their insisting on this right?

Suppose, sir, your committee had sent its mandate to one of my constituents, whose business would not allow him, without sacrifice, to obey the command, he would naturally ask under what law he was bound to obey. I may be told that he would be guilty of contempt, at least of constructive contempt of the House, by refusing to obey the summons. Sir, I told you, when your committee was formed, that in many cases it would be powerless. That committee never could have a contempt committed against it by refusal to obey its orders. Your rules say that subpoenas and warrants shall be under the Speaker's hand. We are told that the subpoena, in this case, was under the hand of the chairman of your Select Committee. But, again, it is insisted that you have given the power to send for persons and papers. By what authority can this House delegate its power, if such it has, to any portion of this body. The House itself only holds its own powers by delegation. No, sir; there could be no contempt by a refusal to obey this summons. I know I shall astonish the member who has just addressed you when I assert that I have no doubt of the want of power of the committee in this matter; and I very much doubt the power of this House, at least without the sanction of a law, to drag an individual before our bar for a contempt of this nature. Issue your warrant, and deliver it to your Sergeant-at-arms; if its execution is resisted, can he call, as a ministerial officer of a court, for assistance? I should think not. You have no guards to enforce your order, and it will be inoperative. The system of privileges and contempts has grown up in this country by assimilating the powers of this House to those of the British House of Commons. A system has been claimed and exercised in England under what is known as parliamentary law. Its encroachments have been silently, but steadily, made upon the mass of the people, until precedents of the most appalling character can be found. The analogy in the cases of contempt does not hold good. This House, as a portion of the Government, obtains its power from the constitution. In that instrument the privileges of the members of this House are defined, and the rights of this House are pointed out clearly and distinctly.

Right of Petition.

I regret, sir, the allusion made to the President. Why is his name brought into this discussion? This is not a case which any party should endeavor to make use of for any purpose. We are establishing a precedent—a precedent which, if it reaches some one without these walls to-day, will hereafter be brought to bear, perhaps, upon some of us. It is a question involving the most momentous consequences, and reaches to every man in the country, no matter to what party he may be attached. The President's letter, referred to by the gentleman from Maryland, will speak for itself, and justice be awarded to its author by an intelligent people. He seeks no concealment. If he has resisted an attempt to invade the private affairs of our citizens, he deserves the thanks of the country. Sir, I will detain the House no longer. No man will go further than I will to defend the rights and privileges of this House; but I never will advance over the prostrated rights of the people. When gentlemen talk of the rights and privileges of this House, I must be heard in defence of those rights and privileges of the people which, in my opinion, are of paramount consequence. I never will, as a member of this House, arrogate powers which shall be dangerous to public and private security. I never will call into action powers at best doubtful, and which can only be exercised by invading the rights and privileges of the American people.

Mr. ADAMS then asked to be excused from voting, for the following reasons, which were sent in writing to the Chair:

Mr. ADAMS requested to be excused from voting upon this and every other question of privilege affecting Reuben M. Whitney—the personal relations between him and that individual having long been such as to make it the duty of Mr. ADAMS to decline acting as his judge upon any question affecting his personal rights.

Mr. ADAMS asked that this statement might be entered on the journal; to which the SPEAKER replied that it would, as a matter of course, be entered on the journal.

And the question was then taken on the adoption of the modified resolution of Mr. LINCOLN, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 85.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

SATURDAY, February 11.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, so much of the journal was stricken out as contained the reasons assigned by Mr. ADAMS yesterday for asking to be excused from voting on any resolution involving the personal rights of Mr. Reuben M. Whitney, and which reasons had been entered on the journal.

Election of President of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS, from the joint committee appointed to wait on Martin Van Buren, of New York, and inform him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th of March, 1837, reported: That the committee, in conformity with the directions of the House, had, on yesterday, waited on the President elect, and informed him that the votes for President of the United States had been counted by the two Houses of Congress, in the manner prescribed by the constitution; that he had received a majority of all the votes given, and was duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1837.

Mr. Van Buren expressed, in reply, his grateful sense of the distinguished honor which his fellow-citizens had conferred upon him, and requested us to assure our respective Houses that they might rely on his unceasing efforts to execute the responsible trust about to devolve upon him, in a manner the most conducive to the public interest.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Right of Petition.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas the vote of the House, taken on the 9th of February, the following resolution, viz "Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union;" may be construed into an expression of opinion upon the abstract question of the right of slaves to petition Congress; therefore,

Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the constitution.

[An extended debate took place on these resolutions, in which Messrs. Ingersoll, Taylor, Pinckney, Cambreleng, Mann of New York, Patton, Chambers of Kentucky, Ashley, Lewis, Lane, Parker, Underwood, Gideon Lee, Pickens, Anthony, Sutherland, Bynum, Bouldin, Waddy Thompson, Howard, Harrison of Missouri, Adams, Granger, Vanderpoel, Cave Johnson, and Haley, took part. Finally—]

A division of the question having been ordered, the first resolution, as modified, was then taken up, as follows:

"An inquiry having been made, by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, whether a paper, which he held in his hand, purporting to be a petition from certain slaves, and declaring themselves slaves, came within the order of the House of the 18th of January, and the said paper not having been received by the Speaker, he stated that, in a case so extraordinary and novel, he would take the advice and counsel of the House.

"Resolved, That this House cannot receive the said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the South and West, and the Constitution of the United States."

The question being taken thereon, it was adopted, by a vote of yeas 160, nays 35.

The second resolution was then taken up, as follows:

"Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the constitution."

Mr. HALEY moved to lay it on the table. Lost, without a division.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alford, Chilton Allan, Ash, Ashley, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Bunch, Burns, Bynum, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. So the second resolution was adopted.

[When the name of Mr. Wise was called, that gentleman rose in his place and declined to vote, for the reason that he held that Congress had no power to interfere, in any way, with the subject of slavery.]

Case of R. M. Whitney.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the Sergeant-at-arms, in obedience to the order of the House and the warrant of the Speaker, had arrested Reuben M. Whitney, who was then in custody, and waiting the order of the House.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney, now in the hands of the Sergeant-at-arms, be brought to the bar of this House, to answer for an alleged contempt of the House, in peremptorily refusing to appear and give evidence as a witness on a summons duly issued by a select committee, acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of the 17th of January last, in the matter of a letter, expressing said refusal, addressed by the said R. M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the House; and that he be forthwith furnished with a copy of the report of said committee and of the letter aforesaid.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, February 13.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

The SPEAKER announced that Reuben M. Whitney, now in custody for an alleged contempt of the authority of the House, was without the bar, waiting the further pleasure of the House.

The Chair also stated that the accused had been furnished with copies of the papers referred to in the resolution adopted on Saturday last.

Mr. PATTON moved that the Sergeant-at-arms

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Case of R. M. Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

be directed to bring the prisoner to the bar of the House; which motion prevailed.

The accused having been placed at the bar, the SPEAKER addressed him as follows:

"Reuben M. Whitney: You have been brought before the House, by its order, to answer the charge of an alleged contempt of this House, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this House, which committee had, by an order of the House, power to send for persons and papers.

"Before you are called upon to answer in any manner to the subject-matter of this charge, it is my duty, as the presiding officer of this House, to inform you that, by an order of the House, you will be allowed counsel, should you desire it. If you have any request to make in relation to this subject, your request will now be received and considered by the House. If, however, you are now ready to proceed in the investigation of the charge, you will state it, and the House will take order accordingly."

To which the accused replied, that he held in his hand a paper in relation to the charge, which he respectfully requested might be received and read.

The following paper was then read:

"The undersigned answers that his refusal to attend the committee, upon the summons of its chairman, was not intended or believed by him to be disrespectful to the honorable the House of Representatives, nor does he now believe that he thereby committed a contempt of the House.

"His reason for refusing to attend the committee are truly stated in his letter to that committee.

"He did not consider himself bound to obey a summons issued by the chairman of the committee.

"He had attended, in obedience to such a summons, before another committee, voluntarily, and without objections to the validity of the process; and would have attended in the same way before the present committee, but for the belief that he might thereby be exposed to insult and violence.

"He denies, therefore, that he has committed a contempt of the House, because—

"First. The process upon him was illegal, and he was not bound to obey it. And

"Secondly. Because he could not attend without exposing himself thereby to outrage and violence.

"If the House shall decide in favor of the authority of the process, and that the respondent is bound to obey it, then he respectfully asks, in such case, that, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed, as known to the House, the committee may be instructed to receive his testimony upon interrogatories to be answered on oath before a magistrate, as has been done in other instances in relation to other witnesses; or that the committee be instructed to prohibit the use or introduction of secret and deadly weapons in the committee room during the examination of the witnesses.

"And in case he shall think it necessary, he prays to be heard by counsel, and to be allowed to offer testimony on the matters herein submitted.

"R. M. WHITNEY."

Mr. GHOLSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House, in relation to his alleged contempt.

[A debate then took place, chiefly on points of order and the mode of proceeding, in which Messrs. Haynes, Lincoln, Gholson, Mercer, Patton, Bouldin, McKay, Hoar, Huntsman, Mann of New York, Mason of Ohio, Vanderpoel, Lane, Calhoun, and Bell, took part.]

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend Mr. GHOLSON's resolution, by adding the following:

"And that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to examine such witnesses on the part of the House."

Mr. GHOLSON accepted the modification.

The question then recurring on the original resolution,

Mr. PARKS said that he, as well as the gentleman from Indiana, was opposed to bringing this individual before the House; but, as he was brought there, they owed it to the gentleman himself, and to the House, that he have a hearing. The motion pending was, that a committee of five be appointed to examine witnesses on the part of the House; and for the purpose of settling the question, and of ascertaining whether they would lay it aside, or go on with it, he moved the previous question.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed to Mr. PARKS to withdraw the motion for a moment; which he did; when Mr. G. accepted of the amendment of Mr. CHAPIN; and

Mr. PARKS then renewed the motion for the previous question; which was seconded by the House—yeas 97, nays 33; and the main question having been ordered, was put, and carried, without a division.

So the resolution, as modified, was agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER then announced the committee; and Mr. Whitney was again brought in, the order read to him, and he put in a list of witnesses he requested to be summoned.

Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution in relation to Mr. Whitney was adopted; but the motion was negatived—yeas 92, nays 95.

The respondent was then removed from the bar, and the House proceeded to the consideration of other business.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Mr. Whitney having been placed at the bar, and stated his readiness to proceed at once to trial,

The SPEAKER then addressed the respondent, and informed him that, by an order of the House, he was then permitted to examine witnesses before the House, in relation to the alleged contempt against him, and that he could then proceed to do so. The Speaker further informed him that the witnesses he had named had been summoned.

Mr. Key, one of the counsel of the accused, asked that the witnesses be now sworn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND objected to the swearing of Mr. Lewis and Mr. Sullivan at that time, because he understood they would be brought forward to testify as to the character of the accused, and that question had not yet come up.

The witnesses who were members of the House, as before stated, were then sworn, and the swearing of the other gentlemen deferred for the present.

The honorable Mr. FAIRFIELD was then called, and the following question propounded to him by Mr. Key:

Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee, whereof Mr. GARLAND is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and PEYTON as members of the committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then sent to the Clerk's table the following answer to the first interrogatory:

At the commencement of the affair alluded to in the question, the different members of the committee were situated as follows, as near as I can recollect: Mr. Whitney sat at a small table in a corner of the room, near the fireplace; Mr. Peyton, Mr. Garland, Mr. Hamer, and Mr. Gillet, sat at a long table, placed transversely in front of the fire, Mr. Hamer at the end nearest Mr. Whitney, Mr. Gillet at the opposite end, and Mr. Garland and Mr. Peyton in front, the latter nearest to Mr. Whitney, and with his back turned, or partially so, towards him—one proposing interrogatories, and the other answering, in writing; the questions and answers being handed to the chairman, and by him read to the committee. Mr. Wise, Mr. Martin, and myself, were sitting upon a sofa at the side of the fireplace opposite Mr. Whitney. Mr. Pierce and Mr. Johnson were not present.

When the chairman read the answer of Mr. Whitney to the interrogatory of Mr. Peyton, both of which have been published, the latter turned towards Mr. Garland, without rising from his seat, and said, "Mr. Chairman, I wish you to inform this witness that he is not to insult me in his answers; if he does, God damn him, I will take his life upon the spot." He then rose and turned towards Mr. Whitney, and said, "I want you to understand, sir, that I claim no protection from the constitution; and if you insult me, you damned dog, I will take your life." Mr. Wise rose, and advanced to the side of Mr. Peyton, and, addressing himself to Mr. Whitney, said, "Yes, this damned insolence is insufferable." Mr. Garland and other members of the committee were, during this time, endeavoring to preserve order and to prevent an affray. Mr. Peyton turned from Mr. Whitney, and, standing with his back to the fire, said, by way of soliloquy, or without addressing himself to any one in particular, "Hitherto I have treated him with marked respect—damn him—I have treated him just as if he had been a gentleman; to be thus insulted by a damned thief and robber! damn him, he shan't do it." While uttering the last words of this sentence, he became, apparently, more excited, and turned towards Mr. Whitney, who rose and said he claimed the protection of the committee while he was before it, when Mr. Peyton said, "God damn you, you shan't speak—you shan't say a word while you are in this room; if you do, I will put you to death," and made towards him, at the same time putting his hand in his bosom. Mr. Wise, who had previously gone round the long table, and placed himself near Mr. Whitney, here interposed; and he, with Mr. Garland, who was standing between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney, and Mr. Martin, who was by his side, endeavored to calm him, and to prevent his going towards Mr. Whitney. Mr. Wise said, "Don't, Peyton; damn him, he is not worth your notice," or words to that effect. Judge Martin here moved that the examination of the witness be suspended. Mr. Hamer opposed it; and, addressing himself to the chairman, went on to make some remarks, but I do not distinctly recollect them.

Mr. Peyton then resumed his seat, but soon turned towards Mr. Whitney, and said, "Damn him, his eyes are on me. God damn him, he is looking at me—he shan't do it—damn him, he shan't look at me." Mr. Hamer made some further remarks, when Mr. Garland suggested that the witness should retire to another room; which he did. Mr. Peyton then apologized to the committee, and Mr. Hamer offered the resolution which has been published; on the passage of which, Mr. Whitney was recalled, and the resolution was communicated to him by the chairman. Mr. Whitney said, that if he had done any thing which the committee considered disrespectful, he regretted it, and apologized for it. Another interrogatory was proposed to him, which he answered; and then the committee rose.

Second question by Counsel. What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indecorum or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer. With the exception of the answer in writing of Mr. Whitney, which was the subject of a resolution introduced by Mr. Hamer, and adopted by the committee, I saw nothing of any indecorum or disrespect on his part, to the committee, or any member of it; nor did

Case of R. M. Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

I, at any time, except as above, and prior to the affair alluded to, hear any complaint on the part of any member of the committee.

Third question by Counsel. Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unhappy scene in question, was or was not cool, collected, and forbearing; whether he did or did not manifest, by deed, word, or gesture, or by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. Peyton. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner as may go to show whether he meditated assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Answer to the third interrogatory. So far as I saw or heard, upon the occasion alluded to, the conduct of Mr. Whitney was cool, collected, and forbearing. I heard him say nothing but what I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory. In regard to the extent of what I saw, it is proper to add that, during nearly the whole time, several gentlemen were standing or moving between myself and Mr. Whitney. My attention, also, was principally confined to Mr. Peyton. I cannot say that Mr. Whitney did not assume any attitude of assault towards Mr. Peyton; but I can say that, if he did, I did not see it.

First question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky. Did or did not Mr. Wise endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney, by stepping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. Peyton, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer. Mr. Wise did interfere, as I have stated in my first answer; he laid his hand upon Mr. Peyton's breast, and endeavored to prevent any collision between him and Mr. Whitney. I do not, however, recollect that he pushed him back.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky. Did or did not Mr. Wise privately request the members of the committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. Peyton being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? And did not Mr. Wise, at the same time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer. I answer affirmatively to the whole question.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky. Did Mr. Wise do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. Peyton, did he do more than to say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer. Mr. Wise did no more than what I have described in my first answer. His object in going round the long table, and taking his stand near Mr. Whitney, I only know from his (Mr. Wise's) statement made in this House. I did not, at the time, regard it as assuming an attitude of attack upon Mr. Whitney.

Fourth question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky.

Did or did not Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. Peyton had occurred? And did not his examination occupy much more time; and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. Peyton after the difficulty occurred?

Answer. I answer affirmatively to the whole question, except as to the order of time in which the questions were proposed to Mr. Whitney. In regard to that I do not recollect distinctly.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky. Had you or had you not seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January last, which is as follows:

"A CARD.—During the last session of Congress, it became necessary for me to expose H. A. Wise of having stated, in the hall of the House, a base falsehood in relation to myself.

"In the Globe of this morning it is reported that Balie Peyton, the Siamese companion of Wise, for twelve months past, in uttering falsehood and slander, said that, 'in consequence of the character of the agent alluded to, Mr. Taney, the former Secretary of the Treasury, would not recommend him as an agent of the deposit banks.' No one can mistake that it is myself alluded to by Mr. P.

"I challenge Mr. Peyton to adduce a single particle of proof to sustain the above assertion; and, for having made it without proof, I pronounce him a calumniator, and guilty of uttering a base falsehood; this, too, like Wise, while shielded by his constitutional privilege.

"If any one who does not know me wishes to ascertain my character, I refer them to citizens of those places in which I have passed many years of my life.

"R. M. WHITNEY.

"Wednesday, 4th January, 1837."

And do you not know or believe that Mr. Peyton had seen said card, or was informed of its contents? And did not the answer to the question which preceded the difficulty involve the truth of the charges which the card of Mr. Whitney pronounced to be false, and for the uttering of which he pronounced Mr. Peyton a calumniator?

Answer. I had seen the card of Mr. Whitney, alluded to, and believe, from a remark I heard Mr. Peyton make in the committee room, that he also had seen it. The question referred to, as proposed by Mr. Peyton, I did regard as involving the truth of the charges which called out the card of Mr. Whitney.

First question by Mr. INGERSOLL. What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. Peyton?

Answer. I do not know that Mr. Peyton interposed at all, as I understand that word. I cannot, therefore, answer the question as to the language used by Mr. Whitney.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL. What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the witness says "Mr. Peyton rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer. If the question refers to what was said, my answer is, that Mr. Whitney said nothing that I recollect. If it refers to the written answer of Mr. Whitney, I cannot answer it without referring to the journal of the committee. It has, however, been correctly published.

Question by Mr. BELL. When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remark made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer. I recollect that Mr. Peyton took his seat, but cannot say whether it was when called to order by the chairman. I do not recollect of Mr. Whitney's rising but once prior to his withdrawing; and that, according to my present recollection, was before the time alluded to in this question.

First question by Committee. Was or was not the deportment of Mr. Peyton that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remarks and conduct?

Answer. Mr. Peyton, as I have before stated, treated Mr. Whitney with respect prior to the time of this difficulty. After the answer of Mr. Whitney was read by the chairman, Mr. Peyton was very much excited, and at one time, certainly, appeared to be disposed to punish Mr. Whitney for his alleged insult.

Second question by Committee. What was the question put to Mr. Whitney, and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory; and what was the vote of the committee, also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory; and will you now set them forth, to be received in connection with, and as part of, your answer to said interrogatory?

[Time given to witness to answer the foregoing second question of Committee.]

Second question of Mr. BELL. When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, cutting him off from Reuben M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with his left foot advanced?

Answer. I do not recollect when Mr. Peyton rose the second time, but think it was not until Mr. Whitney retired, or about that time. When Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, he had just turned from a standing posture, as I have described in my answer to the first interrogatory. I doubt whether at that time I could see Mr. Whitney's right hand; but if I could, I do not recollect of seeing it in the position described by the question. My answer is the same with regard to Mr. Whitney's left foot.

Third question of Mr. BELL. Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer. At the time the answer of Mr. Whitney was handed to the chairman, I sat nearly opposite Mr. Whitney, with nothing interposing. My attention, however, was fastened almost entirely upon Mr. Peyton.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL. Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer. I do not recollect that he did.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL. If it had been Mr. Peyton's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer. He had.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL. What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after, the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he reappeared before the said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after as before that occurrence.

Answer. That part of the question relating to the number of interrogatories, and the time when they were proposed, I will answer after I have had an opportunity to refer to the journal of the committee. I did not apprehend insult or personal violence to Mr. Whitney, on the part of Mr. Peyton or Mr. Wise, when the former reappeared in the committee room. Mr. Peyton's excitement had then subsided. I have already stated that, prior and subsequent to this occurrence, Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treated Mr. Whitney respectfully in the committee room.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL. Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel? And was it not remarked by Mr. Peyton, that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer. There is such a rule; but I do not recollect the remark of Mr. Peyton supposed in the question.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL. Had or had not said witness refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one above alluded to, characterizing them as inquis-

Case of R. M. Whitney.

itorial, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer. Mr. Whitney had refused to answer many questions proposed by Mr. Peyton, characterizing them as inquisitorial. Though the committee permitted these questions to be put, I understood that the committee reserved the question as to the obligation of the witness to answer them, in case he did not choose voluntarily to do so.

The Sergeant-at-arms was then directed to conduct Mr. Whitney from the bar.

THURSDAY, February 16.

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Mr. Whitney being placed at the bar of the House, the examination of the honorable Mr. FAIRFIELD was continued.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL. What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before and how many after the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he reappeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after as before that occurrence.

Answer. Prior to the difficulty alluded to in the question, Mr. Whitney had appeared before the committee, January, 12th, 13th, and 14th, when fourteen interrogatories were propounded to him, principally by Mr. Peyton. On the 25th, ten interrogatories were propounded, the eighth being the one which called forth the offensive answer. He appeared before the committee again on the 26th of January, when thirty-eight interrogatories were propounded, all by Mr. Peyton but one.

Mr. GHOULSON's second question in behalf of the committee. What was the question put to Mr. Whitney, and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory; and what was the vote of the committee, also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory; and will you now set this forth, to be received in connection with, and as part of, your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer. The question and answer alluded to were as follows, viz: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?"

"Answer. I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with 'or did he,' &c., therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof."

The vote of the committee was, "that the foregoing answer to the 15th question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory and disrespectful to a member of the committee."

Ninth question of Mr. BELL. Did not the resolution of the committee, returning the answer of the witness (Whitney) as disrespectful to a member of the committee, pass without a dissenting voice?

Answer. It did.

Tenth question of Mr. BELL. Look upon the journal of the committee, at page 84, and say on what day the 15th interrogatory was propounded. Did not said witness (Whitney) return and continue his examination, as has been stated in your answer just given? Look upon the journal at page 103, and state whether said witness did not voluntarily return and file written communications, as set forth in pages from 99 to 102, inclusive, as follows, namely: [Here follows a correspondence between R. M. Whitney, J. C. Wilkins, J. D. Beers, and John Tillson, jr.] State whether Mr. Peyton did not propound to said witness two other interrogatories at page 103, and receive answers as therein set forth, in addition to the questions and answers alluded to in your last answers.

Answer. The fifteenth interrogatory was propounded January 25th. Mr. Whitney returned, and the examination was continued, as I have before stated. Mr. Whitney also voluntarily returned and filed the communications, as set forth in pages from 99 to 102, inclusive, as supposed in the question. Two other questions were proposed at this time by Mr. Peyton, as set forth in page 103 of the journal of the committee. They were accidentally omitted by me in my former answer, not having received the printed journal beyond the 96th page.

Eleventh question of Mr. BELL. Did Mr. Peyton take any exception to that part of his answer which alleges an insinuation in interrogatories Nos. 40 and 42, propounded by him?

Answer. Not to my recollection.

Twelfth question of Mr. BELL. Please examine the interrogatories propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, (Whitney,) and the answers thereto, commencing with No. 1, and including the following numbers designated by a cross on the copy of the journal of the committee herewith furnished, and say if the course of the witness was not considered disrespectful to the committee, and especially to Mr. Peyton.

Answer. I did not consider the answers of Mr. Whitney, alluded to, as disrespectful either to the committee or Mr. Peyton, inasmuch as my opinion has been, from the beginning, that he was under no legal obligation to answer the interrogatories, or most of them; and as I consider the term "inquisitorial" to be used in a technical sense, and not with a disposition to be uncourteous to the committee, or any member of it.

Thirteenth question of Mr. BELL. Did not Chief Justice Taney, in his evidence before the committee, disprove the allegation of the witness in his letter to Mr. Duane, late Secretary of the Treasury, so far as relates to his having, at any time, recommended him (Whitney) as a fit person to be an agent of the deposit banks or of the Treasury?

Answer. Chief Justice Taney's evidence is not before me, and, if it were, it might perhaps be questioned whether it was competent for me to say what degree of evidence amounts to proof. For a further answer of the question, I refer to the letter of Mr. Whitney, and the answers of Mr. Taney, alluded to in the question, both of which are in the possession of the committee.

Fourteenth question of Mr. BELL. How far was Mr. Peyton sitting from the witness (Whitney) at the time of the commencement of the occurrence to which you have alluded? State, also, whether Mr. Peyton was not sitting nearer to the witness than any other member of the committee. State, also, whether Mr. Peyton was not standing still at the time he had his hand in his bosom, and when Mr. Wise approached him.

Answer. At the commencement of the occurrence alluded to, Mr. Peyton was sitting within a few feet of Mr. Whitney, say three to six feet, and was nearer Mr. Whitney than any other member of the committee. I think Mr. Peyton was not standing still at the time named in the question, but was endeavoring to advance, and was resisted in so doing principally by Mr. Wise.

Fifteenth question of Mr. BELL. Have you, or any other person, to your knowledge, had any conversation with the said R. M. Whitney since the occurrence in the committee? If so, did he inform you then that he was alarmed, and that his fears had induced him to take the course which he has done in this matter? State all he said in relation to his fears, or the motives which induced his course upon this occasion.

Answer. I do not know what conversation others have had with Mr. Whitney upon this subject. I have had none. I had no acquaintance with Mr. Whitney prior to being appointed on the select committee, and have since carefully abstained from conversation with him. Upon one occasion, however, since the occurrence of the 25th of January, I was in the company of Mr. Whitney a few minutes, who made some remarks upon the subject, not addressed to me particularly. So far as I can recollect them, they were, in substance, that he was not afraid of Mr. Peyton, at the time alluded to; that he (Whitney) was not armed at the time, but intended, if Mr. Peyton had drawn a weapon, to have sprung forward, caught his arm, and flung him into the fireplace. This was before he had sent a petition to the House, and before his arrest for an alleged contempt.

First question of Mr. RENCHER. In the subsequent examinations before the committee to which R. M. Whitney was pleased to submit, after the occurrence between him and Mr. Peyton, did he exhibit fears of personal violence from Mr. Wise, or from any other member of the committee?

Answer. I have seen no indications of fear on the part of Mr. Whitney.

Second question of Mr. RENCHER. Was the conduct of Mr. Wise, or any other member of the committee, calculated to create such fears?

Answer. Excepting the time of the occurrence of the 25th of January, I answer negatively.

Fourth question by Counsel. Did Mr. Wise at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going round the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? If yea, what did he say was his purpose? And was the statement of Mr. Wise, as to his purpose in that movement, before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed?

Answer. I was not present when Mr. Wise made the statement alluded to, in this House, on I think Saturday, the 4th of February. My information was derived from conversation with members who were present, and from the report of his remarks in the Globe and Intelligencer of this city. I think the testimony of Mr. Whitney had closed prior to that time.

Fifth question by Counsel. In your foregoing answers, touching the interrogatories propounded to Mr. Whitney before the committee, do you refer to any questions put to Mr. Whitney by Mr. Peyton, or by others of the committee, or to any of his answers or refusals to answer, but what are recorded in the journal of the committee, and found in the printed copy of that journal referred to in the foregoing interrogatories; and is that a copy printed by order of the committee? If so, annex the whole of it to your answer.

Answer. I have referred to the questions and answers, and refusals to answer, which have been published by the committee, and to them alone. I annex the journal, so far as it has been printed by order of the committee:

[Here follow from pages 1 to 112, inclusive, of printed journal of the select committee.]

Sixth question by Counsel. Is not the evidence of Chief Justice Taney, and also that of Mr. Duane, recorded in the journal of the committee?

Answer. I presume it is; but I have run my eye rapidly over the printed journal, and do not find the evidence there.

Seventh question by Counsel. Was Mr. Whitney present at, or ever apprised of, the examination of Chief Justice Taney or Mr. Duane, or of the nature of their evidence, or ever afforded an opportunity to put questions to either, in explanation of their evidence, or to adduce any corroboration of his own, in case any discrepancy should appear?

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Answer. He was not present, nor was he apprised of the examination of Mr. Taney and Mr. Duane, to my knowledge.

[Interrogatories similar to those put to the first witness (Mr. Fairfield) were also addressed to Mr. Hamer, and received similar answers as far as the knowledge of Mr. Hamer went.]

FRIDAY, February 17.

Case of R. M. Whitney—Mr. Hamer's Testimony.

First question by Mr. PEYTON. Have you heard any member of this House declare that any proceeding should be adopted or prosecuted to bring the occurrences in the committee, on the 25th of January, to the notice of the House? And if yes, state whether you have heard such an opinion expressed by many of the members of the House; and, also, whether any of them suggested that proceedings against R. M. Whitney, for a contempt, would be a proper mode of effecting that object.

Mr. TURRILL said he was under the necessity of objecting to this interrogatory, as he considered it a very improper inquiry to make.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 89, nays 84.

So the House determined the interrogatory should be put.

Mr. HAMER then sent to the Chair the following:

Answer. I have heard some members say that the proceedings alluded to ought to be brought before the House; that opinion has not been expressed to me by many members. I have not heard any one say, so far as I now recollect, that proceedings against R. M. Whitney, for a contempt, would be a proper mode of effecting that object.

First interrogatory by Mr. WISE. From the facts within your knowledge, or from remarks made to you, or in your presence, by members of this House, or by R. M. Whitney, have you a doubt of the fact that this investigation was and is intended, by said members and said Whitney, to affect Messrs. Wise and Peyton? State all the facts and circumstances, the conversations and meetings, the remarks of members, or of said Whitney, which go to show that such is the object of those concerned in the same.

Mr. TURRILL called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 73, nays 99.

So the House determined the interrogatory should not be put.

Second interrogatory by Mr. WISE. Do you know of your own knowledge, or from information derived from the President himself, or any member or members with whom he may have consulted or advised, or to whom he may have suggested an opinion, as to the proceedings upon the report of the select committee, whether he (the President of the United States) has not advised and recommended to members the course which has been pursued by the House in this matter of alleged contempt; and whether he did or did not, directly or indirectly, assign as a reason for that course, that it would try the conduct of Messrs. Peyton and Wise in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman, urging that it was necessary to condemn that conduct.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 66, nays 112.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not propounded to the witness.

Second interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON. Have you heard any members of this House, and if yea, who, state that they hoped or wished Whitney would refuse to appear before the committee, so as to give an opportunity to examine into the transaction before the committee, or any word or expression to that effect; and have you known any members of this House, and if yea, who, state that they had counselled with Whitney as to the course he should pursue; or have you known any member of this House counsel with said Whitney as to the course to be pursued by him, either before the House or the committee? State fully all you know on this subject.

Mr. TURRILL objected to this interrogatory.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 75, nays 91.

So the House determined that this interrogatory should not be put.

Third interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON. Have you heard any members of this House, and if yea, who, state that, by commencing this proceeding against Whitney in the House, the whole conduct and declarations of Messrs. Wise and Peyton would be proven, and thereby bring them, as far as possible, into disgrace before the nation; or any expressions or declarations to that effect; and that they would vote for the investigation with a view to that object?

Mr. INGERSOLL then asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 69, nays 85.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not put.

Fourth interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON. When did you first see the written statement of Mr. Fairfield, which he presented to this House, in answer to the first interrogatory propounded to him, or the substance of the same?

Answer. Several days before he was examined as a witness in this House; but the exact date I do not remember. I believe the one shown to me then to be substantially the one presented here when he was examined.

[Similar interrogatories with those addressed to the preceding witnesses, were then addressed to Mr. Martin, and were answered substantially to the same effect.]

Mr. Gillet's Testimony.

First question by the Counsel for the accused. Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee whereof Mr. Garland is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January; and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and Peyton, as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Answer. I have heard the answer of Mr. Fairfield to this interrogatory, and recollect the facts stated by him, and think they are truly stated; and I adopt his answer thereto as a part of my own. I think other words reflecting upon Mr. Whitney were used by both Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton, but I cannot call to mind any that I am certain were spoken before Mr. Whitney retired from the committee room.

[The remaining portion of the witness's reply was similar to that of Mr. Fairfield to the same query.]

[The interrogatories put to the previous witnesses were then put to Mr. Gillet, receiving the same answers.]

SATURDAY, February 18:

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Mr. WISE asked the general consent of the House to call the reporter for the Intelligencer, from whose notes, aided by his own recollection, Mr. W. had written out his speech for that paper; which was agreed to.

Testimony of John Whitehead, Reporter.

Question by Mr. WISE. Will you please state whether you did not furnish Mr. Wise with your notes, as a reporter of the Intelligencer, of his remarks in the House, narrating and explaining the occurrences in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman, in the matter of difficulty between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney; and whether you can now vouch for the general correctness of the report of these remarks in the Intelligencer, particularly the report of the paragraph or sentence commencing "Let me not be misunderstood," &c.

Answer. Yes; I did supply Mr. Wise with the report of the statement which he made to the House, narrating the occurrences in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman. I can and do vouch for the general correctness of the report as contained in the Intelligencer, and particularly the report of the paragraph commencing "Let me not," &c. I distinctly recollect the sentence being uttered, viz: "If he had drawn a weapon, it should not have done its execution."

Mr. Jones, counsel for the accused, then informed the House that they had got through with all the oral testimony which they proposed introducing at that time, and said he held in his hand certain documentary evidence which they intended to introduce. The evidence alluded to, he said, were extracts from the accredited speeches of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. PEYTON;) which extracts went to show the quo animo of the other proceedings of those gentlemen against the accused. He considered this proposition as necessary to show the state of feeling which existed in the breasts of those gentlemen towards the accused; but in so doing it was not their intention to mutilate these speeches, and take small portions of them, but to lay them before the House in extenso. To save time, however, they only proposed the reading of such portions of them as bore upon the point at issue, yet the whole speeches were before the House, so that any gentleman might examine them for himself.

Mr. PICKENS then withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, and the proposition to introduce this testimony was lost, without a division.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the committee appointed to conduct the examination, then arose and announced that the counsel for the accused had closed, so far, their oral testimony, but desired, through him, to submit a proposition to the House. They had furnished him with a list or memorandum of certain portions of the journal of the Select Committee of which the Hon. Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, was chairman, with a request that a clerk be directed to transcribe them for the use of counsel and the members. The reason of the request was this: the journal was then in the hands of the printer, and could not, without very great inconvenience, be spared from the printing office; because, if it was, it could not be printed in time for the report. He therefore moved that a clerk be appointed to make such extracts, for the purpose above mentioned.

Mr. PATTON then submitted the following resolution.

Resolved, That it is not expedient further to prosecute the trial of Reuben M. Whitney, for the contempt of the House alleged to have been committed by him, and that he be now discharged.

Mr. PATTON said that he had from the beginning foreseen that the trial would assume the form and character which it had put on; that it would be protracted to a most unreasonable length, by the introduction of a vast mass of irrelevant testimony, and by the raising of an infinite number of questions of evidence; and that the prosecution of the inquiry must lead to heated debate, and probably angry personal collision.

I think (said Mr. P.) it must be sufficiently manifest, if we attempt to go on regularly through this trial, receiving all that kind of testimony and pursuing that mode of investigation which the decisions of the House already have authorized, that there can be no termination of the case until the whole of the residue of the session, now barely sufficient for doing the public business of absolutely indispensable necessity, shall have been consumed. If we go on through the evidence, and are called on to pronounce a judgment on the merits, we must hear debate from the counsel of the accused and from many members of the House, which it would be exceedingly difficult to restrain by the means provided for arresting debate in an ordinary case of legislation. Under these circumstances, I have been meditating for some time to propose something which would put a stop to the case without any decision on the merits. I hope I may be permitted to say, and it may, perhaps, induce gentlemen on both sides to receive more favorably the proposition, that I have studiously and purposely abstained from voting upon any of the numerous questions of evidence, which have arisen in the case. I have kept myself aloof from all the excitement which I was sure the case must elicit, in some measure in the hope that, from a position of that sort, a conciliatory motion, calculated to put a stop to a trial so disastrous to the discharge of the public legislation of the country, and to avoid the necessity of any decision on the merits of the case, might be acceptably received. I do verily believe that if one single speech, such as will be made, and perhaps must be made, from the very nature of the case, shall be delivered on this floor, consequences the most deplorable will follow; scenes of violence and personal collision, such as we are not accustomed even here to witness, as well as the valuable time of the House thrown away so far as necessary legislation is concerned, without the hope of having any calm, dispassionate, or useful determination of the case itself which is under trial. Before we got involved in this case, I made an effort to prevent it by laying the report of the committee on the table. I would now renew that proposition, but the effect of that would be to leave the prisoner in custody. I have, therefore, proposed the resolution now under consideration, for the purpose of effecting the same object: that is, to get rid of this case in the only practicable way, without coming to any decision of the House on the merits or demerits of the accused, or anybody else, whose conduct is directly or indirectly implicated in the trial.

Mr. WISE inquired whether, before the counsel for the accused had concluded their examination, it was in order to move such a resolution without first moving to suspend the rules.

The CHAIR said the counsel for the accused had concluded the examination of witnesses, as he understood.

Testimony of the Honorable James Garland.

First question by the Counsel for the accused. Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the Select Committee whereof Mr. Garland is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and Peyton, as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Answer. The transaction now investigating took place on the night of the 25th day of January last. Mr. Peyton had, without objection by the committee, proposed to Mr. Whitney the following interrogatory: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he, in any manner, countenance you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?" which I, as chairman, propounded. To this interrogatory Mr. Whitney returned the following answer:

"I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with 'or did he,' &c.; therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof."

After I had sent the answer to the committee, Mr. Peyton, in a tone and manner indicating strong excitement, remarked, "Mr. Chairman, I wish you distinctly to inform this witness that he is not to insult me in his answers;" then rising from his seat, and approaching Mr. Whitney, said, as well as I can recollect, "I will not be insulted to my face by any damned thief and damned robber; and if you dare to insult me here to my face, God damn you, I will put you to death on the spot. You say in your card that I seek protection under my constitutional privileges, but I will let you know that I do not claim any constitutional privilege to protect me against an insult to my face, here or elsewhere." Before Mr. Peyton had finished this sentence, Mr. Wise rose from his seat, which was on the sofa, on the side of the room opposite Mr. Whitney, and walked about half way across, saying, "Yes; the committee had borne the damned insolence of that witness long enough; it was insufferable." Mr. Peyton remarked, "Wise, this is my business; don't you interfere." I immediately rose, and said to Mr. Wise, "Wise, don't do so, you are wrong." Upon which Mr. Wise immediately returned to his seat. When Mr. Wise turned to resume his seat, I immediately turned to Mr. Peyton, and remarked, "Mr. Peyton, you must observe the order of the committee." Mr. Peyton immediately turned from the witness to me, and said, as near as I can recollect, "Mr. Chairman, I appeal to you to say if I have not treated this witness, from the beginning, as if he were a gentleman; but I'll be damned if I will be insulted to my face." He then took his seat in the chair which I had occupied, as I had taken the chair which he had risen from. After Mr.

Peyton and myself were both seated, Mr. Whitney rose from his seat, and, advancing one or two steps towards me, said, "Mr. Chairman," uttering two or three other words which I did not hear. Before he had finished his sentence, Mr. Peyton rose up and said, as well as I recollect, "He has no right to speak here; God damn him, he shan't speak; he must give his answers in writing." Then, turning towards Mr. Whitney, said, "You have no right to speak here; sit down, sir." I remarked to Mr. Peyton that the witness had a right to make a question touching his examination; but, before I finished the remark, Mr. Peyton, very much excited, said, "Damn him, I have treated him as if he were a gentleman." I again remarked to Mr. Peyton that he must observe order. Mr. Whitney, who had not taken his seat, said, "Mr. Chairman, I came here under the summons of the committee. I claim its protection." Mr. Peyton said, "Damn him, he has insulted me to my face; damn him, he looks at me; he shan't look at me." As he made this remark, appearing very angry, he put his right hand either to his bosom or the side pocket of his coat. As soon as he put his hand to his bosom, Mr. Wise sprang forward, seized Mr. Peyton by the breast, and said, "Peyton, don't notice him; damn him, he is not worthy of your notice;" and some other expression, which I do not remember. Mr. Peyton remarked, "I will notice him; I would notice him if he were a damned dog, if he insulted me to my face." As soon as Mr. Wise seized hold of Mr. Peyton, I stepped between him and Mr. Whitney, and Mr. Martin took hold of his right arm. Mr. Wise shoved Mr. Peyton back some two or three steps towards the sofa, Mr. Peyton endeavoring somewhat to disengage himself from Mr. Wise and Mr. Martin, but failed. About this time some member of the committee made a motion to suspend the examination, and Mr. Hamer made some remarks, which I did not hear, for my attention was directed to the parties, with a view, if necessary, to prevent collision by personal interposition. At this time, I remarked to Mr. Whitney, "that a question would arise as to the disposition of his answer, and that he would be pleased to retire;" which he did. After Mr. Whitney retired, Mr. Peyton, who had been very much excited, became more tranquil; expressed his regret for the occurrence; urged, in extenuation, the insult which he had received in the answer referred to, and the contemptuous look and scowl with which it was accompanied, as the cause of his great excitement, and apologized to the committee, promising that thereafter he would try and suppress his feelings, unless grossly and directly insulted. Mr. Hamer then submitted the following motion:

"That the answer to the 15th question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee;" which was unanimously adopted. Mr. Wise then called me to him, near the window, and remarked that, "in Mr. Peyton's present state of feeling, it would not do to permit him and Mr. Whitney to go out of the room together; if they did, he would not be responsible for the consequences; that it would be best to call back the witness, permit Mr. Peyton to ask him another question, which would greatly tend to tranquillize him, and then discharge the witness, without the committee's adjourning." I told him I approved of the plan; that there was some unfinished business before the committee, which I would call up when Mr. Whitney was discharged; and that he must see that Mr. Peyton did not leave the room; which he promised he would do. The witness was then called in, and the resolution of the committee read to him. After it was read, he said, as well as I recollect, "if I have been disrespectful to the committee, I regret it, and apologize for it." Mr. Peyton then propounded a question, which Mr. Whitney answered in a respectful manner, and was discharged. As Mr. Whitney left the room, I called some unfinished business to the attention of the committee, which detained it about ten minutes, and then it adjourned. In this narrative I am guided by my memory alone. I have given the circumstances which occurred, and the language which was employed, as accurately as a treacherous memory will permit. I do not profess entire accuracy, or to have stated all that occurred.

[The usual interrogatories were then put to Mr. Garland, and answered about as other witnesses had done, as far as his knowledge extended; after which Mr. Fairfield, the first witness, was called back, and further interrogated.]

Case of R. M. Whitney.

Mr. LANE, there being no question before the House, then submitted his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to prosecute further the alleged contempt of Reuben M. Whitney against the authority of this House, and that said Whitney be now discharged from custody.

Mr. GHOLSON wished to know whether the investigation on the part of the committee could be stopped in this way.

The CHAIR replied that that was a question for the House, not the Chair, to determine. The witness was off the stand, and the same question arose the other day.

Mr. LANE then said: Mr. Speaker, the only speech I have to make on this resolution is to move the previous question.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, can a gentleman take the floor, present a resolution, and call for the previous question, without the power of the House to amend it?

The CHAIR. Certainly.

Reissuing Bank U. S. Stock.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. STORER. Mr. Speaker, the point of order I inquire about is this: whether it is competent for any member of this House, while this House is organized as a judicial tribunal, to cut off, by this guillotine sort of process, the right of the accused to be heard by his counsel.

The CHAIR. That is a matter for the consideration of this House. The House may vote according to its discretion or according to its judgment.

Mr. Jones (of counsel for the accused.) Cannot this proposition be amended, sir?

The CHAIR. No proposition can be amended after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WISE. Is there not a witness on the stand?

The CHAIR. There is not.

Mr. WISE. Has not the clerk of the Select Committee been summoned?

The CHAIR has issued a subpoena for him, but he was not called on the stand.

Mr. WISE. Have there not been questions propounded which have not been answered?

Mr. GHOLSON. I gave the clerk seventeen interrogatories, which he has not answered.

The CHAIR, as the presiding officer of the House, knows nothing of it.

Tellers having been appointed, the previous question was then seconded by the House—yeas 78, nays 64; and on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. CRAIG asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 71.

So the main question was ordered to be put; and on the main question, being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. CHAPIN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 99, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, Galbraith, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holt, Howard, Huntington, Ingham, William Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingsmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, William Mason, May, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Owens, Page, Patterson, Patton, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Yell—99.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bunch, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Forester, Graham, Granger, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Herod, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Janes, Jenifer, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lewis, Love, Lyon, Maury, McCarty, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Parker, Pearson, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Russell, Shields, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Vinton, Washington, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Young—72.

So the resolution was adopted; and Mr. Whitney was thereupon ordered to be discharged from custody.

Just as the Chair was announcing the order for the discharge of the accused,

Mr. PEYTON interposed, and said, before the accused was dismissed, he wished to propound a question to him, and that he be detained for that purpose. [Cries of no! no! from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. PEYTON thereupon moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, saying, "Then gentlemen will have an opportunity of recording their no! no!"

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 94, nays 68.

When the name of Mr. Wise was called, that gentleman rose in his place, and, addressing the Chair, said: Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote until I ascertain whether I am discharged from prosecution or not.

The House then adjourned.

Reissuing Bank U. S. Notes.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the Select Committee upon the subject of banking operations and the reissues of the notes of the Bank of the United States, reported a bill providing for the punishment of reissuing the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. EVERETT took this occasion to disclaim any participation in the bill or report, never having seen either. The committee met soon after their appointment when nothing was done. They were to wait the call of their chairman for their next meeting. He now understood they had had a meeting some days since, but of this he had had no notice to attend. The first notice he had was yesterday, when the chairman said the committee proposed meeting that evening, at the lodgings of one of the members. Mr. E. informed him that he was too much indisposed to go out in the evening, but would attend any morning in the committee room at the House. He therefore disclaimed all share, or merit, or responsibility, for the bill or report.

Mr. MASON, of Maine, moved that five thousand copies be printed; which motion lies over.

FRIDAY, February 24.

Relations with Mexico.

MR. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which had been referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th of February, made the following report thereon :

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th of February, relative to Mexico, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully offer the following report.

The history of the relations between the United States and Mexico exhibits an unbroken succession of good feelings, and, as far as the occasion permitted, of kind offices, on the part of the American Government, following out, in this as in other respects, the disposition and wishes of the people. The first to recognize Mexico as an independent power, the Government of the United States has been among the first in the unceasing manifestation of friendship to this adjacent North American Government. At an early period of her struggle for independence, the ports of the United States were open to her flag, even at the hazard of incurring responsibility for this act of impartial neutrality.

But the committee perceive, with profound regret, that on the part of Mexico there has been a long train of injuries to the property of American citizens, and insults to the national flag, for which redress, though often promised, has seldom been obtained.

This omission has doubtless proceeded, in a great measure, from the unsettled condition of the Mexican Government, the numerous and radical changes, which have prevented a fixed policy from being pursued in its foreign affairs. But the committee believe that it has also sprung, in part, from a knowledge of the form of our Government, and the limited powers of its executive branch.

Cases might be mentioned in which a demand for redress, when made by nations whose Executive had the power of declaring war, and consequently the subordinate power of giving large discretionary authority to its naval officers, has been promptly met, when the consequences of refusal were uncertain. But our constitution has wisely placed the war-making power in the legislative branch of the Government, and no severe measures are likely to be adopted towards any foreign power, unless upon much deliberation and repeated aggression. It would seem to follow from this, however, that in proportion to the slowness should be the firmness of the voice of the nation, when expressed through all the departments of its Government.

Those nations which permit themselves to disregard the remonstrances of the President, when conveyed through agents appointed by him, and rely for their security upon the limited powers which our constitution has intrusted to that officer, must be taught that his complaints against injury and outrage do but speak, in anticipation, the voice of the entire people of the country.

It may be that, without reference to the limited powers of the President, the Government of Mexico has been encouraged to persevere in its course of aggression by the general absence from its neighborhood of vessels of war belonging to the United States, the interposition of which might have been more effectual than a diplomatic note.

To illustrate this position, the committee will select, out of the many cases of serious and flagrant injury inflicted upon the commerce and rights of the United States, by officers of the Mexican republic, one of the very few in which that Government listened to our demand for satisfaction.

On the 3d of May, 1836, the United States schooner Jefferson anchored off the port of Tampico, direct from Pensacola, having been sent out by order of Commodore Dallas. Lieutenant Osborn and his boat's crew, who went on shore, were seized and imprisoned, and the vessel prohibited from entering the river. A demand for satisfaction made by the American consul was haughtily refused. The Jefferson left the port, but communicated with the sloop of war Grampus, of eighteen guns, which came to off the bar ; and on the following day there arrived another American corvette, and both anchored there.

The commander of the Grampus directed a note to the principal of the port, informing him that, by order of the chief of the division on the West India station, he had come to enter into a correspondence with him relative to the insult which he had inflicted on the American flag. A note followed from the Foreign Department of the Mexican Government to Mr. Ellis, requesting him to interpose his authority, and order the vessels to retire. Mr. Ellis very properly declined to do so. In a few days an official communication apprised Mr. Ellis that the Mexican Government had supplanted the officer in command at Tampico, "by substituting in his stead a chief who, it flatters itself, will know how to preserve greater harmony with the agents and subjects of foreign nations" and announced that "a summary investigation had been ordered to be instituted, which, by putting in its true light the conduct of Mr. Gomez, would apply to him the punishment he deserved, if he should prove culpable, as well as to all others who may have taken any part in the affair treated upon," renewing the request that Mr. Ellis would then give his orders for the withdrawal of the squadron from before Tampico ; which was done, and the vessels departed. The committee would be pleased if they could stop here in the narrative ; but they are compelled to remark that, shortly afterwards, the individual whose punishment was thus promised, as an atonement for the insult to the American flag, was recalled into service, and assigned to a command upon the coast, where his hostile feelings might again endanger the security of American citizens or property.

The effect of this open withdrawal of the apology yielded to the American Government was, as might have been anticipated, soon made to appear in fresh outrages upon some American citizens, who were entitled to have been treated with peculiar forbearance, not only because they were in the employment of the American Government, but because they constituted a part of the crew of one of the national vessels, whose services on board might have been very essential. The arrest and imprisonment of eight of the seamen belonging to the sloop of war Natchez will not now be made the subject of comment, further than to remark that the prevention of the American consul from visiting them, whilst sick and in prison, from the 4th to the 19th of November, was an act of unpardonable inhumanity, and appears to have proceeded from the same officer whose fictitious punishment, but real promotion, had been offered as an atonement for a previous insult to the American flag.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

[H. OF R.]

Looking through the catalogue of complaints which the United States have to make against Mexico, on their own account, as the party whose dignity and honor are assailed, the committee are unable to perceive any proof of a desire on the part of the Mexican Government to repair injury or satisfy honor.

The merchant vessels of the United States have been fired into, her citizens attacked, and even put to death, and her ships of war treated with disrespect when paying a friendly visit to a port where they had a right to expect hospitality. It was the inattention of the Mexican Government to complaints of this description that appears chiefly to have induced the return of the late chargé d'affaires; for in his note of December the 7th he says: "If those [the claims] that might be presented should be all acknowledged as just, yet so long as the several cases of unprovoked and inexcusable outrage inflicted on the officers and flag of his country, which have been heretofore submitted to the Mexican Executive, remained unsatisfactorily answered, he would have but one course to pursue."

It is possible that the claims for private property, which had recently been presented anew to their notice, may have attracted the serious attention of that Government; but if a cordial disposition was felt to adjust them, it is not easy to imagine why those cases, where a decree of the Mexican authorities had been for a long time passed for their payment, and a portion actually paid, were not fully satisfied. The committee are willing to hope, however, that the manifestation of serious discontent on the part of the United States, by the withdrawal of their official representative, will induce the Mexican Government to engage in the active investigation of all the grounds of complaint pressed upon them for many years past. They fully concur with the President, that ample cause exists for taking redress into our own hands, and believe that we should be justified in the opinion of other nations for taking such a step. But they are willing to try the experiment of another demand, made in the most solemn form, upon the justice of the Mexican Government, before any further proceedings are adopted. It is their opinion that a diplomatic functionary of the highest grade should be appointed to bear this last appeal, whose rank would indicate at once the importance of his mission, and the respect in which the Government to which he is accredited is held; for, notwithstanding the causeless ill feeling which appears to prevail in Mexico towards the Government and people of the United States, the latter will continue as long as possible to treat with respect their ancient though now estranged friend. In conclusion, the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the indignities offered to the American flag, and injuries committed upon the persons and property of American citizens, by officers of the Mexican Government, and the refusal or neglect of that Government to make suitable atonement, would justify the Congress of the United States in taking measures to obtain immediate redress by the exercise of its own power.

Resolved, That, as an evidence of the desire of the American Government to preserve peaceful relations with the Government of Mexico, as long as the same may be compatible with that dignity which it is due to the people of the United States to preserve unimpaired, the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to make another solemn demand, in the most impressive form, upon the Government of Mexico, for redress of the grievances which have heretofore been ineffectually presented to its notice.

The report having been read,

The consideration of it was postponed to the next day.

The Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

Mr. BELL said he rose for the purpose of calling the attention of members to a few facts connected with the subject under consideration, and with the subject of the Treasury, and the expenditures of the Government generally, which he thought were either unknown to many honorable members, or, if known, had not received that attention which, from their extraordinary nature, they were entitled to receive from the representatives of the people and the guardians of the public interests.

The fact that the permanent expenditures of the Government had been doubled in amount within a few years past had been noticed heretofore. I wish (said Mr. B.) to bring to the notice of honorable gentlemen another most improper and unprecedented anomaly in the action of Congress upon the subject of the appropriation and expenditure of the public moneys. The Committee of Ways and Means have given their sanction to appropriations, for the service of the present year, amounting to upwards of thirty millions, if I have not made some mistake in the estimate of this amount. Besides these, there are other bills reported by the standing committees of the House, which will swell them to about thirty-five millions—an amount but little short of the appropriations to the same objects made at the last session of Congress. Do the members of this House know what proportion of the appropriations of the last year remains unexpended? The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has told us that the present bill appropriates about nine hundred thousand dollars to fortifications; and that, he contends, ought to be voted, because it does not exceed the usual amount annually appropriated to the same objects. Sir, it is true that this does not exceed the amount usually appropriated, but the honorable gentleman has omitted to inform us that there was, on the 1st of January, a balance of upwards of six hundred thousand dollars remaining in the Treasury of the appropriations of the last year to the same objects, besides between two and three hundred thousand in the hands of the disbursing officers yet unexpended. He has neglected to inform us that, in fact, about nine hundred thousand dollars of the last year's appropriations to fortifications remain to be expended during the present year; for I take it for granted that the work upon the fortifications has not been persisted in to any great extent during the winter. Thus, sir, instead of the amount proposed to be applied to this branch of the public service, during the present year, we propose to apply double that amount. Is there any thing in the present high prices of labor and materials, any thing in the great demand for laborers of all kinds, or is there any thing in the present prospect of peace with all nations, which calls for this unusual amount to be applied to fortifications? Are we not pushing these works too rapidly to admit of solid constructions? But, sir, (said Mr. B.,) I do not attach much importance to this view of the subject. Not only double, but treble and quadruple the amount of these appropriations can be expended by the Government, if it is found necessary in order to increase appropriations—if we shall, by our imprudent compliance with the demand of the Executive, encourage a race between appropriations and disbursements—if the appropriations are to be increased according to the ability of the Government to expend, or rather waste, as much as this House shall, from year to year, be found willing to appropriate. I repeat, if this shall be the measure of our appropriations, we need not care how large they are, they will be expended.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) in relation to excess of appropriations in the Treasury, said he had only to remark that there was a great deal of deception in relation to those appropriations; because, although the money was in the Treasury, in most cases the works for which it was appropriated were already under contract. The Committee of Ways and Means were at one time of opinion with the gentleman from Tennessee. They, knowing that there were large amounts of money on hand in the Treasury, made inquiries at the proper departments, and ascertained that, although there was a surplus on hand at present, yet the probability was that the appropriations would fall short during the ensuing year.

Mr. C. then sent to the Clerk's table a report from the engineer department, showing the objects for which the appropriations were required, which showed that all the appropriations proposed in the bill would be needed during the ensuing year.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, advocated the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, on the ground of its recognizing a system of permanent distribution, from which he (Mr. W.) could see no possible evil that could result.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said, that having voted for the deposit act of the last session, and intending to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, he felt it due to himself briefly to state the reasons which induced him to vote as he now intended to do. He said that he felt no regret for the vote which he gave for the deposit act of the last session; he not only felt no regret, but was well satisfied that the vote was right and proper; such a one as, under like circumstances, he would give again. When the deposit act passed, there was a large actually existing surplus in the Treasury, which, upon every reasonable data of calculation, would, by the close of the year, amount to about forty millions of dollars, and which had since been ascertained to be forty-two millions. Upon every reasonable basis of estimate, the accruing revenue, down to the year 1842, would be equal to, and perhaps more than, what ought to be the actual wants and expenditures of the Government. In this state of things, this immense amount of revenue would, without some disposition of it, remain unemployed in the hands of the Federal Government, or be employed by the deposit banks for their individual profit. He said he need not say that he thought it too dangerous to permit such an immense amount of unappropriated money to remain for so long a time in the hands of the Government unemployed for any public purpose; that he would not trust this Government with such immense means of patronage and corruption, be it administered by whom it might. There is nothing so dangerous in its employment, or corrupting in its use, as money; and he did not regard any Government so inflexible in its virtue, or so far above the reach of temptation, as to trust it unnecessarily with means of so extraordinary and dangerous temptation.

Mr. G. said that, when he voted for the deposit act of the last session, he voted for it as being, what it professed to be, a mere deposit act, and not a distribution act in disguise, as it had been frequently characterized; nor did he intend to adopt the principles of that bill as a system; for if the deposit principle is to be adopted as a system, he would prefer the constitutional principle proposed by a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, as more just and more equal in its operation. He said that he was utterly and entirely opposed to the distribution principle; it was corrupting in its operations and dangerous in its tendencies.

If the system be adopted, there can be no doubt that, under our indirect and insidious system of taxation, the State Governments would ultimately look to this Government for the means of conducting their domestic works and sustaining their domestic institutions; that they would make diligent and active search for every possible subject of expenditure, until, finally, the people and the State Governments would cease to watch the pecuniary operations of the Federal Government with their accustomed vigilance, and make no effort to arrest its march to consolidation, and, finally, be engulfed in its corrupting influence. The demands of the States would be met by corresponding taxation here, and a surplus produced for the purpose of distribution. He regarded this system, as many distinguished gentlemen had heretofore regarded it, the most dangerous and corrupting which could be incorporated into our legislation.

Mr. G. said that the true remedy was to reduce the taxation of the people to the wants of the Government, and the wants of the Government to the most economical expenditure; economy and simplicity being essential to purity, and purity to the maintenance of republican institutions. He said, Mr. Chairman, we must come to it; we must reduce the expenditures of this Government and the taxes of the people; this they will compel you to do, if they properly regard their rights and their liberties.

Mr. G. said he had another strong objection to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL.) It was, in effect, a deposit law, sought to be ingrafted upon a simple appropriation bill; embracing subjects totally distinct and dissimilar in their characters; upon the same principle, a tariff or any other incongruous law might be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill, and produce the greatest confusion upon the statute book. He thought that there ought to be the greatest possible system and congruity attainable in the framing of our laws. If he were otherwise favorable to the amendment, he would not vote for its adoption as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, because the object of it was to send the money back to the people, instead of keeping it in the vaults of the deposit banks, to enrich their stockholders, and add to the salary of their agent at Washington. He went on to point out the large increase in the number of deposit banks, especially in the State of New York, within the last year, and contended those banks were selected, and favored, with a view to aid the administration in carrying out its political views. He then contrasted the amount of public money on deposit in the banks in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Michigan, and attributed this difference more to the fact that some of those banks paid a contribution to an agent at Washington, and some did not, than to any thing else; and invariably, said he, those banks who pay a good sum to an agent get the largest amount of deposit. He feared there was some improper influence at work in the selection of these banks, and therefore he wished the source of corruption to be removed; and he considered this proposition as the best means of removing it.

Mr. MANN submitted an amendment to the amendment, providing that the deposit should be in proportion to the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. M. asked, where was the necessity of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee? Or had the gentleman any data upon which to estimate the amount of money to be appropriated under that proposition? And could they adopt it without that? The gentleman should have done what was done by an honorable Senator—introduced it at an early period of the session; for this amendment and that bill were identical. If, however, it should be adopted, Mr. M. had prepared his amendment to prevent the repetition of one of the greatest constitutional outrages that had ever taken place since the formation of this Government—indirectly done, to be sure, but not the less grievous. By the distribution law—for he would call it by its right name, it was “distribution,” though a mental reservation had been made by the use of the word “deposit”—the people of the large States had been sacrificed to the interest of those of the small States. He was opposed to distribution in any way whatever; and, even if his amendment should be incorporated in the provision under consideration, it would still be open to all his objections, though it would render it less unjust in its operation. He expressed his surprise at such a measure coming from the quarter it did. What had become of the once cherished State-right doctrines? Where the doctrine of a strict construction of the constitution? Was it the design to continue the present oppressive system of taxation, for the purpose of collecting large amounts of money from the people, to distribute it back in an unequal ratio, with the loss to the whole people of the enormous expenses of collection? He entered his solemn protest against the whole principle.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said: Mr. Chairman, I rarely give reasons for my vote. I shall, however, vote against this amendment, on the ground I voted against the distribution law of June; it is the same thing; my views are unchanged. I vote against it, because it leads to the collection of money which the owners had better keep than the Government; because it levies money for a purpose which the constitution does not warrant; because it corrupts our election; because members of Congress will be chosen in reference to the amount of money they will pledge themselves to draw from the federal coffers, and plant in their several districts—I know the fact, that electioneering on this principle is now in process; because I believe that, sooner or later, the inevitable effect will be to vote as little as possible for federal purposes: to withhold from the army, the navy, the fortifications, the proper necessary appropriations, and, finally, render the Federal Government a mere rope of sand.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, could see no reason why, if this measure was wise and proper at the last session, it is not so now, except that the Executive has since openly taken ground against it—a very sufficient reason to some gentlemen. He was sure that it was not so with his friend from Virginia, (Mr. GARLAND.) If five millions was the sum proper to be left in the Treasury last year, what reason is there to require more now? If there is no surplus, there will be no distribution. Mr. T. said that of all humbuggery, in this age of humbugs, the greatest was that this measure would corrupt the States. What do gentlemen mean when they talk of corrupting that incorporeal thing, a State? They must mean, if indeed they mean any thing, that it will corrupt the people! This money is returned to the States, who have an unrestricted control of it. Has any one ever broached the idea of the States corrupting their own people? How corrupt them? By appropriating this money to the beneficent purposes of internal improvement and education? Would that more of the States were thus corrupted. The distribution must be equal, and fixed by positive law. There will be no discretion—no power of discrimination—no power of granting favors. Where that is the case, there can be no power of patronage. The money must be distributed, or left in the Treasury, to be distributed by the Secretary, at his good will and pleasure.

MR. CRARY was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, (MR. BELL,) and to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (MR. MANN.) On no account could he be induced to vote for a distribution of the surplus, on the basis advocated by either of those gentlemen. The bill of the last session, called a deposit bill, but in fact a bill of distribution, was a bill of abominations. It distributed the public money unequally, unjustly. That money had been collected from the people of every section of the Union. It was paid into the Treasury by them, not in the proportion to their respective representations in the Senate and House of Representatives, nor in the proportion to their respective representation in the House alone, but in a proportion altogether at variance with either. It had been drawn from the people of the old States and the new, and not of the States only, but also of the Territories, and in proportion to their population at the present time. To distribute it, you went back to the census, taken six years ago; thus giving money to the people of the old States which you had taken from the people of the new States. By that act, the people whom he had to represent were deprived of a large sum of money which had been pillaged from them when they were unrepresented upon that floor; when they were denied a voice in the national councils. You propose now to reenact the same scene of injustice. He could not consent to it. If there was to be another distribution, there should be another census, and that census should form the basis of the distribution. In that way alone the surplus in your Treasury would be returned to those who had paid it there. In that way alone could justice be done to the people of his own State, to the people of the whole Western country.

MR. ROBERTSON was, in general, much opposed to the addition of new clauses to an appropriation bill, after it had been matured by the proper committee, particularly such as introduced matters unconnected with the main objects of the bill. This mode of legislation often left no alternative but to adopt a questionable or improper principle, or reject appropriations essential to the public service. But, in the present instance, he should overcome his repugnance, and vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (MR. BELL.) That amendment, it was true, involved a very important principle; but it had undergone a full discussion; indeed, it had occupied the attention of the country for years past, and had received the deliberate consideration and sanction of Congress at the last session. He presumed, therefore, that every gentleman was prepared to vote upon it.

MR. BOULDIN said: To reduce the income to the wants of Government, and to reduce the tariff for that purpose, had been strongly recommended by the Executive. It was generally expected, on all hands, that it would be cut down in some degree. It was, however, then thought entirely too late in the session, and it was universally said that, at the commencement of this session, we should commence the work of reduction of the tariff and of the revenue. This was early proposed at the present session. MR. B. had strong hopes and some fears on the subject, but voted to lay his colleague's resolution (MR. MERCER'S) on the table. This resolution sought to relinquish, on the part of the Federal Government, all claim to the money deposited by it with the States. MR. B. did not know what effect this measure might have had on the reduction of the tariff, or on reduction generally of the revenue. The very able report of the Committee of Ways and Means, the chairman of which MR. B. knew to be professedly, and did and does now believe to be sincerely, opposed to the protecting-duty system, seemed to brighten the prospect for reduction, which was cheering to MR. B. and to the country.

But now, sir, (said MR. B.,) we are again at the very crumbling brink of the grave of another session, and nothing is done. As to the report of the Senate, it promised little or nothing; what it would perform of that little he did not know. Between letting the money stay here, and the deposit bill as it was when ordered to be engrossed and finally passed—a sad alternative—MR. B. was in doubt. MR. B. has none now; with his loss of hope of reducing the tariff and the revenue to the wants of economy in the administration of our affairs, his doubts have vanished. It is true that the present Executive has recommended it, and the President elect has already, when questioned, declared his opinion to the same effect. Still (said MR. B.) my hopes are gone. When I see the system of partly selling, but principally giving away, the public lands, playing into the hands of the tariff system—protective system; and when I know that these are the only means of increase or decrease in the revenue on the imposts and lands, unless we resort to direct taxation, I despair. They are the arbiters of our fate, and they are in the hands of those who are agreed to take care of those two systems, whatever may become of us. Sir, (repeated he,) I despair. The Executive can do nothing for us, let him try ever so hard.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

[H. OF R.]

This system of one-tenth part selling, and the other nine parts giving the public lands, has a force and operation in it that has wholly escaped me heretofore. I know that, last session, there was something about the business that I could not see through. Whether it was want of vision in me, or whether the whole subject was a muddy stream, impenetrable to the human eye, I did not know. But, though muddy then, it is now as clear to me as the mountain limestone water—the pure limpid fountain, transparent as the air.

It is no longer a muddy pool to me. No, sir, I can now see a pin's head and point in ten feet water. I now see we shall not get the tariff down, we shall not materially reduce the revenue. I am willing (said Mr. B.) to let the compromise part of the tariff stand. I am willing to take off all the impost duties; I am willing to stop the sale of the public lands; I am willing all or any part of these things to bring down the revenue, but come down it must for me. I am willing to suspend all the rules, and set out this minute and spend all the balance of the time we have in doing it in a manner the best for all concerned. But it must come down, and that immediately, (said Mr. B.,) or I will vote to send any part, or all, back to the people. If I cannot get all, I will send what I can get. I will put it into the right pockets in every instance, if I can; I will come as near as I can.

Mr. B. said he knew it was unconstitutional thus to take it from the people in this way, and would be so to do the like again, and so it would be to keep it; and so long as we thus continue to take, I will continue to give back; and if I cannot do it unconditionally, I will lend it, deposit it. Strange thing, this—take the people's money away from them, and then lend it to them. But if I can do no better, I must do that.

Mr. LANE said: The proposition now to be determined, and the only one in order for debate, is to distribute the surplus revenue among the several States, agreeably to the representation in this branch of Congress—to distribute, (said Mr. L.,) because no one believed a cent of it will ever be called for, or returned by the States.

The money proposed to be divided has been collected, not from the old States, not agreeably to the representation in this House, but from the whole people; and, whether regarded as arising from the sales of the public lands or upon duties upon merchandise, it has been paid according to population, not representation, in direct proportion to the amount paid for land and the consumption of imported articles. That if any disproportion in the collection of the amount proposed to be returned to the people exists, it is because the people of the new States have purchased more of the public lands than those of the old.

Sir, what has produced such an extraordinary change in the opinions of honorable members?

A few years since it was proposed to divide among the States the money arising from the sales of the public lands, by the land bill, originating with a distinguished Senator in another part of this House. It passed the Senate and this House by an overwhelming majority. By the provisions of this bill, each of the new States in which the public lands were located received large donations of land, and twelve and a half per cent. out of the proceeds of the sales within the State; and the balance was divided equally among the States, based upon the census of 1830, which is the basis of the present proposition. This was intended to make up in some degree for the increased and increasing population of the new over the old States.

In this there was something generous, magnanimous, on the part of the advocates of the bill, towards the people of the new States, compared with the present proposition. The same gentlemen in this House who were the advocates of that bill are now the advocates of this proposition. Are honorable gentlemen prepared to give the reason and the cause for such a sudden change having passed over the vision of their political dreams? Is it to be found in the action of the people of the new States, in relation to recent and former elections of an important character? Surely not; no gentleman will admit this, though any one would be at a loss to find any other reason for such a change.

Mr. L. said the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD) had, with an air of confidence, given the committee his reasons for supporting the proposition: that the money in the hands of the deposit banks increased the executive influence of the General Government; that it was not only improperly deposited, but used for political purposes to influence public opinion; that his honorable friend desired its removal from the pet banks, (as he is pleased to call them,) because these banks, or those who manage them, are the friends of the administration, and use the money for their own benefit.

Mr. L. said he was equally desirous for the removal of the money of the people from the possession and control of the banks, because they are, so far as his part of the country is concerned, most decidedly opposed to the administration and all those who sustain it; that they use the power that the public deposits give them for political purposes, and not for the public good; not to accommodate the people, whose money it is, but to advance the interest of the favored few; in short, to shave and oppress the people with the money of the people.

Sir, (said Mr. L.,) if the people of the States of this Union are incorruptible, he would like to have the gentleman inform the committee who it is he apprehends would be corrupted by the Executive of the Federal Government. To conclude, Mr. L. said he had too much confidence in the justice of the members of the committee to suppose they would for a moment entertain such a proposition. He would, therefore, not detain the committee at so late an hour.

Mr. CAMBRELENG obtained the floor, and said he would willingly waive all opportunity to speak, but made an earnest appeal to the committee to take the question.

The amendment of Mr. MANN was then rejected, without a division.

The question on the amendment of Mr. BELL was taken by tellers, and also disagreed to—yeas 71, nays 75.

SATURDAY, February 25.

United States Bank.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the Select Committee upon the subject of the United States Bank, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until the notes of the late Bank of the United States, which may have been returned since the 3d day of March last, redeemed from the funds of the said bank, shall cease to be reissued by its officers, directors, trustee or trustees, and until the amount due to the Government from said bank shall be settled to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the notes of said bank, and the notes of any bank to which its funds and estate may be transferred in trust for the payment of its debts and discharge of its obligations, shall not be received in payment of any debts due to the Government of the United States, or taken in exchange or deposit in any of the banks selected as depositories of the public money; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to carry this provision into effect.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

Mr. BELL then renewed his amendment, offered last evening to the bill, as follows: That the money which should be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, should be deposited with the several States, according to the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the "act to regulate the deposit of the public moneys," approved 23d of June, 1836.

Mr. GRAVES addressed the House in favor of the amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, said: Mr. Speaker, this proposition standing pre-eminently above the necessity of argument to sustain it, I will consider some of the objections which are urged against it. It is contrary to the rules of this House to consider arguments which have been made in the Committee of the Whole. Although these arguments were used with no powerful effect in the committee last night, yet we are not at liberty to speak of them in this House. This is, in my opinion, like many other rules, positively against common sense, and against the advancement of the public business. The members composing the Committee of the Whole are the same who constitute this House, have the same faculties and reasoning powers in one case as in the other, and, I presume, have the same sentiments concerning this proposition in this House at this time as they expressed last night in the Committee of the Whole; yet we cannot combat these arguments here, and show their fallacy. The general and commonplace objection is, that there will be no surplus revenue in the Treasury to distribute. This argument was suggested to me by my friends who sit near me before I had the honor to address the Chair. It is to my mind an objection that is not even blessed with a relationship to good sense. It is an orphan in the world, without a godfather. Most objections, even if they are without foundation, can employ some sort of arguments to sustain them; but it is not the case with the one before us. Even the simplest statement of the case ought to put it to rest forever; that, if no surplus, no distribution. If there is no surplus revenue, the act of Congress will remain a dead letter in our statute books, and will be, in that respect, similar to a thousand other inoperative paragraphs in these books. I cannot see why a provision cannot be enacted, to be perpetual, and lasting forever, in relation to this policy. If it be right in one year, it will be proper and right at any other and at all other times. It would be a singular provision for a miller to have a wastegate to let the surplus water off his mill-dam for one year alone, and let the accumulation of water at other times break his dam. This may be considered a very humble comparison; but it is one known to everybody, and is, in my opinion, applicable to the case before the House.

Mr. Speaker, another objection urged against this measure is, that the proposition is not attached to its "yokefellow;" the amendment is not made to a proper and appropriate bill. I would appeal to the good sense of the members, who are now honoring me so much with their attention on this occasion, if it be not a singular time now, at the close of a short session, to make this objection. If we had time to devote to etiquette, and nice and strict ceremony, then the argument might be considered. These secundum artem gentlemen must have more time than we now have, to urge these objections with any hopes of success. I am not at all acquainted with nice dandyism; but I am told, by their rules and regulations, a person is the most genteel to wear a suit of clothes all of the same color; yet I see around me gentlemen clad in different colors, and still appear to a great advantage. So it will be with the amendment to the bill before the House. The proper officers of the Government will both find it and execute it, if we pass it.

Mr. Speaker, another objection is, that it is improper, and even some say it is unconstitutional, to raise a surplus fund for distribution. It would be extremely unwise to collect money and distribute it to the people again. I have no hesitation in saying that such an idea never once entered the heads of the framers of the constitution. It would be not only unwise, but absurd, to suppose the people would permit such an idle ceremony to go on, without either honor or profit to themselves. This proposition does not impose the necessity on Congress to raise a revenue to distribute it. It only provides, if there exist a surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838, then, and in that event, to distribute it among the States in the proportion mentioned in the amendment. Such surplus existing in the Treasury, is a misfortune; but it is one from which we can be relieved with the greatest ease. In Governments, as in other things, we cannot expect perfection. The object of Government, in this respect, is to raise a revenue proportionate to the wants of the Government; but it is not in the power of the human mind, it is not in the compass of human wisdom, on all occasions, to make the revenue correspond with the expenditures of the Government. The means by which we raise our revenue are such that we cannot expect to make the one equal to the other on all occasions. When we have not enough revenue, we borrow to make up the deficit. When we have too much, why not send it back to the people in their State Legislatures?

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

[H. OF R.]

I have, on all occasions, voted for every proposition to reduce the tariff duties, and to abridge the sales of the public lands in such manner as for the revenue to meet the wants of the Government. I think Congress has the power to remodel what is called "the compromise act." The sales of the public lands should be confined to actual settlers, and that at reduced prices, for lands which have been in market for a number of years. If this course had been pursued, and the proper reductions made, we would have had no trouble on the subject of the surplus revenue. I make no charges against the chairman of the committees having these subjects in their charge, of neglecting their duties; but I do not see why both the subjects of the sale of the public lands and the reduction of the tariff duties might not have been acted on at the present session. I was at all times ready to act on them, with or without speeches.

It is agreed on all sides that money is a dangerous neighbor, and has a corrupting influence. It is like Satan in the garden of Eden. Gentlemen who contend against this amendment say that this money will corrupt and injure the people and their State Legislatures by distributing it.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot discover the force of the argument that induces them to arrive at this conclusion. It may impose on the State Legislatures more business and responsibilities in the discharge of their duties; but it cannot have a necessary tendency to corrupt the people.

If this proposition be rejected, and the money deposited in the pet banks, what will be the consequences? There is, to say the least of it, more danger of corruption in the latter case than in the former. These banks are private corporations, and responsible to nobody, further than they are bound by dollars and cents. They have the power, and will act to the best advantage to make money, and to retain the money that may be deposited with them. They are sharp and shaving and skinning in their operations, and will move in very acute angles to make money.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half-past four o'clock. The pending question was on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. BELL, and which was under discussion when the House took a recess. The amendment to the amendment having, on motion of Mr. MERCER, been read,

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 92.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "States" the following: "in proportion to the ratio of the representation of such States in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

Mr. M. wished merely to say that, in offering this amendment, he asked for nothing more than the vote of the House besides the principle contained in it, which presented the question whether the principles of the Constitution of the United States were to be adhered to or not.

Mr. YELL said: I voted, Mr. Speaker, against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) because I am of opinion that this bill, if passed, and sanctioned by the President, (and I trust that it never will receive the countenance of that distinguished man and illustrious statesman,) will at once establish a system demoralizing and corrupting in its influences, and tend to the destruction of the sovereignty of the States, and render them dependent suppliants on the General Government. The power and patronage of this Government should not thus be perverted for the base purpose of degrading and withering the independence of the States; that glorious independence, Mr. Speaker, which, sneer at it as gentlemen may who come from particular sections of the Union—sections, sir, where aristocracy is getting the mastery of our democratic and federative principles—must be the last bulwark of liberty. But, sir, I am opposed to this measure on other and not less tangible grounds. Sir, I behold in this plan of distribution, what every enlightened mind can readily discover, a deep and a matured plan, conceived and nurtured by the high tariff party, to continue and consolidate their odious scheme of injustice and oppression. And, strange as it may appear, it is now advocated, and probably will receive the votes of gentlemen from the Middle and Southern States, once the uncompromising opponents of the tariff principle, but who now are ready to fall at the foot of Baal, and sacrifice former principles and professions for the purpose of filling their State treasuries at the expense of the people—by recognizing and establishing a system of taxation as oppressive as it is unconstitutional. And, sir, the brave and hardy people of the young and vigorous State which I have the honor to represent, are called on to subscribe to such heresies and denationalizing dogmas. The man who expects any thing of the kind from the people of Arkansas knows but little of their character; or, knowing it, would basely misrepresent them, and bow at the temple of Mammon.

This measure of distribution, since it has been a hobby horse for gentlemen to ride on, has presented an anomalous spectacle. The time yet belongs to the history of this Congress, when honorable gentlemen from the South and the West were daily found arraying themselves against every species of unnecessary taxation, boldly avowing that they were opposed to any and all tariff systems which would yield a revenue beyond the actual wants and demands of the Government. Such was their language but a few weeks or months ago; and, in proclaiming it, they struggled hard to excel each other in zeal and violence. And now, sir, what is the spectacle we behold? A system of distribution, another and a specious name for a system of bribery, has been started; the hounds are in full cry; and the same honorable and patriotic gentlemen now step forward, and, at the watchword of "put money in thy purse; ay, put money in thy purse," vote for the distribution or bribery measure, the effect of which is to entail on this country a system of taxation and oppression which has had no parallel since the days of the tea and ten-penny tax—two frightful measures of discord, which roused enfeebled colonies to rebellion, and led to the foundation of this mighty republic. But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed distribution is only for momentary duration; that it is necessary to relieve the Treasury of a redundant income, and that it will speedily be discontinued! Indeed, sir! What evidence have we of the fact? What evidence do we require to disprove the assertion? This scheme was commenced the last session; it has been introduced to this; and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it never will be abandoned so long as the high tariff party can wheedle the people with a siren lullaby, and cheat them out of their rights by dazzling the vision with gold, and deluding the fancy by the attributes of sophistry. Depend upon it, sir, if this baleful system of distribution be not nipped in the bud, it will betray the people into submission by a species of taxation which no nation on earth should endure.

Mr. Speaker, I will not wantonly impugn any man's motives, nor will I speak to wound any man's sensibility; but I must be permitted to speak plainly and with candor, and I trust no one will deem me discourteous if I frankly remark that the conduct of certain Southern gentlemen, in relation to this subject, has been, to say the least of it, equivocal, and has almost tempted me to doubt the evidence of my own senses. Are they sincere and disinterested? It is not my province to doubt them; but let me say, sir, that they appear to demonstrate by their acts a degree of insincerity, if their former professions can be relied on; for, though once loudly clamorous against the tariff, they are now found engaged, by means not decidedly indirect, opposing any measure that has a tendency to reduce taxation. They assail the land bill, because it would reduce the tariff some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000; and show most clearly and conclusively, by their votes, that they will not go for those measures of reduction for which the South has so long contended. Their only object now appears to be the creation of a redundant Treasury, for the miserable purpose of distribution.

Mr. Speaker, this scheme of accumulation and distribution presents to the world a spectacle equally to be deplored and ridiculed. To combat it with argument would be to waste the time of the House and the country in discussing an absurdity. The whole system is not only wrong, but it is contemptible. What is it, sir? Ay, sir, what is it? It is a scheme to tax the South and West, to protect the manufactures of the North—of New England—that section of the country which is now engaged in generating agitation and strife, for the openly-avowed purpose of sapping the institutions of every State south and west of the Potomac, and rendering them mere colonial dependencies, the servile hacks and serfs of New England. It is a scheme to tax you and me, sir, and the Sergeant-at-arms, if you please, by the way of analogy, for the purpose of putting into our pockets ten cents out of every dollar that the hand of oppression took out of our pockets. The scheme, sir, to say nothing of its injustice, is contemptible; it is unworthy of the enlightened age in which we live; it sets all the principles of political economy at defiance, laughs Adam Smith, Say, Ricardo, and Bentham, to scorn; and where, let me ask, was the world ever before regaled with the spectacle of a people's taxing themselves to the tune of millions, for the purpose of paying the surplusage back again, at a discount of ninety per centum; taking from the citizen a dollar, for the purpose of giving him ten cents? But, sir, I will not discuss a proposition so monstrous.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to gentlemen to say if they are prepared to oppose a proposition to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, by reducing the tariff on imports; or by the passage of a land bill, if they were certain that the surplus was to remain in the Treasury. I am satisfied that no gentlemen would vote for a system which would tend to fill the Treasury, without a certainty of their receiving a portion of the plunder; and yet we find those very men, by their votes, filling your public coffers so as to enable them to receive their portion of the spoils.

Sir, (continued Mr. Y.,) I enter my protest against a system of bargain and corruption, which is to be executed by parties of different political complexions, for the purpose of dividing the spoils which they have plundered from the people. If the sales of the public lands are to be continued for the benefit of the speculators who go to the West in multitudes for the purpose of legally stealing the lands and improvements of the people of the new States, I hope my constituents may know who it is that thus imposes upon them a system of legalized fraud and oppression. If, sir, my constituents are to be sacrificed by the maintenance of a system of persecution, got up and carried on for the purpose of filling the pockets of others to their ruin, I wish them to know who is the author of the enormity. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, and that hope has not yet been abandoned, that, if ever this branch of the Government is bent on the destruction of the rights of the people and a violation of the constitution, there is yet one ordeal for it to pass, where it may be shorn of its baneful aspect. And, Mr. Speaker, I trust in God that, in its passage through that ordeal, it will find a quietus.

Mr. Boon said that if the proposition then under consideration, to distribute any portion of the surplus revenue among the States, that may be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1838, should become a law, he sincerely hoped that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MANN) would be rejected by the House. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) a more unjust proposition towards the new States could not have entered into the mind of man than the one proposed by the honorable member from New York; and, more especially, the State which Mr. B. had the honor in part to represent on the floor of Congress. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) if a distribution of the surplus revenue (if any there be) shall be made upon the basis of representation in the House of Representatives, manifest injustice would be done to all the new States.

Under the census of 1830, the State of Indiana is entitled to seven Representatives upon this floor; whereas, at this time, from the increase of population since the year 1830, Indiana would be entitled to at least twelve, if not thirteen, Representatives in Congress under the present ratio of representation among the several States; whereas, in most of the old States, the increase of population since the year 1830 has not been such as to increase the number of their Representatives in Congress under the present ratio, apportioning the number of Representatives in Congress among the several States of the Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if, under this view of the subject, manifest injustice would not be done to the new States, should the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York be adopted by the House.

Mr. B. said that he had voted for the distribution bill of the last session of Congress, and he had just voted for the same principle by way of amendment to the bill now under consideration; but he would take the opportunity then afforded him to say that, in both instances, he regretted most sincerely that circumstances should have compelled him to vote for or against the measure. Mr. B. said that he had, on all proper occasions, opposed the policy of taxing the people for the purpose of raising a surplus revenue, to be distributed among the several States, as such a system would be to tax the many for the benefit of the few. Gentlemen might endeavor to make the system popular, by pretending to return to the dear people that which they have been instrumental in wresting from the pockets of the people, by an unholy system of taxation not demanded by the wants of the Government.

Mr. B. said that he had not yet given up to despair. He yet felt encouragement in the firm conviction that the day was not far distant when the freemen of this country would indignantly throw off the shackles that have already too long enslaved them, and would not longer be humbugged by false pretences of having returned to them the money which has been wrested from their pockets, by a system of over-taxing the many for the benefit of the few. The people are now told by a certain class of politicians that there is remaining in the Treasury a considerable amount of money over and above the wants of the Government, which ought to be returned to, and distributed among, the dear people of the several States. And how, I ask, is it to be effected with advantage to the great body of the tax-paying community? Why, sir, after an odious and unjust system of taxation has been fastened and riveted upon the people, by which a large surplus revenue is produced, and after deducting about twenty-five per cent. for collecting the same, it is then most graciously proposed to distribute the remainder thereof among the several States, in order that it may again return to the dear people, whose interest and future welfare are always so near the heart of the political demagogue.

The tax-paying people of this country first earn the money that pays their taxes under the authority of law, by the sweat of their brow, and by the sweat of their brow they will have to re-earn their respective portions of the surplus revenue when it shall have been deposited in the State treasuries. The true question to be decided by the people of this country is, shall there be a new and novel policy introduced in this Government, which has for its object the raising of a surplus revenue for distribution among the States; or shall the taxes of the people be reduced to the legitimate wants of the Government? This is the only true issue to be made before the people; and to this question the public mind should be particularly drawn by all those who stand opposed to monopolies, and all privileged orders of every character whatever.

The people will be fully satisfied in a short time, that the depositing of the surplus revenue in the several State treasuries will not have the effect of again returning to the people their respective portions of the money that has been unnecessarily and unrighteously drawn from their pockets by an unjust system of taxation by the General Government. Mr. B. said that, in looking into this subject of creating a surplus revenue to be distributed among the States, he could view it in no other light than having a direct tendency to destroy the independence of the State Governments; and, if possible to do so, to corrupt the people themselves with their own money. The question of every wise legislator in Congress should be as to the best mode of reducing the taxes already imposed on the people so as to raise a sufficient amount only of revenue to supply the legitimate wants of the General Government, and not as to what shall be done with the surplus revenue. Reduce the burdens of taxation now imposed upon the people, to the wants of the Government, and leave the surplus where it should be—in the pockets of its rightful owners.

Mr. McKEON said he was satisfied, from the course the debate had taken, that a general impression existed that something ought to be done, and without delay, to remedy the difficulty in which the country was now placed by its overflowing Treasury. He, in common with many who had addressed the House on this subject, believed that a reduction of the revenue ought to be attempted; and he thought that a favorable opportunity was now presented to gentlemen who were anxious to reduce our receipts, to exhibit the evidence of their zeal. The tariff bill offered a fair opportunity. He inquired of the Chair if it would be in order to offer, as an amendment, the bill of his colleague, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) or the bill from the Senate in relation to a reduction of the tariff. (The CHAIR said it would not.) Sir, if it is not in order, I must submit. I am disposed to believe that if distribution is now before us, the measures which would reduce your revenue might not be out of place. On every side it is admitted that your income far exceeds the wants of the Government; and yet, it appears, we are called upon to continue legislation calculated to keep up this strange system. I was one of that small minority which, at the last session of Congress, voted against your deposit bill, as it was called, but a distribution bill in fact. I have seen that minority more than doubled on the vote just taken. I have not regretted, as yet, the opposition which I gave to the system of distribution: I saw in the scheme the means of fastening upon the country a high tariff. Opposed, as I am, to raising unnecessary revenue from the people; educated in the school of politics which insists that the Government should be administered economically; that the industry of the people should not be taxed beyond what is absolutely required for the wants (and those wants limited) of the Government, I could never assent to the doctrine which sanctioned unnecessary taxation, and plundered the poor for the base purpose of enriching the public coffers. Gentlemen say this is returning the money to the people. I am aware it is by this plausible argument they wish to deceive the people into a support of this new principle. All I ask is, that gentlemen will not take the money from the people. It never can be returned to the individuals from whom it is taken. It is taken from every human being who consumes an article of food or raiment. You tax the bread the poor man eats, the coal that warms him, the blanket that covers him. You plunder him in various ways, and proclaim, at the same time, the fact of an overflowing Treasury. Why, sir, is not this the purest form of oppression? Is not this exercise of power of taxation not for the purposes for which the Government was formed, but for other purposes, sufficient to arouse the people? Who will insist that, by any process, the same amount of money collected, which is abstracted, can be returned to the same individual?

I am astonished to find upon this floor the strange association which is presented of those who have been distinguished as the opponents of a high tariff united with those who have been its inflexible and warmest supporters. I am more astonished to find gentlemen who are known to belong to that sect in this country characterized by devotion to a strict construction of the constitution, advocating a doctrine which, some years since, was denounced by a Senator of the highest standing as unconstitutional, dangerous, absurd, and inexpedient, and would convert the Government into an office of collection and distribution. I refer to one who has been looked up to as the head of that ultra strict construction school. And yet we find those who profess to follow these lights, and to be guided by this wisdom, proclaiming their attachment to this same principle of distribution. Not a man of them who would not denounce any plan to interfere with the domestic arrangements of the several States; and, nevertheless, are promoting, indirectly, the very measures they are opposed to. What must be the result of your distribution? The States will rely upon the General Government; they will turn their eyes towards this Capitol as the point from which golden streams are to be poured forth upon them to carry on their internal improvements; you will make the States dependent upon the General Government, instead of this Government dependent upon the States: in a word, you will change the whole form of your Government, you will destroy its nature, and, instead of having it simple and economical, you will transform it into one complicated and extravagant.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. TURRILL then demanded the previous question, but the House refused to second it—yeas 75, nays 110.

The debate was then resumed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would vote for the amendment of his colleague, (Mr. MANN,) though he had voted against the bill of the last session—a vote of which he was rendered prouder and prouder by every additional day. He would vote for the amendment of his colleague, not because he favored the principle of distribution, for it was a principle so obnoxious to him, that, do what you please, he could not vote for or compromise it; but if we must have distribution, let us, at least, have such a ratio as shall possess something like the semblance of justice. The amendment of his colleague provided that the surplus should be distributed according to the same rule by which the money was raised by taxation from the people. The rule for distribution adopted by the act of last session was wholly indefensible.

Mr. V. said he had very attentively noticed the yeas and nays upon the proposition for this new distribution, which had just been carried; and though he had often heard of Yankee acuteness and sagacity, though he had often, while he had been connected with the deliberations of this House, seen them most strikingly exemplified, he had never seen them more signally illustrated than on this occasion. Gentlemen from the tariff districts of the East, and many gentlemen from the South, in relation to the subject now before us, were going hand in hand, and sailing in the same boat; but, without much disparaging the sagacity of gentlemen from the South, he must be permitted to use an old and homely adage, and say that the Yankees "best knew on which side their bread was buttered." He had, as he had observed, often had occasion to admire the cool, keen, and calculating sagacity of the sons of the East, especially when contrasted with the more impetuous temperament which characterized another quarter; and the vote which had just been taken afforded a new subject for such admiration. Look over the yeas and nays just taken, and recorded, and see whether you can find a single gentleman representing a high tariff manufacturing district who has voted against this second and most mischievous plan of distribution. While one Southern gentleman here and another there drops off and goes for distribution, opposed as it is to the principle of reduction, the tariff representatives of New England march off in solid phalanx, in support of this scheme. Sir, they know well what they are about. Their keen sagacity has told and disclosed to them what their policy is tending to. They know that the policy of distribution is opposed to the policy of reduction, and therefore they go to a man for the former. He (Mr.

V.) was surprised to see gentlemen from the South drawn into a scheme for the support of the high tariff policy.

[Mr. MASON, of Ohio, here called Mr. V. to order for making personal reflections; and the CHAIR decided that Mr. V. was not out of order.]

Mr. V. said he had not made, nor did he intend to make, any personal reflections. Gentlemen were, no doubt, pure and patriotic in the course they were taking; but he surely had a right to say that the gentlemen who represented high tariff districts knew best what they were about; that this miserable and demoralizing scheme of distribution would serve long and copiously to oil their spindles, and give new impetus to their shuttles, whilst its effect would be any thing but benignant upon the Southern planting States. He had a right to say, and he would say, that this plan of distribution number two exhibited an amalgamation of differing parties, and that some opposed to a tariff, and others in favor of a high tariff, were here now found in a most unnatural union. Year after year had the high ultra-tariff party in former years addressed to you the horse-leech cry of "Give, give us more protection." The general sentiment of the country now is, that they had been most inordinate and unreasonable in their demands for protection. Their cupidity had well nigh dissolved the Union. Their own laws and their own measures had swelled your revenues much beyond the wants of the Government; and now they found themselves in a position of much peril. He could not say that he was destitute of all sympathy for them, as the manufacturing interest in his district was a very important one. It embraced many gentlemen for whom he had a high regard. Still he must and would repeat what he had said shortly after the commencement of this session, that if the alternative were presented to him, "Bring down your revenue at once to the wants of the Government, or perpetuate this policy of distribution," he would not hesitate to go for reduction. If gentlemen would not pass the land bill, if they would not do any thing to terminate the evil of a plethoric Treasury, and avert the evils inseparable from perpetual distribution, they leave us, who deprecate those evils, no option; we must go at the tariff, and strive to bring it down to the wants of the Government. Was there any gentleman here of such superficial vision as not to be able to see that the present movement was an effort to fix permanently on the country, by the seductive feature of distribution, a rate of taxation far beyond the necessary wants of the Government?

Mr. McCOMAS rose and addressed the Speaker. He said that heretofore he had remained silent in this debate, and thought it was better to act upon the question than to waste the precious time of the House in fruitless discussion. But from the gratuitous remarks of the gentleman from New York (Mr. VANDERPOEL) he felt himself compelled, in defence of himself and those whom he acted with upon this question, to make a few remarks. The gentleman seems to feel a deep concern for the interest of our constituents. He thinks they are misrepresented upon this floor. Mr. MoC. said he had no doubt but that his constituents would feel under lasting obligations to that honorable gentleman for his kind interposition, for his able and manly defence of their interest on this floor. If they did not, he should think it base ingratitude, as the honorable member was, out of the superabundance of his kindness to them, compelled, as a matter of necessity, to misrepresent his own constituents. He said this generous disinterestedness could not fail to meet its reward in the approbation of a grateful and generous people. Mr. MoC. said he would assure the gentleman that that was the character of the people he had the honor to represent here.

The honorable gentleman seemed to be struck with horror at the idea of Southern gentlemen voting for this bill. He has exhibited the tariff, in its most frightful form, to their imaginations, and gravely inquires if it is the policy of Southern gentlemen to rivet a protecting tariff on the South. Mr. MoC. said this scarecrow had been too recently dug from its grave to inspire him with any terror. He thought the veil of the gentleman was too thin to conceal his true course from the gaze of the Southern people. The South was not so completely harnessed in party shackles, as to be rallied by this war-whoop, to make a common cause against the passage of this bill. They have been too long fed by empty professions. They look upon this question in a sober light; they say to these friendly gentlemen of the North, whose burden of song is free trade and a reduction of duties, why is this measure not effected? What prevents the passage of a law to that effect? Has not the administration a majority in both Houses of Congress? Is it not in their power at any moment to take up that subject in preference to all others? Sir, it is too plain, this pulse feeler, or tub to the whale, will not do.

Mr. MoC. said the bill for reduction had been introduced at an early period of the session, and had been quietly sleeping on the table to the present time; the people in the South all this time anxiously waiting to see the action of Congress upon the subject. Where was the zeal of the gentleman for the South all this time? Sir, it slept upon the table with the bill. How can we account for the new-born zeal of the gentleman, at this late hour of the night, to wish to have appended to that bill a bill ripping up and changing the whole tariff laws of the country? Does that gentleman think that a question so complex in its nature, and combining such a variety of interests as the subject of the tariff, can be adjusted in fifteen minutes. Mr. MoC. said that this subject might be plain to the mind of that gentleman, yet he confessed it was one of great difficulty to him, and he was not prepared to vote upon a bill making such radical changes in the settled policy of the country, without hearing it amply discussed, in all its bearings. And no man could believe that a measure of such magnitude could be properly matured at this late period of the session; nor did he believe that it was ever intended to be discussed or passed this session.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG interrupted Mr. McCOMAS, and said that, from the extraordinary course of the present Congress, he had not been able to have the appropriation bills acted on.]

Mr. McCOMAS replied that the administration held the destinies of all these matters in their own hands, and could give them any direction they pleased. The Southern people would be amused when they came to learn that their zealous advocate for State rights and a strict construction of the constitution, and for a reduction of the tariff, avowed himself, at the same time, a representative of a tariff district. It seems to me the honorable gentleman has over-cropped himself. He will find it a difficult matter to look both ways at the same time. To use a homely figure, he reminds me of the Indian who complained that he often suffered from cold because his blanket was too short. When he covered his head his feet were naked, and when he covered his feet, his head was naked. So, sir, upon the whole, I think the honorable member had better attend strictly to the interest of his own constituents, and leave the interests of other people to their representatives.

The gentleman has said that we are taxing the people for distribution. This appears to be a talismanic word with those gentlemen who wish to keep the money. Mr. MoC. denied that one dollar of the surplus money was raised by taxation. It was from the sale of property. It was from the sale of public lands, the common property of the people of all the States. He said it had not occurred, he supposed, to those wise lecturers, that the customs for the last three years had not paid the expenses of the Government, or any thing like it; and but for the extraordinary sales of the public lands, we should not have one surplus dollar in the Treasury, but, on the contrary, we should have been bankrupt. And yet we are continually told, if we divide out the sales of the public lands among the people, it is levying a tax upon them. Sir, if putting money in the people's pockets is taxing them, then they will not be apt to complain of the burdens of taxation. The fund accruing from the sales of public lands has, in my judgment, been improperly put into the National Treasury. Mr. MoC. said he believed it was a direct violation of the deed of cession, made by Virginia to the Federal Government. By that deed, it will be seen that all the land that remained unsold, after the objects of the grant had been complied with, was to be the common property of all the States, Virginia inclusive.

To call upon the States for the money deposited with them would be a ruinous policy. Many States have already embarked in extensive works of internal improvement upon the faith and credit of that money—improvements that are opening a thousand avenues to wealth and prosperity, and will enable these local communities to develop their full resources; and to call for that money now would be political madness, and few men would like to take the responsibility of such a measure. Gentlemen make long and labored arguments to prove, what nobody denies, that Congress may repeal the compromise act. Sir, I am not in favor of collecting more revenue than is wanted for an economical administration of the Government; yet, in bringing the Government to that standard, some respect should be paid to the great and leading interests of the country; to the time and manner this thing should be done; and, sir, without a more urgent necessity than now exists, we should await the operation of the compromise bill. Sir, the foundation of this Government was laid deep in the principles of compromise. The same elements of discord existed at the formation of the Federal Government that exist now. The constitution was formed by mutual concession of all parties; and, to be administered fairly, it must be done in the same spirit. Sir, it cannot be forgotten that this Government, in the course of its administration, called Northern capital from the ocean, and compelled its owners to employ it upon land; and by a series of legislation, whether right or wrong, in some measure plighted the faith of the Government to that policy. Sir, the painful controversy between the North and the South upon this question is fresh in the recollection of this House—a controversy that shook this confederacy to its centre; yes, sir, a controversy that threatened a dissolution of this Union, and the arraying brother against brother in deadly and mortal combat—an event that every trembling patriot must have regarded as the funeral knell of departing liberty.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. PICKENS said he came from a State which would be affected very little by either ratio of distribution that might be adopted; it made very little difference to South Carolina what ratio of distribution might be established. Her combined representation in both Houses bears nearly the same proportion to the combined representation of all the States, as her representation in this House bears to the whole representation here. But he, (Mr. P.), if he gave any opinion on the subject, was bound to confess that he considered that ratio which had been adopted last year a more just and equitable one than the ratio now proposed to be made by this amendment, according to the representation on this floor alone. It ought to be borne in mind that the revenue to be distributed did not accrue from direct taxation; on the contrary, it was a fund principally derived from the sale of lands. Mr. P. did not consider that branch, strictly and technically speaking, public revenue; at least, it did not arise from taxation, because those persons who had paid this money had received a full equivalent for the same; there was a quid pro quo on both sides; and this was not taxation, it was a sale; the parties therefore from whom this money was derived had not been taxed. He (Mr. P.) had heard it urged that those States where public lands were sold, raised immense revenue, as if it were a burden; whereas, their people had received a full consideration for all the money they had paid into the Treasury. This was important to be considered. Now, in determining the ratio of distribution or deposit of funds thus derived, it would be difficult to fix any ratio exactly equal. But he (Mr. P.) was most willing—nay, he was most anxious—to adopt that ratio which came nearest to strict justice; and it certainly appeared to him that the ratio based upon the mere ground of representation in this House was not the most just, because the fund was derived not from direct taxation, but from sales of public lands and imposts. According to the most generally received doctrine, (but which was not strictly true,) import duties were paid according to consumption, and consumption was according to population. In this point of view, a distribution according to representation in this House would exclude two-fifths of a certain class of our population in a certain section of this Union, and would not do justice. But, further, it was well known that in certain States there had been a large increase of population since the last census. For instance, there were Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan: some of these States had doubled their population, and more justice would be done them by the combined ratio than the single. The ratio of both Houses combined would approach nearer justice than any other we could adopt.

The funds raised from the sale of public lands were strictly trust funds; and this Government was created a trustee under the grants of territory from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and other States, which were, to a great extent, limitations on the trust power. The act ceding these lands is in these words: "That the said lands shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective portions of the general charge and expenditure; and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Mr. P. then maintained that it was the duty of the Government, after all demands against it were satisfied, to deposit the surplus remaining, so that the States should receive the "use" and "benefit," as far as possible, intended by those States originally ceding the lands. He contended that it was not only sound policy, but our duty. The question as to a deposit of the surplus revenue, was one between the safety and propriety of State corporations, selected as deposit banks, and the States themselves; and how any gentleman could hesitate between the two systems, he was at a loss to perceive. The one system gave us the unknown and dangerous power of banks, the other the faith and the stability of the States; and, whatever benefit might arise, the citizens of the States could receive it, instead of corporations with exclusive privileges.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, rose and said he thought it necessary for every gentleman to exercise a little philosophy on the present occasion. He (Mr. P.) had voted generally with the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) but he had not entered into collision with any one in the vote he had given. He thought it did not come with good grace from New York to oppose this bill, on the ground that Rhode Island, Delaware, and other small States, received a small fraction more than they were entitled to. He confessed it was not, perhaps, pleasant to come from a small State; for, if it gained a little but once in a hundred years, there was no end to the reproaches made on that account. Mr. P. asked if it was fair and liberal in New York not to be satisfied? New York might be called the ruling city; there they generally had seven or eight millions on hand, of which they were always receiving the benefit, and yet they were not satisfied. And yet it might be shown that New York had received nearly seven millions more than it was entitled to. When he (Mr. P.) saw that great State arrayed to deprive the small States of the little which they received, he felt himself called upon to lift up his voice against it. He (Mr. P.) had voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) because he was not willing to record the idea that there would be a surplus revenue to divide among the States; he did not wish to give an argument in favor of a bill which his honorable friend from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) had called a free trade bill; he did not wish to see that bill introduced; but, if there should be a surplus to divide, it might be provided for by a bill afterwards, to be brought in for that purpose; and then, in such an event, he should go upon the ground that it ought to be divided according to the ratio of the States, and not upon the ratio of the representation in the House.

Mr. DENNY, in reply to the observations of Mr. VANDERPOEL, observed that he (Mr. VANDERPOEL) had not pointed out who were the true horse-leeches, crying "give, give." He contended it was not the States to which this appellation ought to be applied, but, on the contrary, to the banks. They had the money for their benefit; among them it was distributed, and the country called upon them to disgorge. They were the true leeches; they held on; and if gentlemen voted in the views of that honorable gentleman, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) they would still be permitted to hold on. We are (said Mr. D.) in possession of a surplus which is not derived from revenue, but from the sale of the public lands. The honorable gentleman (Mr. VANDERPOEL) alleges that the distribution of this surplus among the States will have a most ruinous tendency; it will make the Union a mere rope of sand. These he (Mr. D.) thought extraordinary arguments; we shall live over all this; the danger which the honorable gentleman threatens is not to be apprehended; but, on the contrary, great danger is to be apprehended if such a surplus is left at the discretion of the Government, to be loaned out at its pleasure to banks in every section of the country, thus enabling the Government to exercise a control over all parts of the Union, of an extent and of an intensity without parallel in any country in the world. But the honorable gentleman, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) instead of going into the merits of the case, and placing these things in their true light, has adopted a different course, and has contented himself with passing in review the different votes which have been given by different gentlemen on this question. Why is this? Why has he not rather discussed the real merits of the question? Instead of the merits of the case, he has brought into the field the feelings of gentlemen, as if the better to operate by an appeal to feelings rather than to argument. He (Mr. VANDERPOEL) has spoken of the horse-leech, and has characterized by this appellation his own constituents. Let them judge for themselves how far they merit the term. To him it appeared New York was more deserving the term than any other section of the country; for, out of twenty-two millions from the customs, New York received thirteen millions, which was paid there; and who, then, he would ask, was the horse-leech?

Mr. ROBERTSON said he would not be so unreasonable as to detain the House at that late hour. He rose merely to make his acknowledgments to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) who had so kindly undertaken to represent the State of Virginia. The gentleman had only followed the example of the State from whence he came, in taking the old Commonwealth under his especial protection; and, as one of her representatives, (said Mr. R.,) I feel myself bound, with all due humility, to acknowledge the favor. Those whom she has confided in to represent her, it seems, have mistaken her interest and their own duty. We have been outwitted, the gentleman tells us; gulled by a Yankee trick into the support of a measure which will fasten upon our constituents the present ruinous tariff. The Northern gentlemen very consistently urge a distribution of the surplus, in order (says the gentleman from New York) to prevent the success of any plan for reducing the revenue and diminishing the high rate of duties; and we of the South, who vote with them, are the dupes of their superior cunning. Sir, the gentleman himself is entitled to great credit for his own wonderful acuteness, which enables him so clearly to see through the designs of these very sagacious politicians; and it is kind in him to apprise us of our danger. I should like to have heard him assign the reasons why New York, some years past, so much in favor of distributing the surplus, is now so decidedly opposed to it. The true reason might perhaps be found to be that, having always a very large share of the public funds, she gains more by keeping what she has than by coming into a fair division. But, without attempting to account for the motives which influence others, I will very frankly tell the gentleman the reasons that induce me to vote for a distribution. Sir, it is with no view, as he would insinuate, of keeping up the present tariff, but with a view to counteract it. Is it to be endured that the gentleman from New York, who belongs to the dominant majority—to that party which professes so strong an interest for the South, and so much hostility to this tariff—should taunt Southern gentlemen of the minority with a design to co-operate with the North in keeping it up? If he and his party are sincere in their professions, why have they, who wield the whole power of legislation, permitted the South so long to be plundered by this unjust system of taxation? Why suffer it to oppress us for a day, when they have the power at any moment to repeal it? Why has the scheme of reduction proposed during the present session been permitted, until this late day, to slumber upon the table.

Distribution Question—Deposit with the States.

Sir, it is because we have no confidence in their professions that we are compelled to take the only means left us for redress, by restoring to the people of the South what this democratic majority continues to exact from them. It is this consideration—the conviction that the surplus revenue, whether derived from the sales of the public property or from the operation of an oppressive and unconstitutional tariff, belongs to the people, and would be worse than wasted by being left to the disposal of this Government—that induced me to support the proposition last year for distributing it. Upon the same principles, until the ruling party shall reduce the tariff, or take some effectual method for limiting the revenues to the just wants of the Government, I will vote for a distribution; I call it a distribution, because in truth no one expects a dollar will ever be called for by this Government. Only consider, sir, what would have been our present condition, had the act of the last session not been passed. We found in the Treasury, on the first day of January last, an unexpended balance of about fourteen millions remaining of the sums appropriated for the service of the last year; about six millions more it is thought remained unexpended, in the safe keeping of the disbursing officers. We distributed among the States about thirty-seven millions, making, together, about fifty-seven millions; add to this the estimated amount of receipts into the Treasury during the current year, and you would have had an aggregate sum of ninety or one hundred millions of dollars, perhaps even more, to be disposed of at the present session. What, sir, should we have done with it? We appropriated, last year, about twenty millions more than could be expended. Should we have been called upon still to increase our extravagant and enormous appropriations to accumulate still larger balances? Yes, sir; and then we should have applied all that could not be wasted in useless fortifications, splendid custom-houses, high salaries, and corrupt jobs of every sort, to carry on an unjust system of internal improvements in the Northern and Western States, from which the Southern people would, as usual, have derived little or no benefit. Sir, it is true, as the gentleman from New York says, the people of the South have been gulled; they have been gulled with promises of retrenchment long enough, while suffering from the oppressive exactions of this Government, and have at length, I trust, awakened to a proper sense of their rights and of their interest.

Mr. HOAR proceeded to show that he did not advocate taxation for the sake of distribution; that man, he thought, would deserve a straight jacket, who would think of such a thing; but he viewed this money, not as the proceeds of taxation, for it came from the sale of lands, not from taxes of any kind imposed upon the people. Mr. H. concluded by laying down this proposition: that of all curses which can be inflicted upon a country, a course of legislation characterized by sudden changes, compelling the citizens frequently to change their pursuits and employment, is the greatest curse; this he held to be a proposition which no one could deny. The reverse of this is the side of the bread on which the butter lies.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. MANN, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted the following proposition, by way of amendment to Mr. BELL's amendment, which he said he would do without one word of debate:

Be it further enacted, That from and after the 31st of December next, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, which shall exceed 20 per centum on the value thereof, one-third part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 30th of June, 1833, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and on the 30th of December, 1833, the other half shall be deducted; any thing in the act of the 2d of March, 1833, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th September next, the duty on salt shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BELL raised the point of order whether such a proposition, being of a distinct and substantive character, in no way analogous either with the bill or the amendment, could be moved; and, also, that it was the same as a bill already before the House.

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. BRIGGS) decided against the point, on the ground that the amendment was not the same as the bill in question.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of his proposition.

Mr. MERCER then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair that the amendment was in order.

The question was taken on the appeal, and decided in the negative—yeas 94, nays 97.

So the House reversed the decision of the Chair.

The question then recurred on the amendment, as amended.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, as amended by Mr. BELL, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 84.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PATTON said he desired to say a few words before the question was taken, not for the purpose of discussing the principles of the deposit act, but for the purpose of explaining distinctly the grounds of the vote he was about to give, and which might perhaps otherwise be misunderstood. I was one of those, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. P.,) who zealously and strenuously supported the bill of the last session, directing the deposit of the surplus revenue with the States. I considered it and intended it bona fide as a deposit, and not as a distribution; and in that point of view, and looking to the actual circumstances in which we were placed, I then thought it a most salutary, necessary, and constitutional measure. I have seen nothing and heard nothing which has at all shaken my confidence in the wisdom of that law; concurring fully in the denunciations against any system of raising revenue for the purpose of distribution as inexpedient, unjust, and unconstitutional, I am utterly unable to comprehend the force or justice of the effort which is made to apply these denunciations to a measure which proposes to deposit with the States that revenue which has been unnecessarily taken from the pockets of the people, which it is found impossible to expend, even by the most liberal appropriations of every kind, and which, if not thus deposited, must remain deposited with numerous banks, and the benefit of this common property of the whole, in the shape of interest, discounts, &c., be employed by those immediately interested in those institutions, instead of being placed in such a situation, under the control of the Legislatures of each State, that the benefits and advantages of these funds, unnecessarily and improperly drawn from the people, may be, to some extent, and to a very considerable extent, diffused among those from whom it was improperly taken. All the declamation which has been written and spoken, all the apprehensions which have been expressed as to the danger of corrupting the people and the States, and laying them prostrate at the footstool of this Government, are bugbears which do not frighten me in the least. I have, therefore, no difficulty whatever in sustaining the principle of the deposit act, and renewing its provisions for the disposition of a surplus, which accumulates in spite of all the efforts I can make to repeal or modify those unjust and oppressive laws by which this surplus is raised. It is, in my opinion, the best possible disposition that can be made of such a surplus. While these are my opinions, I have voted against the introduction of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee to this bill. I think it an inappropriate place for the law. This is a bill making the regular and ordinary appropriations for the completing and armament of our fortifications. It is strictly an appropriation bill; and the practice is very irregular, and will be productive of great confusion and mischief in our legislation, if subjects so incongruous, measures so various and inconsistent with each other, shall be jumbled together, and especially if the ordinary and annual appropriation bills shall be made the basis on which to pile acts of original legislation, distinct and independent of the annual provisions for satisfying demands created by past and permanent laws. This is one reason for my voting against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. I had a further objection: the present Congress goes out of existence in a few days; before the emergency contemplated by the amendment can exist, a new Congress will have assembled. As yet, it is uncertain whether there will be any surplus; and it will be time enough, when Congress meets here next December, to dispose of the surplus, if it shall then exist, as that Congress may think right.

The question was then taken on the third reading of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, 112 to 70, as follows:

MONDAY, February 27.

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of this bill.

The bill, together with the several amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Ways and Means, having been read—

Mr. W. THOMPSON moved to amend the bill by inserting:

"For the salary and outfit of a diplomatic agent, to be forthwith sent to the independent Government of Texas, ——— thousand dollars.

"For the expenses of running a boundary line between the United States and the independent Government of Texas, ——— thousand dollars; such line to be run by commissioners to be appointed by the United States and the republic of Texas."

Mr. T. said no one could regret more than he did the very limited time that is allowed for this discussion. I sir, (said Mr. T.,) am in no way responsible for it. My fault has certainly not been a want of zeal in pressing the subject upon Congress. The course of things for the last few weeks has been eminently illustrative and characteristic. The whole time of the House has been occupied with matters of purely a personal or local character in a miserable scramble for spoils, in which all parties have equally participated to the exclusion of every thing of general importance. The question now before the House involves, in some sort, the destinies of a young republic just rising into existence, and our own character for justice, consistency, and a fearless discharge of our duties. It is peculiarly fitting that we should introduce this young sister into the great family of nations. Why has it been so long postponed? Are gentlemen afraid of the argument? Are they afraid that a spontaneous burst of popular enthusiasm will force them to do that to which the cold, selfish, and sectional feelings of politicians are opposed?

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, said: The abstract right of this Government to recognize the existence and independence of foreign powers is not denied. Whether the exercise of this right, in any particular instance, can be vindicated as just to others, and, at the same time, consistent with a due regard to our own interest and honor, is another and very different question. It is also admitted to be the practice of nations, founded in the necessity of the thing, to treat with the Government de facto, established in a country, without regard to the Government de jure. It is not competent to other powers to inquire into causes of dispute between the belligerent parties, with a view to ascertain which is in the right, and to grant distinguishing favors to the one or the other, according to the result of such an inquiry.

Non-intervention is the cherished doctrine on which the Government and people of the United States have hitherto practised, as evinced in the conduct of both during the civil war that raged for so many years between Spain and her provinces in this hemisphere.

Mr. Monroe, in his annual Message to Congress, in 1819, speaking of the insurrectionary struggle of the Spanish provinces of South America, said that "The greatest care had been taken to enforce the laws intended to preserve an impartial neutrality. That a virtuous people may, and would, confine themselves within the limits of a strict neutrality." That "it was of the highest importance to our national character, and indispensable to the morality of our citizens, that all violations of our neutrality should be prevented. No door should be left open for the evasion of our laws; no opportunity afforded to any, who may be disposed to take advantage of it, to compromise the interest or the honor of the nation."

And, finally, he was able to assure Congress and the country that, notwithstanding the sensibility and sympathy which were naturally excited by such a contest—

"It had been the steady purpose of this Government to prevent that feeling leading to excess, and that it was very gratifying to have it in his power to state that so strong had been the sense, throughout the whole country, of what was due to the character and obligations of the nation, that very few examples of a contrary kind had occurred."

With these principles for my guide, I propose very briefly to examine the question, whether it is the duty of the United States now to recognize Texas as an independent nation. Before the people of Texas can rightfully invoke the interference of foreign powers, it must be proved, not only that they are in the enjoyment of all the attributes of a sovereign and independent State, but also that they possess the moral and physical ability to maintain, within their limits, the sovereignty they have asserted. Our information in relation to the condition of Texas is doubtless very deficient, both in its extent and precision.

The little we have is principally to be found in the report of Mr. Morit, accompanying the President's Message, on the subject of the condition of Texas, communicated to Congress on the 22d of December last. According to Mr. Morfit, the population of Texas consists of Anglo-Americans, Mexican natives, aborigines, and negroes; the whole estimated at 65,000 souls. Of these, he says, there are, perhaps, 30,000 Anglo-American settlers and 3,500 native Mexicans of Spanish descent. After stating that the population, consisting of emigrants from the United States, is said to be not less than fifty thousand, he adds that, "if I were to take my own judgment exclusively on this matter, and were to reason as to what I have not seen by that which I have, I should say the population, exclusive of Mexicans, Indians, and negroes, has never exceeded thirty thousand."

Suppose this estimate of that part of the population which consists of Anglo-Americans and Mexicans to be an approximation to the truth, (and there are many reasons for believing it exceeds the fact,) the whole amount of physical force belonging to the nation of Texas, exclusive of Indians and negroes, will fall considerably below that of many counties in the State of Ohio. And this population, small and feeble as it is in the aggregate, is not permanent, but a portion of it at least retreats at the approach of danger to the east bank of the Sabine.

As to the military force, we learn from the same report that it consists of an army of about 2,200 strong, not including the settlers or farmers, who can be armed on any emergency, so as to augment the number to at least 5,000 efficient men.

The naval force of Texas consists of four small vessels, carrying in all twenty-nine guns.

The internal resources of the province appear to be wholly inadequate to the successful resistance of any respectable force that might be employed for its subjection. It relies exclusively on external aid for the means of supporting the independence it has declared. No fact can be better authenticated; it is confirmed as well by the report to which reference has so often been made, as by all contemporaneous history, that the army of Texas is recruited from the citizens of this Union—is kept in the field, paid, and supplied with arms and provisions, by contributions derived from the same quarter. Mr. Morfit says:

"The present resources of Texas are principally derived from the sympathies of their neighbors and friends in the United States, and by loans upon the credit of the State. The donations from the former quarter have been, and will no doubt continue to be, very liberal, and indeed munificent. Several individuals, not interested in the success of the country further than their general attachment to the cause of independence and that of their old compatriots, have unostentatiously presented $5,000, while numbers have contributed $1,000 each, and small associations in the different States have thrown in their aid, until the aggregate has swelled to a large amount. I have been surprised," he says, in conclusion, "to find that Texas has carried on a successful war thus far, with so little embarrassment to her own citizens or her treasury; and perhaps it is the first instance in the history of nations where a State has sustained itself by men and means drawn wholly from a distance."

If this hasty review of the condition of Texas has not resulted in demonstrating her incapacity to maintain an independent Government, it has incontestably established another fact deeply affecting the character of this country, namely, that the ability of Texas to maintain her separate existence and sovereignty has been, and still continues to be, derived exclusively from the means furnished by the people of the United States, in direct violation of their neutral obligations; consequently, should the United States return to the neutral attitude from which they have so widely departed, and strictly enforce the laws intended to preserve our neutral character, the Government of Mexico would soon be restored in the province of Texas.

Whether the latter event ought to be desired by the friends of constitutional law and liberty anywhere, is a question that does not and cannot properly enter into our consideration in this discussion.

Suppose, therefore, the Texians should continue to receive assistance in men and money drawn from the United States, and should be further sustained by the co-operation of our army advanced into the heart of their country; and suppose, upon this hypothesis, their ability to maintain their independence, when thus sustained, should be admitted, still there are considerations arising out of so peculiar a state of things that ought to deter us from the indiscretion of a precipitate acknowledgment of their independence. If their independence has been the result of the counsels, or has been achieved, and thus far maintained, by the people of the United States; if our citizens compose her armies, and have command of the military and naval forces of the country; if they are found in possession of all the great offices of the Government, from the Chief Executive downwards, can we hope to escape the reproaches of other nations, and of impartial posterity, if we make haste to recognize a state of things that we have notoriously contributed so largely to produce.

What would the act of recognition, under such circumstances, be but an acknowledgment, not so much of the ability of Texas, as our own ability, and determination too, to maintain her independence at every hazard? Would not such conduct expose us, whether justly or not, to the charge of assisting in the dismemberment of a friendly power, for the unworthy purpose of seizing on one of its fairest provinces? Can we, consistently with national honor, after aiding the cause of rebellion in a neighboring republic, be the first to recognize the Government established by the insurgents? I concur most cordially in the views and opinions expressed by the President, in his Message of the 22d of December last, on the subject of the condition of Texas. In relation to the

Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

conduct proper for this Government to observe in the contest pending between Mexico and Texas, he says that

"It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should stand aloof and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign powers, shall recognize the independence of the new Government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved, beyond cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty, and to uphold the Government constituted by them."

Mr. Chairman, we are called on, not only by the amendment under consideration, but by the newspaper press in different quarters of the Union, to yield a speedy recognition of the independence of Texas. For what purpose is the prompt acknowledgment of her Government demanded? Not, certainly, because she desires to enjoy that independence, the recognition of which she solicits; not that she desires to possess the rank, privileges, and immunities, that belong to a free and sovereign member of the great family of nations; no, her object, distinctly avowed, is far more humble and befitting her feeble condition. It is, that she may make a surrender of her independence, government, territory and all, to the United States, on condition of annexation and reception into the Union!

The first elections under the constitution of Texas were held last autumn. Mr. Morfit reports that "The voters at the different polls were required to state whether they were 'in favor of annexing Texas to the United States;' and the response through every municipality has been wholly in the affirmative. He says that great unanimity prevailed on the important point of 'seeking admission into the Union of the United States of the North.' He also discloses the very important additional fact, that 'the terms upon which they desire to become an integrant of that Union have been discussed in the cabinet, and have already been, or will be, made the heads of instructions for the conduct of their representative near the Government of Washington.'"

A fact so extraordinary has not escaped the notice of the Executive, who says, in the Message already referred to, that the people of Texas have, since the last session of Congress, "openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek for admission into the Union as one of the Federal States. This last circumstance is one of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character."

It appears, then, that the Government of Texas is simultaneously urging its pretensions to recognition, and treating for annexation to the United States; and the former seems to be made subservient to the latter. Indeed, the evidence, to my understanding, is irresistible, that a separate independent existence never was, at any time, an object of desire on the part of the people and authorities of Texas. From Mr. Morfit's report we learn that, in September, 1835, General Cos invaded the province of Texas, and that "a battle ensued, which terminated in the retreat of the Mexicans. He says the Texians assert that this resistance was not because they even then wished to separate from the confederacy; but, on the contrary, because they were desirous to bring back the Government to the terms of the constitution of 1824." If it be true, as they allege, that as late as September, 1835, they took up arms "in defence of the constitution," I can only say that, in the brief interval of a little more than one month,

"A change came o'er the spirit of their dream," and their intentions underwent a revolution equally sudden and extraordinary; for, in the month of November following, they held a convention at San Felipe, and formed a provisional Government, and there made a declaration which "was considered as an absolute separation from Mexico."

This proceeding in November, 1835, was speedily followed by the convention of the 2d of March, 1836, which in due form "declared Texas a free, sovereign, and independent State."

If a redress of grievances, or the defence of the Mexican constitution, and not separation, had been the object of the Texians, they would have tried petition and remonstrance, before resorting to arms—the last remedy of the oppressed. The Anglo-Americans of Texas could have found, in the conduct of their ancestors, when colonists of Great Britain, an example of patience and forbearance worthy of their imitation. The people of the old thirteen States, while they were subject to the dominion of the mother country, employed more than ten years in petitioning the King, Parliament, and people of Great Britain, before they finally resolved on having recourse to arms for the defence of their liberties. And then they did not strike for independence; for it was more than a year after the first blood was spilt in the revolutionary conflict, before they made a declaration of independence.

If the object of procuring our acknowledgment of the new Government of Texas be to facilitate the design of her incorporation into this Union, (and that she seeks this connection we well know, from her own solemn acts and avowals,) how can those who are opposed to such a measure give their assent to any course of proceeding that leads directly to its accomplishment?

Sir, I shall not permit myself to be drawn into the discussion of any question to which a direct proposition to annex Texas to the United States might very properly give rise. In relation to that momentous subject I will now only say that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, and that, in my judgment, evil will be the day when that question shall come to be seriously entertained by the councils of this nation. I have noticed it now because it naturally connects itself with the proposition before us, in the aspect in which I have been considering it. The friends of annexation are consistent in voting for recognition; but those who are opposed to the former, and who believe, as I do, that it is the end, and the latter the means, cannot consistently give their support to the present movement. If no other objection existed to the recognition of Texas, I regard this as decisive, till she can give satisfactory evidence of her desire to have independence for the sake of independence, and not that she may barter it away. But, sir, other objections do exist.

Mexico is our neighbor, with whom we maintain diplomatic and commercial relations, and have a treaty which secures, as far as treaty stipulations can do, an inviolable friendship between the two nations. Are we not bound, by every consideration of national comity and plighted friendship, to confer with Mexico before we proceed to recognize the independence of one of her revolted provinces? For many years, and until within a few weeks past, we have had a minister resident in Mexico. I understand he has had no conference or correspondence whatever with the Mexican Government on the subject of the civil war in Texas; nor have we in any other manner given any intimation of our intention to acknowledge the separate existence of that province. On that subject we have maintained an ominous silence towards Mexico; yet presuming, I fear, on her inability to resent the affront, we are about to intrude ourselves into her affairs. It is true Mexico is torn by internal dissensions, her treasury is exhausted, her army mutinous, her people discontented and rent by faction; but her weakness cannot release us from the obligations imposed by our neutral character, nor from the duty of practising towards her that courtesy which is due from one friendly power to another. Her misfortunes ought rather to inspire her more prosperous and powerful neighbors with sentiments of forbearance and respect for her feelings in the hour of her adversity. To take advantage of her distresses would ill become the character of a magnanimous nation. We might at least ask Mexico whether she still intends to persist in the attempt to reduce the Texans to obedience, and, perhaps, could suggest some method by which a reconciliation might be effected, consistently with the honor and interest of both parties. Such a course of conduct would be entirely respectful and conciliatory, and it has the additional recommendation of being in strict accordance with the former practice of this Government in similar circumstances. So cautious, not to say tardy, was this Government in its movements towards a recognition of the Spanish colonies in South America, that as late as the year 1821 the period had not then arrived, in the opinion of the Executive, for the interference of this Government; for although the President, in his Message of that year, had declared "it had long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so that no condition short of their independence would be satisfactory to them," yet he proposed nothing further in their favor than to urge upon the Government of Spain the justice and policy of her immediate recognition of their independence.

Mr. HUNTSMAN took the floor, and addressed the Chair as follows:

I live in a section of the country convenient to Texas, where the intercourse between us is quite frequent; where our communications are uninterrupted; where many of the friends, relatives, and connections of my constituents have located themselves; and I claim the right to know something of the nature and character of the whole controversy. As time is precious, I will run rapidly over the main facts in relation to this matter, with the hope that, when the House shall be put in full possession thereof, neither the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, nor a salary and outfit for a minister, will be withheld from that country. Antecedent to the establishment of the imperial Government under Iturbide, in May, 1822, and while these colonies were struggling for independence from the yoke of old Spain, many Americans engaged in the Mexican service, to aid and assist in achieving that independence for the South American provinces, which was achieved. For these services the new Government had nothing to give, but promised those enterprising Americans large bounties in land. Amongst others of that day (who fought in the Mexican wars) of my acquaintance, there is one deserving of particular mention; I mean Colonel Reuben Ross, of Tennessee. I believe he was a native of Virginia. He had a colonel's command in the Mexican service, and went through many hard-fought battles with the royal forces, and upon one memorable occasion, when he was in command in an engagement, the various evolutions which are frequent in battles brought him in contact with the commander of the royal forces, both on horseback. The intrepid and gallant Ross, whose soul burnt high with patriotism and noble daring, attacked the Don in single combat. The Spaniard fell, and Ross lost a finger. The Government of Mexico awarded him a large body of land in Texas. He was my constituent: he lived then in a district I had the honor of representing in the Senate of Tennessee. After the independence of the country was established, and the authority of old Spain had ceased, Colonel Ross procured his grants for the lands, and upon his return home he was treacherously murdered, with most of his company, in the Mexican dominions, by those same Spaniards whom he had so long and so nobly fought to make free. I mention this fact to show that many of the Americans fought for the Mexicans then, as well as they have fought for the Texans since—that these lands were dearly bought. I could, if time would permit, cite many daring deeds of valor performed by Ross and others, which equal the battle of Jacinto, the Alamo, or any other, against the armies of old Spain. I contend that the Mexican Government has less reason to complain of an interference by volunteers from the United States, and of the propriety of our acknowledgment of the Texian independence, than any people upon the face of the earth. It was precisely what she implored of our citizens in her contest with old Spain. She sought the aid of our citizens to fight her battles. She sought our sympathies and our prayers for her success. She sought an acknowledgment of her independence, while the royal armies were yet in some portions of the country, and in possession of some of the strongest forts. She obtained it all. And, presupposing that every word of complaint which has been so dolefully uttered by the gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts, in regard to our enterprising young men seeking service in the armies of Texas, is true, it is no more than was solicited, accepted, and sanctioned with great joy by the Mexicans, upon precisely a similar occasion, between them and old Spain. Mexico was extremely willing to receive the voluntary aid of our enterprising men then; but, like the lawyer's ox that was gored by the bull of the farmer, it alters the case now.

But to proceed with the history: Revolution succeeded revolution in the South American provinces and Spanish North America. In May, 1822, General Iturbide, by fraud, force, and the assistance of the Catholic priesthood, (who are in all countries more opposed to republican government and the liberty of man than any other sect,) established an imperial Government, and was chosen Emperor. The example of our Government, which lay contiguous, and the germs of liberty which began to sprout from an imperfect knowledge of our institutions, and an intermixture with a few of our men in their armies, in a short time produced another revolution. Iturbide was dethroned, a sentence of banishment was passed upon him; he went into exile, returned, was taken captive, and shot. Victoria was elected by the people; a republican constitution was formed, modelled in most of its leading principles in imitation of that of the United States; notwithstanding this, he had to encounter civil wars, conspiracies, treasons, and rebellions, during all his administration. Pedrazza, elected successor to Victoria, was in a short time deposed by Guerrero, who in his turn was deposed by Bustamante, and at length he was deposed and driven into exile by the modern Napoleon of the South, Santa Anna, who had waded through seas of blood, and mountains of carnage, and the perfidy of the priesthood, to empire. He abolished the Congress of the republic by a military decree, organized a tribunal composed of his own creatures in its place, merely to register his despotic decrees. He abolished the local legislatures, established military and arbitrary tribunals in their place, abolished the trial by jury, and settled down in a complete despotism of the worst kind, because it was a military one. To this prostration of the constitution that he had sworn and fought to support, the overthrowing of a government of liberty and laws, the abolishment of the trial by jury, and the establishment of a military despotism, the people of Texas objected. There was much of that Anglo-Saxon blood, descended from that immortal band of Englishmen who took their honor in one hand and their sword in the other, and obtained magna charta from King John.

Santa Anna being enraged at the thought of resistance to his decrees from a few thousand Texans, when he had fought and conquered through millions until the imperial diadem was ready to be placed upon his head, swore utter extermination from the face of the earth of all the inhabitants of Texas, and particularly of the North American or Anglo-Saxon race, not even sparing the women and children. With this view he started for Texas at the head of his hosts, to execute his infernal purpose. But, Mr. Chairman, it becomes necessary for me to leave him upon the road to Texas, and return to that gallant people, for the purpose of bringing up their history from where I left it, in the hands of the gallant Ross, before the establishment of the empire, under Iturbide. It will be held in remembrance that Ross and others received grants for their services, performed against the royal forces of old Spain, before the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. During all the civil wars and convulsions, conspiracies and rebellions, that took place in the Mexican republic, from the establishment of their federal constitution, in 1824, the Government had been inviting foreigners from every country to go and settle in Texas, and carry as many families as possible; every inducement was held out to invite emigration thither; large bounties of land were offered for this purpose. The reason for this proceeding was obvious. Being torn to pieces by civil and central revolutions, which succeeded each other in rapid succession, their finances were exhausted, their armies were wasting away in civil wars, their convulsions were so quick and terrible that they could not spare either men or money to defend the frontiers against the habitual attacks of the Comanche and other hostile Indian tribes. Such a scourge had those Indians become to the frontier settlements and to Texas, that they at pleasure overran the Spanish towns and villages, took the inhabitants into captivity, and made servants of them. In other instances these hordes of barbarians would take possession of the frontier towns, compel the inhabitants, who were large owners of stock, to go and drive up their own horses, mules, and cattle, until these Indians would select all the most valuable of them, and drive them off, after committing acts of rapine and murder of the most atrocious character upon the inhabitants, and no help could be received from the Government of Mexico.

These enormities were repeated year after year, and no prospect of better things was in anticipation. To stop those lawless excursions of plunder, murder, and robbery, to beat back those ferocious barbarians, and protect the Spanish citizens who were the annual victims of rapine and violence, the Mexican Government adopted the only practicable mode of affording that relief that she had in her power to render. It was to make large grants of land to citizens of the United States, who would either pay money at a stipulated price into their empty coffers, or who would settle down with one, two, three, or four hundred families, upon those lands, and defend the country from the savage inroads.

I personally knew of some companies who were organized in Tennessee. They elected their representatives, sent them to the city of Mexico, publicly and notoriously, without any guile, fraud, or circumvention, to negotiate this business. I will mention the names of three of these representatives or ambassadors, who were despatched upon this mission: Colonel Andrew Erwin, who had been for a number of years a member of the North Carolina and also Tennessee Legislatures, and a gentleman of considerable talents and experience, together with Doctor Douglass and Colonel John D. Martin, a lawyer of high standing. They went, as well as the representatives from other companies, to the city of Mexico, and remained some months upon the business of this mission.

After a full examination of the constitution of 1824, establishing a Federal Government, with full guarantees for the perfect enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and a toleration of their religion, and other rights and immunities similar to our own, a number of purchases were made, mostly for the consideration of obtaining settlers upon those lands. Grants were issued. The grantees procured settlers, and emigrated to the country. Immediately, upon these events, the savage roamed no longer in hostile array over the plains of Texas. They were beat back into their own boundaries. The tomahawk and scalping-knife rested from their labors. The Spaniard sat down under his own vine and fig tree, and enjoyed his property and the fruits of his industry in peace. The Anglo-Saxon blood which had got into the country was a perfect guarantee against lawless depredation. The settlers furnished their own guns, their own provisions, their own ammunition; the Mexican Government did not even furnish so much as one flint to aid in this matter.

But the frontier settlements were secured, when Bustamente undertook to overthrow the liberties of his country, in one of the many Mexican revolutions. Santa Anna declared himself the champion of the constitution of 1824, the defender of the Federal Government. He had previous to that defeated the last mad expedition that had been sent out by old Spain to subjugate the South American provinces. He became the hero of Tampico. The patriots of Mexico looked to him to put down the tyrant Bustamente. The Texians hoisted his flag—it was considered then the flag of liberty—they took two forts with their rifles, and left Santa Anna to operate in the centre, without having a foe in their country. He did operate; he deposed Bustamente. But, to the great mortification and disappointment of all the friends of liberty throughout the world, he got into power under pretence of patriotism, and instantly overturned the constitution of his country. He started to rivet the chains of despotism by abolishing free government, and substituting a military one, in the manner I before related. He came. The splendid defence of Colonel Fanning, in destroying nine hundred of Santa Anna's men with less than half that number, and placing hors de combat several hundreds of others, will live immortal in story; and notwithstanding the warrior and his brave little band have sunk into the tomb by the blackest treachery, instead of the force of the Spaniard's prowess, yet ages unborn will drop a tear of admiration and sympathy upon the tombs of those immolated heroes, as they pass the fated spot.

Next in order is the Alamo, where the brave and gallant Crockett, with his one hundred and fifty compeers, headed by himself and Colonel Travis, made a defence against five-and-twenty hundred Mexicans, which would do honor to any general in any age. And although they fell, they fell like the strong man of old: they pulled down the pillars of Santa Anna's strength with them; for that immortal little band destroyed fourteen hundred of the enemies of liberty, and shed a lustre of immortality around their names which will secure them the brightest page in history. Their heroic deeds will be told in poetry and song to generations yet unborn, and the blood that was shed at the Alamo will generate millions of men, to fight the battles of freedom throughout the world.

A brilliant feat is yet to follow. Houston and his army were alive, and the God of battles was with them. The battle of San Jacinto soon followed, which sealed the tyrant's fate, redeeming a country from bondage, and proved to the world that tyranny and oppression cannot prevail against that indomitable Anglo-Saxon spirit which is now pervading the whole earth.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, has been for the ear of those who have thought less, and perhaps examined less, upon the subject of Texas than I have. Many have gone from my district, and settled in that country; some of them have laid down their lives in battling for their rights; others have relations yet remaining, who feel intensely for those who have gone there. This question must and will be disposed of at this session in some way. We cannot expect to satisfy all; it is needless to wait for that. If we were to wait until the morning of the resurrection, many here would not vote for the recognition. Other and far different motives than the situation of the contending parties will govern the action of a portion of this House. There are some who feel somewhat aristocratical by nature, and have no right good will for republican forms of government any how; there are others in the North and East who think that an annexation of Texas to the United States might probably follow a recognition of her independence, and that the balance of power would be thrown in that direction; others are fearful it will be a slaveholding country. We may as well meet the question at once; it has to be met, and that shortly. No one can possibly suppose that Mexico can ever reassert her power in Texas. If I were permitted to use the language of the heathen mythologists, I should say that an assembly of the gods had congregated for the express purpose of taking into consideration the wrongs and oppressions inflicted upon Texas, and that a decree had been registered in high heaven that Texas shall henceforth be free, sovereign, and independent.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Deposit Banks—Secretary of the Treasury—Reuben M. Whitney—Report of the Investigating Committee.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, from a majority of the Select Committee appointed on the 4th day of January last, to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of public money have employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business at the Treasury Department; also, the character of such business; the compensation received by said agent; whether employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether he receives compensation from the Treasury Department, &c., reported thereon at length, concluding with the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department has been employed at the request or through the procurement of said Department.

3. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department is not conducted through any agent, but is transacted directly with the Secretary of the Treasury or some officer of the Department.

4. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no agent in any way connected with the public deposits, since the removal of said deposits from the Bank of the United States, has received any compensation from the Treasury Department.

5. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That several of the deposit banks have employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of receiving and transmitting information affecting the interests of said banks, both from the Treasury Department and other sources, and transmitting public documents; that agent is Reuben M. Whitney, who receives such salary from said banks as they annually deem his services worth.

Which said resolutions lie upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. PEXTON, from the same committee, submitted, at length, the views of the minority, accompanied by a resolution that the same, with the accompanying documents, be inserted in the journal of the House, as containing the views of the minority of this committee; and moved that the report of the minority of said committee be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill prohibiting in future, under sufficient penalties, the communication of secret intelligence, by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the deposit or any other banks, which concerns all banks alike.

Funds receivable for Lands and Custom-house Duties.

Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the Senate's bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenue of the United States; which was agreed to—yeas 116, nays 28.

This bill had been reported back to the House, with the following amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of this act shall be construed as repealing any existing law relative to the collection of the revenue from customs or public lands in the legal currency, or as substituting bank notes of any description as a lawful currency for coin, as provided in the Constitution of the United States; nor to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the power to direct the collectors or receivers of the public revenue, whether derived from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of the public lands, not to receive in payment, for any sum due to the United States, the notes of any bank or banks which the said Secretary may have reason to believe unworthy of credit, or which he apprehends may be compelled to suspend specie payments."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, at any other period of the session than the present, he might have addressed some remarks to the House on this subject, but he would now forbear. The Committee of Ways and Means, for the purpose of preventing a misconstruction of the act, and securing the public revenue from serious frauds, had brought forward this amendment. It was, however, for the House to adopt or reject it, as they thought proper; but he hoped those gentlemen who were so solicitous about this bill would grant him the privilege of recording his vote upon the amendment. Mr. C. then called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he would not occupy the attention of the House more than a moment. The amendment, he apprehended, was new to most of the members upon this floor. He had examined it carefully, and he believed that the effect of it, if it passed, would be to legalize powers that were claimed and exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, which were before, to say the least, very doubtful. Its effect would be to destroy the bill, to neutralize and to nullify every valuable provision in it. He stated this to the gentlemen of the West; for, if he understood the amendment, its effect, if carried out, would be the same as the Treasury order, viz: to bring the whole country, in the region of the land offices, down to a specie basis; to drive from circulation every bank note, which would be converted into specie, issued by the banks in the neighborhood of the land offices; and, in place of their own paper, have in circulation the notes of distant banks—those of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England.

He did not give his assent to all the provisions of this bill; it was not one which he would have offered, nor was it the best bill that could have been presented and matured. He took this occasion to say that he deemed the whole system of banking, the whole financial operations of the Government, so far as the currency was concerned, as in a distracted condition, and such as did not meet his concurrence. He believed it was a system which, sooner or later, would inflict, must inflict, on the country a calamity which now was probably little anticipated. He believed that the currency of this wide-extended country never could be properly regulated without some great central controlling power over the State banks. But he would not now go further into the subject, because he knew that the time of the House was too valuable, at this period of the session, to be occupied by him.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said gentlemen looked upon this bill as a repeal of the Treasury order. This was not so; because at last it left the matter with the Secretary of the Treasury; and he ventured to say, if the bill was now passed, the specie order would not be repealed. It did not require the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the notes of specie-paying banks for the public revenue, but left it discretionary with him to do so or not. The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means merely declared the effect of the provisions of the constitution, which were paramount to all the laws which could be passed on the subject. If the bill went to legalize the notes of any banks in payment for the public revenue, he ventured to assert that it would receive but few votes in that House.

Mr. MERCER made some remarks in opposition to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MANN,) and in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BOULDIN merely rose to say that he should vote on the various bills, propositions, and amendments, relating to the currency and money in which the public dues were collected, as it might seem best, or rather, least mischievous. By these votes he did not wish to be understood to mean that any remedy could be found for the evil proposed to be cured or affected—pretended to be designed by these measures to be cured. He meant the evil arising out of having in, or passing through, the Treasury of the United States such vast sums of money as are, and have been, and probably will be for some time.

He said he did not mean to advocate distribution, tariff, breach of constitution, consolidation; nothing like it. All this thing is done. The money has been raised almost at the point of the bayonet, or rather the sums that paid off our debts, and left this balance under protecting duties; against which he had labored all he could, and all in vain. What should be done with them? He knew they corrupted the people's agents, in the States as well as here. Those agents are neither better nor worse than they are here. This is the reason that we cannot find out and agree upon what shall be done with the money. They that have it there, as well as they that have it here, do not wish to part with it.

Mr. PATTON supported the bill, and opposed the amendment, which he insisted went to nullify the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, remarking that the House and the nation well understood the whole subject, demanded the previous question.

Mr. GALBRAITH inquired if the previous question would cut off the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIR replied that such would be the effect of the success of that motion.

The House seconded the demand for the previous question—yeas 82, nays 66.

So the House ordered the main question to be now put.

Mr. McCARTY asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 143, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Beale, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, J. Investigation Reports.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the report of

* This bill, though passing both Houses by so large a vote, did not become law, remaining unsigned by the President on account of the uncertainty of its provisions, after consultation with the Attorney-General, (Benjamin F. Butler, Esq.,) as explained in the following declaration communicated by the President to Congress, and filed in the Department of State:—

Reasons of President Jackson for not acting definitively on the bill entitled "An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States."

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States," came to my hands yesterday, at two o'clock P. M. On perusing it, I found its provisions so complex and uncertain, that I deemed it necessary to obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States on several important questions, touching its construction and effect, before I could decide on the disposition to be made of it. The Attorney-General took up the subject immediately, and his reply was reported to me this day at five o'clock P. M. As this officer, after a careful and laborious examination of the bill, and a distinct expression of his opinion on the points proposed to him, still came to the conclusion that the construction of the bill, should it become a law, would be yet a subject of much perplexity and doubt, (a view of the bill entirely coincident with my own,) and as I cannot think it proper, in a matter of such interest and of such constant application, to approve a bill so liable to diversity of interpretations, and more especially as I have not had time, amid the duties constantly pressing on me, to give the subject that deliberate consideration which its importance demands, I am constrained to retain the bill, without acting definitively therein; and to the end that my reasons for this step may be fully understood I shall cause this paper, with the opinion of the Attorney General, and the bill in question, to be deposited in the Department of State. Washington, March 8, 1837, one-quarter before twelve P. M.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Note.—This 8d of March was the last day of General Jackson's presidential service; and, as he held that the day ended at midnight, he took care to do this last official act before the expiration of the day, and to preserve the evidence of it.

the minority of the Select Committee of which he is chairman, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND moved to print 5,000 extra copies of the two reports, without the evidence.

The House having agreed to consider the motion at this time,

Mr. HAWES moved to amend this motion by adding 5,000 copies of the report of the Select Committee on the West Point Academy. Agreed to—yeas 64, nays 48.

Fortification Bill—Deposit Clause.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1837, and for other purposes, had been returned from the Senate with an amendment, striking out that portion of the bill which provides that the money which may remain in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January next, reserving five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, according to certain provisions of the act to regulate the public deposits, passed June 23, 1836; and the question was on concurring with the Senate in their amendment.

Mr. BELL said he would make but a remark or two upon the motion which he proposed to make in relation to the amendment of the Senate.

The House had incorporated the clause for a distribution of any surplus which might be in the Treasury at the end of the year, among the States, into the fortification bill, by a large and decisive majority. The Senate amended the bill by striking out this most important provision; and this House, upon a reconsideration of the subject, reaffirmed their first decision, and disagreed to the amendment of the Senate, by a majority equally decisive, and one which, under the circumstances, I might say was overwhelming. The Senate has thought proper, nevertheless, to insist upon its amendment; and the question is now presented, whether we shall recede from the ground we have taken, or firmly adhere to a measure which we believe to be of vital interest. The question is one of the first magnitude, of the greatest importance, and connected directly with the permanent interest and welfare of the whole country. We have now to decide whether this, the popular branch of the National Legislature—whether we, the representatives of the people, to whom the constitution has intrusted, in an especial manner, the guardianship and the duty of preserving the public treasure—shall surrender up our trust, abandon our own views of public duty, and conform to the wishes and will of the Senate. A principle of deep interest is thus involved in this question, besides that of mere expediency in relation to the particular measure under consideration. Can any one doubt the line of duty thus plainly marked out to us? Are we not bound in justice to ourselves, in justice to the constitution and to the best interests of the country, firmly to adhere to our first resolve? Upon the point of expediency, whatever doubt may have existed in the minds of any, whether there would be a surplus of any considerable amount at the end of the year, when this proposition was first submitted, surely now, since the land bill has been laid upon the table, and not the slightest prospect remains of reviving it at the present session, there is no longer any ground of uncertainty as to that question. All must now admit, not only that there will be a surplus, but that it will be a very large one; and the question is now presented, and must be decided by the vote which we are about to take, whether the fifteen or twenty millions in the Treasury, over and above the demands of the public service, will be more secure when deposited with and distributed among the several States of the Union, or in State banks over which we have no control, whose condition at this moment is inflated, uncertain, and perilous in the highest degree. Those who think the States less safe or trustworthy than the numerous State banks which hold the public moneys in deposit, will of course be against us.

Another great question is presented, and must be decided by our present action. It is, whether we shall suffer a surplus revenue, the unavoidable and unforeseen result of past legislation, to remain in the national Treasury to tempt the next Congress, as it has done the present one, to swell the expenditures of the Government in a degree and in a manner wholly inconsistent with every idea of economy. I do not intend to enter further into the argument. I have observed, at another step of the progress of this measure, that I considered the argument, both for and against it, fully before the country; and I conclude by moving that this House do insist upon its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

The SPEAKER said that motion, if rejected, would be equivalent to a motion to agree to the amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that, as he believed every gentleman had made up his mind, he would move the previous question.

The question then recurred on the demand for the previous question, and was decided in the affirmative.

So there was a second.

Mr. HOWELL demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were refused. And the House determined that the main question should be now taken.

Mr. BELL asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "Will the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne,

So the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate.

FRIDAY, March 3.

French Spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. HOWARD said that he was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which were referred numerous memorials from claimants for French spoliations prior to 1800, to move that a list of those claimants, which he held in his hand, be printed for the use of the House. It had been asserted, by those opposed to the claims, that they were chiefly in the hands of speculators, who had purchased them at a small price, and were therefore not entitled to as much justice as the original sufferers would have been. The committee had endeavored to classify the petitioners; and the result would show that there was little or no foundation for this opinion. When the names should be printed, he hoped the members of the House would test its accuracy by examining the names of the claimants in the several States.

Mr. H. said he would add, upon his individual responsibility as a member of this House, that, from a laborious investigation, he was satisfied of the intrinsic justice of these claims, and believed that they must and would be paid at some time or other. As far as his voice could reach, he encouraged the claimants to persevere, and not suffer their energy to be overcome by the long delay which had been heretofore painfully, and, he would add, unjustly experienced.

The following is an abstract of the list :

The motion of Mr. H. was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. Wise, from the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, presented the reports of the majority and minority of that committee, and also the views of an individual member of the committee, which he moved to lay on the table, and that the reports, journal of the committee, and accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

Fortification Bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, and for other purposes, for the year 1837; which said bill had been returned from the Senate with a message that that body insisted on its amendment, by which the amendment of this House, providing for the distribution of such surplus revenue as might remain in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January next, reserving five millions of dollars, according to the provisions of the act to regulate the public deposits, approved June 23, 1836, was rejected.

Mr. BELL, after a few introductory remarks, urging the propriety and necessity of the motion he was about to make, moved that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

And the main question was then taken, and decided—yeas 106, nays 88.

So the House insisted on their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Thanks to the Speaker.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, (Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, then temporarily occupying the chair,)

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable JAMES K. POLK, for the able, dignified, and impartial manner with which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Fortification Bill—Distribution of the Surplus.

Mr. BELL then asked the general consent of the House to make a report from the committee of conference.

Leave being granted,

Mr. BELL rose and said: Mr. Speaker: The committee of conference appointed on the part of this House to meet a similar committee appointed by the Senate, on their motion, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to the amendment of the Senate which proposed to strike out from the “bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837, and for other purposes,” that clause proposing to distribute the surplus revenue on the 1st day of January next, report that they have performed the duty assigned them, and have come to no agreement. Mr. B. therefore felt it his duty to report this fact to the House, that it might, if it chose, at this period of the sitting, proceed to take such other steps as it should think proper; and he now moved that the House do adhere to their disagreement.

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. BELL, that the House do adhere to their disagreement to the Senate's amendment—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, as this was the last vote that could be taken on this subject, he had merely to state that, if the House adhered, the bill was lost. [Loud cries of order! order! from several parts of the hall; and if Mr. C. did make any additional remarks, his voice was entirely drowned by the noise.]

Mr. GRANGER. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had announced that this bill was lost if the House adhered. How did he know that?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I have the assurance from the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BELL remarked that the gentleman's declaration was a most extraordinary one. The committee of three persons on the part of the Senate, or any number of gentlemen of that House, might think that, because that committee could come to no agreement, the body it represented might not. But nothing could be more true than that the committee of the Senate could not vote for or speak for the whole body of the Senate, or even for a majority of it. They spoke, and spoke only, their own sentiments; the same as the committee on the part of the House spoke their sentiments as a committee. Neither could speak or vote for the whole body or a majority of it; else why the necessity of approving, disapproving, adopting, or rejecting their report?

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the gentleman from New York was in order in referring to what had taken place before the committee of conference.

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire) said the point ought to have been raised at the time.

Mr. ADAMS had understood the point of order was made, for the gentleman was loudly called to order; and Mr. A. held it to be the duty of the Speaker at once to have arrested the remarks.

The CHAIR had heard no gentleman rise in his place and raise the point of order, or he should have at once entertained it.

Mr. ADAMS. Was it in order for the gentleman from New York to intimidate, or to make remarks for the purpose of intimidating, the members of this House in the votes they might be about to give?

The CHAIR had not heard any "intimidation" thrown out by the member from New York.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that no member would be influenced by what fell from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, gentlemen might take the responsibility of losing the fortification bill if they pleased. Upon him at least it would not rest, and he should vote to recede.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought it entirely useless to be indulging in recrimination on this subject. He believed every man had made up his mind, and was willing to assume the responsibility, if any there was, or would be, in this matter. For his own part, he was perfectly ready and willing to take his share of it. He had voted against the proposition ingrafted on this bill in the first instance, because it contained what he believed to be a most obnoxious principle—that of distribution; and which, in his opinion, counterbalanced and overbalanced all the benefits of the fortification bill. He was also willing to vote against it again, on the same ground, and to assume his share of the responsibility; but, believing that speeches would make no converts, he hoped the question would be taken without further debate.

Mr. LANE said, the bill called the deposit bill of the last session sprang from a legitimate source, from one of the standing committees, and was a bill connected with but a single other provision near of kin. It was known, officially known, that a large surplus had and would accumulate in the Treasury, beyond the wants of the Government, and there was time for the action of Congress, and an apparent necessity for it. Otherwise, in the present case, it has been introduced as an amendment to the fortification bill—a bill upon which the safety of our commerce, our cities, our people, and the national honor, depend—at the close of the session; not a bill of this House, but of the Senate. The Senate has refused to concur. This House has adhered. The Senate again refuse to concur, and, in all due courtesy, has asked a committee of conference. That committee fail to agree; and it now remains to be determined whether this House will recede; if it does not, the fortification bill, so important to the defence of the country, must fall.

If a pertinacious adherence to the amendment would save the amendment, even at the loss of the fortification bill, there would exist some reason for firmness; but the disagreement has arrived at that point of legislation which, by the vote now to be taken on the motion to recede, is to decide the fate of both: to recede is to pass the fortification bill—to refuse is the loss of both. This House must recede, or they sleep together.

Mr. L. said he called upon honorable members to pause and reflect before they gave such a vote; a vote that would not only put a stop to all the public works now in progress, and permit them to fall into decay, but blight the national credit and honor by a breach of national faith. Existing contracts must be violated, for the want of money in the hands of the Executive to fulfil them.

Sir, (said Mr. L.,) when does the amendment propose to deposit the surplus revenue? Not until January, 1838.

Mr. L. said he would call upon honorable members to say if any necessity existed for such premature action upon the subject of the surplus revenue. The amendment proposed to distribute in January, 1838, before it can be known whether there will be any to distribute. A war with Mexico, or a protracted one with the Indian tribes, and it would all be swallowed up for national defence. Suppose a large surplus should accumulate, there will be ample time for the next Congress to act upon the subject before the amendment, if adopted, could take effect. Sir, this House has but a few hours to act; the next Congress will have a month. From estimates laid before them, they will be able to act advisedly upon the subject.

Mr. MANN, of New York, expressed a hope that this question was not to be debated again at this late hour; and he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I second the motion, for I do hope that it will not be debated any more.

The demand for the previous question was then seconded by the House—yeas 135; and the main question was ordered, without a division.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, N. H. So the House determined to adhere to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment; and a message was sent to that body, by its Clerk, notifying them of the fact.

Vol. XIII.—22

Speaker's Address.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: The twenty-fourth Congress has now closed its deliberations, and, being about to be dissolved, I seize the moment of our separation to return to this House my profound acknowledgments for the many evidences I have had of your indulgent kindness, and generous confidence and support, during the period I have presided over your deliberations; but more especially do I return to you my sincere thanks for the vote you have been pleased this day to pass, approving my official conduct in the chair. No language, gentlemen, can adequately convey the deep sense of gratitude which this testimonial of your good opinion has excited in my breast. The gratification which it has afforded is the greater, because the resolution which you have passed conveys the voluntary and deliberately expressed opinions of gentlemen, with many of whom I have been long associated here, all of whom have been the eyewitnesses of my conduct as the presiding officer of this House, and whose friendship, esteem, and confidence, I shall cherish to the latest hour of my life.

I entered upon the duties of this high station with a full sense of the responsibility which must often devolve upon me, and with the fixed purpose, if I know my own heart, so to discharge those duties as to merit the respect and good opinion of this House and the approbation of the country. I have had no other desire than that the rules and parliamentary laws by which our proceedings are regulated should be properly expounded and correctly administered. It is due to candor to say that the steady and unwavering support which you have upon all occasions given me has alone enabled me successfully to discharge the duties assigned me. The anxiety and solicitude which I have often felt, and especially in seasons of great political excitement, from which our deliberations have not been exempt, to perform my duty, not only with faithfulness, but acceptably to the House and to the country, can be known and appreciated only by him who has filled this chair. Amidst the embarrassments and difficulties which have often surrounded me, it has given me pleasure, upon all occasions, to court the advice and correction of the House if I erred; and it is a source of the highest gratification to me to know that, upon the numerous occasions when the House has been appealed to to affirm or reverse the official decisions which it was my duty to make, you have promptly given me your support. I am not vain enough to believe that I have passed through the many trying occasions which have occurred in the course of our deliberations, during which many difficult and often novel questions of parliamentary law and practice have been suddenly presented for instantaneous decision, without having often fallen into error. If, however, I have erred, I trust it has not been on points material; I know it has not been intentional; and the approbation of my official conduct which you have this day expressed affords the highest proof that you have generously overlooked my errors, and done more than justice to the unwearied efforts I have made to merit your good opinion, and, so far as depended on my official acts, to promote the interests of our constituents.

If, gentlemen, in the course of our deliberations as the representatives of the nation, there has been occasional excitement or feeling, growing out of political collisions, the natural offspring of honest differences of opinion, now that we are about to separate, many of us never again to meet in this hall, or "this side the grave," may we not hope that all recollection of unpleasant incidents that are passed may be forgotten, and that each one of us, whatever may be his future destiny, may devote himself to the advancement of the best interests of our country. In taking leave of you, gentlemen, I wish you a safe return to your families and friends; and my prayer is, that the blessings of an overruling Providence may rest upon you all.

And now it only remains for me to perform the last duty assigned me, by the adjournment of this House, and, accordingly, I announce that this House stands adjourned without day.

The House then adjourned.

By the President :

JOHN FORSYTH, Secretary of State.

MONDAY, September 4, 1837.

This being the day designated in the proclamation of the President of the United States for a special meeting of both Houses of Congress, the Senate assembled in the Senate Chamber at the Capitol, at the usual hour of 12 o'clock.

Hon. RICHARD M. JOHNSON, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock, when forty-two Senators appeared in their seats.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, presented the credentials of Messrs. C. C. CLAY and ROBERT STRANGE, Senators as above, who took the usual oath.

Mr. RIVES presented the credentials of Mr. ROANE, Senator as above, who was also qualified.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the Secretary of the Senate was instructed to inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate was now present, and ready to proceed to business.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that a committee be appointed to join a similar committee from the House, in order to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress was assembled and ready to receive such communication as he might have to make; and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIR was, on motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, authorized to appoint the said committee; and Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. KING, of Alabama, were appointed accordingly.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the usual number of newspapers was ordered for the use of the Senators.

The Senate then, on motion, proceeded to the election of the Sergeant-at-arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate; whereupon STEPHEN HAIGHT (the late doorkeeper) was unanimously elected, at the first balloting, Sergeant-at-arms to the Senate, in room of the late Sergeant, Mr. SHACKFORD, deceased; and at the third balloting, Mr. EDWARD WYER was elected (out of many candidates) Doorkeeper in room of Mr. HAIGHT.

And then the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, September 5.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, through Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, announcing to the Senate that a quorum of the House had assembled, had elected a Speaker, had concurred with the resolution of the Senate for appointing a committee to wait on the President of the United States, and had appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the joint committee appointed to inform the President of the United States that a quorum of the two Houses was assembled and ready to proceed to business, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had expressed to them his intention to communicate to the two Houses, in writing, this day at 12 o'clock.

A Message was accordingly received from the President of the United States, by Mr. VAN BUREN, his private secretary, and was read by the Secretary, as follows :

Fellow-citizens of the Senate

and House of Representatives :

The act of the 23d of June, 1836, regulating the deposits of the public money, and directing the employment of State, District, and Territorial banks for that purpose, made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of such of them as should at any time refuse to redeem their notes in specie, and to substitute other banks, provided a sufficient number could be obtained to receive the public deposits upon the terms and conditions therein prescribed. The general and almost simultaneous suspension of specie payments by the banks in May last, rendered the performance of his duty imperative, in respect to those which had been selected under the act; and made it, at the same time, impracticable to employ the requisite number of others, upon the prescribed conditions. The specific regulations established by Congress for the deposit and safe-keeping of the public moneys having thus unexpectedly become inoperative, I felt it to be my duty to afford you an early opportunity for the exercise of your supervisory powers over the subject.

I was also led to apprehend that the suspension of specie payments, increasing the embarrassments before existing in the pecuniary affairs of the country, would so far diminish the public revenue, that the accruing receipts into the Treasury would not, with the reserved five millions, be sufficient to defray the unavoidable expenses of the Government, until the usual period for the meeting of Congress; whilst the authority to call upon the States for a portion of the sums deposited with them, was too restricted to enable the Department to realize a sufficient amount from that source. These apprehensions have been justified by subsequent results, which render it certain that this deficiency will occur, if additional means be not provided by Congress.

The difficulties experienced by the mercantile interest, in meeting their engagements, induced them to apply to me, previously to the actual suspension of specie payments, for indulgence upon their bonds for duties; and all the relief authorized by law was promptly and cheerfully granted. The dependence of the Treasury upon the avails of these bonds, to enable it to make the deposits with the States required by law, led me in the outset to limit this indulgence to the first of September, but it has since been extended to the first of October, that the matter might be submitted to your further direction.

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

The President's Message.

[SENATE.]

Questions were also expected to arise in the recess in respect to the October instalment of those deposits, requiring the interposition of Congress.

A provision of another act, passed about the same time, and intended to secure a faithful compliance with the obligation of the United States to satisfy all demands upon them in specie or its equivalent, prohibited the offer of any bank note, not convertible on the spot into gold or silver at the will of the holder; and the ability of the Government, with millions on deposit, to meet its engagements in the manner thus required by law, was rendered very doubtful by the event to which I have referred.

Sensible that adequate provisions for these unexpected exigencies could only be made by Congress; convinced that some of them would be indispensably necessary to the public service, before the regular period of your meeting; and desirous also to enable you to exercise, at the earliest moment, your full constitutional powers for the relief of the country, I could not, with propriety, avoid subjecting you to the inconvenience of assembling at as early a day as the state of the popular representation would permit. I am sure that I have done but justice to your feelings, in believing that this inconvenience will be cheerfully encountered, in the hope of rendering your meeting conducive to the good of the country.

During the earlier stages of the revulsion through which we have just passed, much acrimonious discussion arose, and great diversity of opinion existed as to its real causes. This was not surprising. The operations of credit are so diversified, and the influences which affect them so numerous, and often so subtle, that even impartial and well-informed persons are seldom found to agree in respect to them. To inherent difficulties were also added other tendencies, which were by no means favorable to the discovery of truth. It was hardly to be expected that those who disapproved the policy of the Government in relation to the currency, would, in the excited state of public feeling produced by the occasion, fail to attribute to that policy any extensive embarrassment in the monetary affairs of the country. The matter thus became connected with the passions and conflicts of party; opinions were more or less affected by political considerations; and differences were prolonged which might otherwise have been determined by an appeal to facts, by the exercise of reason, or by mutual concession. It is, however, a cheering reflection that circumstances of this nature cannot prevent a community so intelligent as ours from ultimately arriving at correct conclusions. Encouraged by the firm belief of this truth, I proceed to state my views, so far as may be necessary to a clear understanding of the remedies I feel it my duty to propose, and of the reasons by which I have been led to recommend them.

The history of trade in the United States for the last three or four years affords the most convincing evidence that our present condition is chiefly to be attributed to over-action in all the departments of business; an over-action deriving, perhaps, its first impulses from antecedent causes, but stimulated to its destructive consequences by excessive issues of bank paper and by other facilities, for the acquisition and enlargement of credit. At the commencement of the year 1834, the banking capital of the United States, including that of the national bank then existing, amounted to about two hundred millions of dollars; the bank notes then in circulation to about ninety-five millions; and the loans and discounts of the banks to three hundred and twenty-four millions. Between that time and the first of January, 1836, being the latest period to which accurate accounts have been received, our banking capital was increased to more than two hundred and fifty-one millions; our paper circulation to more than one hundred and forty millions; and the loans and discounts to more than four hundred and fifty-seven millions. To this vast increase are to be added the many millions of credit, acquired by means of foreign loans, contracted by the States and State institutions, and, above all, by the lavish accommodations extended by foreign dealers to our merchants.

The consequences of this redundancy of credit, and of the spirit of reckless speculation engendered by it, were a foreign debt contracted by our citizens, estimated in March last at more than thirty millions of dollars; the extension to traders in the interior of our country of credits for supplies, greatly beyond the wants of the people; the investment of thirty-nine and a half millions of dollars in unproductive public lands, in the years 1835 and 1836, whilst in the preceding year the sales amounted to only four and a half millions; the creation of debts, to an almost countless amount, for real estate in existing or anticipated cities and villages, equally unproductive, and at prices now seen to have been greatly disproportionate to their real value; the expenditure of immense sums in improvements which, in many cases, have been found to be ruinously improvident; the diversion to other pursuits of much of the labor that should have been applied to agriculture, thereby contributing to the expenditure of large sums in the importation of grain from Europe—an expenditure which, amounting in 1834 to about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was, in the first two quarters of the present year, increased to more than two millions of dollars; and, finally, without enumerating other injurious results, the rapid growth among all classes, and especially in our great commercial towns, of luxurious habits, founded too often on merely fancied wealth, and detrimental alike to the industry, the resources, and the morals of our people.

It was so impossible that such a state of things could long continue, that the prospect of revulsion was present to the minds of considerate men before it actually came. None, however, had correctly anticipated its severity. A concurrence of circumstances, inadequate of themselves to produce such widespread and calamitous embarrassments, tended so greatly to aggravate them, that they cannot be overlooked in considering their history. Among these may be mentioned, as most prominent, the great loss of capital sustained by our commercial emporium in the fire of December, 1835—a loss the effects of which were underrated at the time, because postponed for a season by the great facilities of credit then existing; the disturbing effects, in our commercial cities, of the transfers of the public moneys required by the deposit law of June, 1836; and the measures adopted by the foreign creditors of our merchants to reduce their debts, and to withdraw from the United States a large portion of our specie.

However unwilling any of our citizens may heretofore have been to assign to these causes the chief instrumentality in producing the present state of things, the developments subsequently made, and the actual condition of other commercial countries, must, as it seems to me, dispel all remaining doubts upon the subject. It has since appeared that evils, similar to those suffered by ourselves, have been experienced in Great Britain, on the continent, and, indeed, throughout the commercial world; and that in other countries, as well as in our own, they have been uniformly preceded by an undue enlargement of the boundaries of trade, prompted, as with us, by unprecedented expansions of the systems of credit. A reference to the amount of banking capital, and the issues of paper credit put in circulation in Great Britain, by banks, and in other ways, during the years 1834, 1835, and 1836, will show an augmentation of the paper currency there, as much disproportioned to the real wants of trade as in the United States. With this redundancy of the paper currency, there arose in that country also a spirit of adventurous speculation, embracing the whole range of human enterprise. Aid was profusely given to projected improvements; large investments were made in foreign stocks and loans; credits for goods were granted with unbounded liberality to merchants in foreign countries; and all the means of acquiring and employing credit were put in active operation, and extended in their effects to every department of business, and to every quarter of the globe. The reaction was proportioned in its violence to the extraordinary character of the events which preceded it. The commercial community of Great Britain were subjected to the greatest difficulties, and their debtors in this country were not only suddenly deprived of accustomed and expected credits, but called upon for payments, which, in the actual posture of things here, could only be made through a general pressure, and at the most ruinous sacrifices.

In view of these facts, it would seem impossible for sincere inquirers after truth to resist the conviction that the causes of the revulsion in both countries have been substantially the same. Two nations, the most commercial in the world, enjoying but recently the highest degree of apparent prosperity, and maintaining with each other the closest relations, are suddenly, in a time of profound peace, and without any great national disaster, arrested in their career, and plunged into a state of embarrassment and distress. In both countries, we have witnessed the same redundancy of paper money, and other facilities of credit; the same spirit of speculation; the same partial successes; the same difficulties and reverses; and, at length, nearly the same overwhelming catastrophe. The most material difference between the results in the two countries has only been, that with us there has also occurred an extensive derangement in the fiscal affairs of the Federal and State Governments, occasioned by the suspension of specie payments by the banks.

The history of these causes and effects in Great Britain and the United States, is substantially the history of the revulsion in all other commercial countries.

The present and visible effects of these circumstances on the operations of the Government, and on the industry of the people, point out the objects which call for your immediate attention.

They are—to regulate by law the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys; to designate the funds to be received and paid by the Government; to enable the Treasury to meet promptly every demand upon it; to prescribe the terms of indulgence, and the mode of settlement to be adopted, as well in collecting from individuals the revenue that has accrued, as in withdrawing it from former depositories; and to devise and adopt such further measures, within the constitutional competency of Congress, as will be best calculated to revive the enterprise, and to promote the prosperity of the country.

For the deposit, transfer, and disbursement of the revenue, National and State banks have always, with temporary and limited exceptions, been heretofore employed; but, although advocates of each system are still to be found, it is apparent that the events of the last few months have greatly augmented the desire, long existing among the people of the United States, to separate the fiscal operations of the Government from those of individuals or corporations.

Again to create a national bank, as a fiscal agent, would be to disregard the popular will, twice solemnly and unequivocally expressed. On no question of domestic policy is there stronger evidence that the sentiments of a large majority are deliberately fixed; and I cannot concur with those who think they see, in recent events, a proof that these sentiments are, or a reason that they should be, changed.

Events, similar in their origin and character, have heretofore frequently occurred, without producing any such change; and the lessons of experience must be forgotten, if we suppose that the present overthrow of credit would have been prevented by the existence of a national bank. Proneness to excessive issues has ever been the vice of the banking system; a vice as prominent in national as in State institutions. This propensity is as subservient to the advancement of private interests in the one as in the other; and those who direct them both, being principally guided by the same views, and influenced by the same motives, will be equally ready to stimulate to extravagance of enterprise by improvidence of credit. How strikingly is this conclusion sustained by experience! The Bank of the United States, with the vast powers conferred on it by Congress, did not, or could not, prevent former and similar embarrassments; nor has the still greater strength it has been said to possess under its present charter, enabled it, in the existing emergency, to check other institutions, or even to save itself. In Great Britain, where, it has been seen, the same causes have been attended with the same effects, a national bank, possessing powers far greater than are asked for by the warmest advocates of such an institution here, has also proved unable to prevent an undue expansion of credit, and the evils that flow from it. Nor can I find any tenable ground for the re-establishment of a national bank, in the derangement alleged at present to exist in the domestic exchanges of the country, or in the facilities it may be capable of affording them. Although advantages of this sort were anticipated when the first bank of the United States was created, they were regarded as an incidental accommodation; not one which the Federal Government was bound, or could be called upon, to furnish. This accommodation is now, indeed, after the lapse of not many years, demanded from it as among its first duties, and an omission to aid and regulate commercial exchange is treated as a ground of loud and serious complaint. Such results only serve to exemplify the constant desire, among some of our citizens, to enlarge the powers of the Government, and extend its control to subjects with which it should not interfere. They can never justify the creation of an institution to promote such objects. On the contrary, they justly excite among the community a more diligent inquiry into the character of those operations of trade, towards which it is desired to extend such peculiar favors.

The various transactions which bear the name of domestic exchanges, differ essentially in their nature, operation, and utility. One class of them consists of bills of exchange, drawn for the purpose of transferring actual capital from one part of the country to another, or to anticipate the proceeds of property actually transmitted. Bills of this description are highly useful in the movements of trade, and well deserve all the encouragement which can rightfully be given to them. Another class is made up of bills of exchange, not drawn to transfer actual capital, nor on the credit of property transmitted, but to create fictitious capital, partaking at once of the character of notes discounted in bank, and of bank notes in circulation, and swelling the mass of paper credits to a vast extent, in the most objectionable manner. These bills have formed, for the last few years, a large proportion of what are termed the domestic exchanges of the country, serving as the means of usurious profit, and constituting the most unsafe and precarious paper in circulation. This species of traffic, instead of being upheld, ought to be discountenanced by the Government and the people.

In transferring its funds from place to place, the Government is on the same footing with the private citizen, and may resort to the same legal means. It may do so through the medium of bills drawn by itself, or purchased from others; and in these operations it may, in a manner undoubtedly constitutional and legitimate, facilitate and assist exchanges of individuals founded on real transactions of trade. The extent to which this may be done, and the best means of affecting it, are entitled to the fullest consideration. This has been bestowed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and his views will be submitted to you in his report.

But it was not designed by the constitution that the Government should assume the management of domestic or foreign exchange. It is, indeed, authorized to regulate by law the commerce between the States, and to provide a general standard of value, or medium of exchange, in gold and silver; but it is not its province to aid individuals in the transfer of their funds, otherwise than through the facilities afforded by the Post Office Department. As justly might it be called on to provide for the transportation of their merchandise. These are operations of trade. They ought to be conducted by those who are interested in them, in the same manner that the incidental difficulties of other pursuits are encountered by other classes of citizens. Such aid has not been deemed necessary in other countries. Throughout Europe, the domestic as well as the foreign exchanges are carried on by private houses, often, if not generally, without the assistance of banks. Yet they extend throughout distinct sovereignties, and far exceed in amount the real exchanges of the United States. There is no reason why our own may not be conducted in the same manner, with equal cheapness and safety. Certainly this might be accomplished, if it were favored by those most deeply interested; and few can doubt that their own interest, as well as the general welfare of the country, would be promoted by leaving such a subject in the hands of those to whom it properly belongs. A system founded on private interest, enterprise, and competition, without the aid of legislative grants or regulations by law, would rapidly prosper; it would be free from the influence of political agitation, and extend the same exemption to trade itself; and it would put an end to those complaints of neglect, partiality, injustice, and oppression, which are the unavoidable results of interference by the Government in the proper concerns of individuals. All former attempts on the part of the Government to carry its legislation, in this respect, further than was designed by the constitution, have in the end proved injurious, and have served only to convince the great body of the people, more and more, of the certain dangers of blending private interests with the operations of public business; and there is no reason to suppose that a repetition of them now would be more successful.

It cannot be concealed that there exists, in our community, opinions and feelings on this subject in direct opposition to each other. A large portion of them, combining great intelligence, activity, and influence, are no doubt sincere in their belief that the operations of trade ought to be assisted by such a connection; they regard a national bank as necessary for this purpose, and they are disinclined to every measure that does not tend, sooner or later, to the establishment of such an institution. On the other hand, a majority of the people are believed to be irreconcilably opposed to that measure: they consider such a concentration of power dangerous to their liberties; and many of them regard it as a violation of the constitution. This collision of opinion has, doubtless, caused much of the embarrassment to which the commercial transactions of the country have lately been exposed. Banking has become a political topic of the highest interest, and trade has suffered in the conflict of parties. A speedy termination of this state of things, however desirable, is scarcely to be expected. We have seen for nearly half a century that those who advocate a national bank, by whatever motive they may be influenced, constitute a portion of our community too numerous to allow us to hope for an early abandonment of their favorite plan. On the other hand, they must indeed form an erroneous estimate of the intelligence and temper of the American people, who suppose that they have continued, on slight or insufficient grounds, their persevering opposition to such an institution; or that they can be induced by pecuniary pressure, or by any other combination of circumstances, to surrender principles they have so long and so inflexibly maintained.

My own views of the subject are unchanged. They have been repeatedly and unreservedly announced to my fellow-citizens; who, with full knowledge of them, conferred upon me the two highest offices of the Government. On the last of these occasions, I felt it due to the people to apprise them, distinctly, that in the event of my election, I would not be able to co-operate in the re-establishment of a national bank. To these sentiments, I have now only to add the expression of an increased conviction, that the re-establishment of such a bank, in any form, whilst it would not accomplish the beneficial purpose promised by its advocates, would impair the rightful supremacy of the popular will; injure the character and diminish the influence of our political system; and bring once more into existence a concentrated moneyed power, hostile to the spirit, and threatening the permanency, of our republican institutions. Local banks have been employed for the deposit and distribution of the revenue, at all times partially, and, on three different occasions, exclusively: first, anterior to the establishment of the first Bank of the United States; secondly, in the interval between the termination of that institution and the charter of its successor; and, thirdly, during the limited period which has now so abruptly closed. The connection thus repeatedly attempted, proved unsatisfactory on each successive occasion, notwithstanding the various measures which were adopted to facilitate or insure its success. On the last occasion, in the year 1833, the employment of the State banks was guarded especially in every way which experience and caution could suggest. Personal security was required for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the moneys to be received, and full returns of their condition were, from time to time, to be made by the depositories. In the first stages the measure was eminently successful, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the Bank of the United States, and the unceasing efforts made to overthrow it. The selected banks performed with fidelity, and without any embarrassment to themselves or to the community, their engagements to the Government; and the system promised to be permanently useful. But when it became necessary, under the act of June, 1836, to withdraw from them the public money, for the purpose of placing it in additional institutions, or of transferring it to the States, they found it, in many cases, inconvenient to comply with the demands of the Treasury, and numerous and pressing applications were made for indulgence or relief. As the instalments under the deposit law became payable, their own embarrassments, and the necessity under which they lay of curtailing their discounts and calling in their debts, increased the general distress, and contributed, with other causes, to hasten the revulsion in which, at length, they, in common with the other banks, were fatally involved.

Under these circumstances, it becomes our solemn duty to inquire whether there are not, in any connection between the Government and banks of issue, evils of great magnitude, inherent in their very nature, and against which no precautions can effectually guard.

Unforeseen in the organization of the Government, and forced on the Treasury by early necessities, the practice of employing banks was, in truth, from the beginning, more a measure of emergency than of sound policy. When we started into existence as a nation, in addition to the burdens of the new Government, we assumed all the large but honorable load of debt which was the price of our liberty; but we hesitated to weigh down the infant industry of the country by resorting to adequate taxation for the necessary revenue. The facilities of banks in return for the privileges they acquired, were promptly offered, and perhaps too readily received, by an embarrassed Treasury. During the long continuance of a national debt, and the intervening difficulties of a foreign war, the connection was continued from motives of convenience; but these causes have long since passed away. We have no emergencies that make banks necessary to aid the wants of the Treasury; we have no load of national debt to provide for, and we have on actual deposit a large surplus. No public interest, therefore, now requires the renewal of a connection that circumstances have dissolved. The complete organization of our Government, the abundance of our resources, the general harmony which prevails between the different States, and with foreign powers—all enable us now to select the system most consistent with the constitution, and most conducive to the public welfare. Should we, then, connect the Treasury for a fourth time with the local banks, it can only be under a conviction that past failures have arisen from accidental, not inherent, defects.

A danger, difficult if not impossible to be avoided in such an arrangement, is made strikingly evident in the very event by which it has now been defeated. A sudden act of the banks intrusted with the funds of the people, deprives the Treasury, without fault or agency of the Government, of the ability to pay its creditors in the currency they have by law a right to demand. This circumstance no fluctuation of commerce could have produced, if the public revenue had been collected in the legal currency, and kept in that form by the officers of the Treasury. The citizen whose money was in bank receives it back, since the suspension, at a sacrifice in its amount; whilst he who kept it in the legal currency of the country, and in his own possession, pursues, without loss, the current of his business. The Government, placed in the situation of the former, is involved in embarrassments it could not have suffered had it pursued the course of the latter. These embarrassments are, moreover, augmented by those salutary and just laws which forbid it to use a depreciated currency, and, by so doing, take from the Government the ability which individuals have of accommodating their transactions to such a catastrophe.

A system which can, in a time of profound peace, when there is a large revenue laid by, thus suddenly prevent the application and the use of the money of the people, in the manner and for the objects they have directed, cannot be wise; but who can think, without painful reflection, that, under it, the same unforeseen events might have befallen us in the midst of a war, and taken from us, at the moment when most wanted, the use of those very means which were treasured up to promote the national welfare and guard our national rights? To such embarrassments and to such dangers will this Government be always exposed, whilst it takes the moneys raised for, and necessary to, the public service, out of the hands of its own officers, and converts them into a mere right of action against corporations intrusted with the possession of them. Nor can such results be effectually guarded against in such a system, without investing the Executive with a control over the banks themselves, whether State or national, that might with reason be objected to. Ours is, probably, the only Government in the world that is liable, in the management of its fiscal concerns, to occurrences like these. But this imminent risk is not the only danger attendant on the surrender of the public money to the custody and control of local corporations. Though the object is aid to the Treasury, its effect may be to introduce into the operations of the Government influences the most subtle, founded on interests the most selfish.

The use by the banks, for their own benefit, of the money deposited with them, has received the sanction of the Government from the commencement of this connection. The money received from the people, instead of being kept till it is needed for their use, is, in consequence of this authority, a fund, on which discounts are made for the profit of those who happen to be owners of stock in the banks selected as depositories. The supposed and often exaggerated advantages of such a boon will always cause it to be sought for with avidity. I will not stop to consider on whom the patronage incident to it is to be conferred; whether the selection and control be trusted to Congress or to the Executive, either will be subjected to appeals made in every form which the sagacity of interest can suggest. The banks, under such a system, are stimulated to make the most of their fortunate acquisition; the deposits are treated as an increase of capital; loans and circulation are rashly augmented, and, when the public exigencies require a return, it is attended with embarrassments not provided for, nor foreseen. Thus banks that thought themselves most fortunate when the public funds were received, find themselves most embarrassed when the season of payment suddenly arrives.

Unfortunately, too, the evils of the system are not limited to the banks. It stimulates a general rashness of enterprise, and aggravates the fluctuations of commerce and the currency. This result was strikingly exhibited during the late operations of the deposit system, and especially in the purchases of public lands. The order which ultimately directed the payment of gold and silver in such purchases, greatly checked, but would not altogether prevent, the evil. Specie was indeed more difficult to be procured than the notes which the banks could themselves create at pleasure; but still, being obtained from them as a loan, and returned as a deposit, which they were again at liberty to use, it only passed round the circle with diminished speed. This operation could not have been performed, had the funds of the Government gone into the Treasury, to be regularly disbursed, and not into banks, to be loaned out for their own profit, while they were permitted to substitute for it a credit in account.

In expressing these sentiments, I desire not to undervalue the benefits of a salutary credit to any branch of enterprise. The credit bestowed on probity and industry is the just reward of merit, and an honorable incentive to further acquisition. None oppose it who love their country and understand its welfare. But when it is unduly encouraged—when it is made to inflame the public mind with the temptations of sudden and unsubstantial wealth—when it turns industry into paths that lead sooner or later to disappointment and distress—it becomes liable to censure, and needs correction. Far from helping probity and industry, the ruin to which it leads falls most severely on the great laboring classes, who are thrown suddenly out of employment, and, by the failure of magnificent schemes never intended to enrich them, are deprived in a moment of their only resource. Abuses of credit and excesses in speculation will happen in despite of the most salutary laws; no Government, perhaps, can altogether prevent them; but surely every Government can refrain from contributing the stimulus that calls them into life.

Since, therefore, experience has shown, that to lend the public money to the local banks is hazardous to the operations of the Government, at least of doubtful benefit to the institutions themselves, and productive of disastrous derangement in the business and currency of the country, is it the part of wisdom again to renew the connection?
